*Now live, nor tender! lands tibi serua, lecter
Gratum opus Qu dignum consule credere uideret.
Nepher hoc Ortulani, sic nostrum hunc exhibet orbem.*

*Vires emineas, tota Britannia, simul.
Oras, Sinus, flum, portus, nemus, oppida, traictus.
Regna, duces, populi, fœdera, bella, quies.*

Rich. Saint George Norrey King at armes, in fauour of this worke.

IT is farre from my purpose, to commend without cause, or by ouer curious flourish to make a shadow seeme a substance, this worke needs no such deceptiuo uisus; The subject is of it selfe honorable, and able to stand without such weakè proppes. The glory of our nation being almost buried in the pit of obliuiscence, is herein reuiued, the continuance of Christianity traced from age to age, the antiquity and situation of our Townes, Castles, Religious Houses, Nobility, and all other memorable matters so liuely portraied, as in a glasse we may rightly discern the true shape, quality and condition of each of them in particular. This worke therefore being now brought vpon the publike stage and view of the world, may in my poore censurè giue satisfaction to the learned Reader, and abide the touch of the malignant opposer; which being effected without hope of gaine or vaine ostentation with so great care both of body and mind, is the more precious, for difficilis quæ palæstra. Wherein Gods power is made knowne in this his weakè, but worthy instrument: and the glory of Great Britaine made more famous to the world as well in the Geographicall demension of the Lands situation as in the historical relations of her most famous monarchs and glorious actions; no Kingdome hitherto so particularly described, nor nations History by true record more faithfully penned: In honor whereof I sacrifice these lines of my loue vpon the Altar of this worke, and celebrate the Authors remembrance to future posterities.

To my friend M^r. IOHN SPREED, being very sicke.

*Great loss, and little skill may cause me to missey.
But certainly this picture cannot make thee die;
Though cruell is my penne, and these thirtene yeeres assay
For thy deare country, doth thy health & strength decay.
Yet sith thy toyllsome labour, and thy indolence
Is for thy Countries sake, her same as heere to raise:
Shalt thou thy temples crowne with everlasting hopes,
And in despite of death, shalt cause thy memorie
To liue in endless fame with all posteritie.*

*How may thee far her beauty, and her riches store,
What ere thy fate was in extre age and change of state,
And present greatness such as neuer heretofore,
Since this great March wa'd from North to southerne
And sith thy life is to thy country dedicate, (fare,
Let none profane thy lawrell from thy head to reare
For this her story, which thy skillfull hand did weare:
But live, & weare it [Speed] vntill the worlds great fate Shall bring all earthly thing: vnto their utmost date.*

ALEX. GILL.

In exaustissimi huius operis Authorem, Eulogium Tho. Barkham.

*Vixisti diu, pumpe despecta, silentis lingua,

Quam tibi pro meritis possum circundare palmam
Qui tacuit populo, quæcumque sub arce Britanno Digna referunt affectus, serpsitque locoque, Sanguineas signas, attonitum bella, palestræ;*

*Nobilitanque aptâ patriam compasit, rerum,
Ad nostra exactum deducis tempora scium,
Ergo eris hoc magnæ merces non parua laboris, Exiguum paruum hac quædâ monumenta decet cum Ipsa sibi, ventura quid hoc mirabitur atas, Totâ perpetua debet Respublica grates.*

To the right well deseruing M^r. IOHN SPREED the Author of this worke.

IN this BOOK, (Bibliothec, or Booke of Bookes; TIMES Library, PLACES Geographic)
All that is shewne for which the curious looke
Touching this LAND, for PLACE, or HISTORIE.

*In which, thou hast with paine, with care, and skill, Sweatd this Land more nere then ere it was:
For which, thy Wit thou straind hast to thy Will,
That will as much as Witte can bring to passe.*

*The faire Hibernia that Westerne Isle likewise,
In euery Member, Arriere, Nerue, and Veine, Thou by thine Arte dost so Anatomize,
That all may see each part without paine.*

*Heere Time, and Place, like friendly foes doe warre
Which should beu most desd Particulars;
But Place giues place, sith Time is greater farre:
Yet Place, well rang'd, gets glory by these warres.*

*No helps thou hadst, nor no assisting aide
In this attempt: but, Vertue gave thee might
That well to doe, that well thou hast asside
Which should (in grace) out-loue immortall sight.*

*Hadst thou among the Romanes liu'd when they Did signorize the World, A Signiory
Should thou (at least) haue guard'd thy Swerry, Thy Mappes, Descriptions, and thine Historie.*

*But, thou dost liue when all Arts saue the "right (liberal) all liberal Arts) a begging goe:
That Arte alone, with her true friend Deceit,
Gets all these all fectes but that Arte is knowe.*

*But, by thy Arte though nought be purchased
But empty Fame (that feeds, but satiates not) Yet shall it feed thy NAME till DEATH be dead:
Whole empty noble Names away shall rot.*

*The Letteres this Booke contains, and Maps here graue,
Are still as Feathers to thy Fames faire Wings,
To some fresh Air open the fate of Heauen;
And, raise the same about all ending Tempes:
That when Confusion wrecks this double FRAME,
A Spirit shall moue on CHAOS call'd thy Fame*

 ARTS bigbest Prize, and Palme of praise.
 In Clincks, and Realmes remote throughout,
 His merits merit rare reports:
 For none the like hath brought about;
 Or equaliz'd in any sort.

 His Obseruations haue begot
 On priuate, publicke Benefits.

 In Period which his Plot design'd)
 Should now rest famous with the best.
 The Romans such Deserts did Crowne
 With Laurell, which their Soile brought forth;
 But I, of Branches farre off growne,
 Bring Wreaths to this works, more of worth,
 The Palme (wherein rare vertues bee,
 And, for a Conquest, Crowns a King)
 The Oliue, and the Cedar Tree,
 Faire, fat, and fruitfull; these I bring.
 In Egypt, Syria, and the Land
 Of Promise, (named by holiest High)
 I could not see, nor vnderstand,
 For vertue, any Trees come nigh.
 As these (worth praise) are profitable,
 They being of the worthiest kinds:
 So in best sence, hath Speed become able,
 To please (worth praise) the worthiest Minds.
 In short, to giue him then his due,
 This Arte his better neuer knew.

TO THE WELL-AFFECTED AND FAVOURABLE READER.

O great was the attempt to assay the erection of this large and laborious THEATRE, whose onely platforme might well haue expell'd the readiest hand of the best Artift, that even in the entrance of the first draught as one altogether discouraged, I found my selfe, farre vnfit and vnfurnished both of matter and meanes, either to build, or to beautifie so stately a proiect. But how the Lord then compos'd my mind for the worke, or rather how his owne great power would be seene in my weakness, is now in some measure made manifest by raising the frame thereof to this height; which here from the Presse sheweth his aspect vnto the world. But with what content to thy eye (gentle Reader) I stand in suspence, so many Maister-builders hauing in this subiect gone before me, and I the least, not worthy to beu (much lesse to lay) the least stone in so beautifull a Building; neither can I for my heedlesse presumption alledge any excuse, vnlesse it be this, that the zeale of my countries glory so transported my senses, as I knew not what I vndertooke, vntill I saw the charges thereof (by others bestowed) to amount so high as I held it a conscience to frustrate their designements; wherein albeit, it may be objected that I haue put my sickele into other mens corne, and haue laid my building vpon other mens foundations (as indeed who can do otherwise, especially in a subiect of this nature, seeing that the wisest of Kings witnesseth, that there is nothing new vnder the Sun) yet let this in part suffice for my defence, that in the worke of the Tabernacle there was more, and more workemen employed then Aholiab & Bezaleel; neither did all the Israelites offer to that most glorious work, Gold, Siluer, Onix-stones, Purple, Scarlet, and fine Linnen: but some of the, Brasse, Wood, Goates-haire, Rams-fels, and Badgers skins, as necessary implements in their seuerall seruices. If then, with the poore widow I cast in my mite, and by my owne trauell adde some what more then hath bene already diuulged, let me craue thy acceptance, where I haue done right, and thine assistance to correct where I misse, which I trust may as well be hoped as requested, thy loue with mine being alike oblig'd vnto this our native land. Whose beautie and benefits, not a farre off, as Moles saw Canaan from Pisgah, but by my owne trauels through every prouince of England and Wales mine eyes haue beheld: and whose Climate, Temperature, Plentie and Pleasures, make it to be as the very Eden of Europe (pardon me I pray if affection passe limits) for the store of corne in the champion, and of Pasturage in the the lower Grounds, preſſeth the cart vnder the ſheaves to the barn, and ſillet the coſſers of their poſſeſſors. Neither are the faces of the Mountaines and Hills onely ſpread over with infinite beards and ſorts of cattell, but their intralls alſo are in continuall trauell, and continually deliuered of their rich Progenies of Copper, Lead, and Iron, Marble, Criſtall, Iet, Alabaſter, yea the moſt wonder-working Loadſtone; to ſay nothing either of Cannoll and Sea-coale as rich for profit and as needfull for uſe, or of the goodly Quarries of choiſeſt ſtone, as neceſſary for ſtrength, as eſtimable for beauty. Her Seas and Riuerſ ſo ſtored with Fiſh, and her Fels and Fens ſo replenished with wild foule, that they euen preſent themſelues for ready prey to their takers; briefly, euery ſoile is ſo enriched with plenty and pleaſures, as the inhabitants thinke there is no other Paradice in the earth but where theſelues dwell. The true plot of the whole land, & that again into parts in ſeueral Cards are here deſcribed, as likewiſe the cities and ſhire townes are inſerted, where of ſome haue bene performed by others, without Scale annexed, the reſt by mine owne travels, and vnto them for diſtintions ſake, the Scale of Paces, accounted according to the Geometrical meaſure, five foote to a pace I haue ſet; but in this imployment I am ſomewhat to excuſe my ſelf from wrongs conceiued done vnto more beautifull and richer corporatiōs, which in this ſurvey are in ſilence ouer paſſed, and places of leſſe note & frequency deſcribed. For ſatisfaction whereof (good Reader) vnderſtand my purpoſe, according to the title prefixed, which in this land (beſides other things) is to ſhew the ſituation of euery city and ſhire town onely. So that without iniury to all, I could not inſert ſome, though oftentimes it greened me much to leaue ſuch beautifull places vntouched: which notwithstanding being wel knowne ſo to be giueth no little glory to the land in generall, ſo to be replenished with ſtore & choiſe, as hardly can be iudged which may be omitted. The Shires diuiſions into Lathes, Hundreds, Wapentakes and Cantreds according to their ratable, and accuſtomed manner I haue ſeparated, and vnder the ſame Title that the record beareth, in their due places diſtinguiſhed; wherein by the helpe of the Tables annexed, any Citie, Towne, Burrough, Hamlet, or place of note may readily be found, and whereby ſafely may be affirmed that there is not any one kingdom, in the world ſo exactly deſcribed, as is this our Iland of Great Brittain, that onely excepted which Iſuah conquered and into Tribes diuided. The armes of ſuch Princes and Nobles as haue had the dignities, and borne the titles either of Dukes, Marqueſſes, or Earles, in the ſame Prouince, City or Place: and finally the Battels fought either by the ſorraine or home-bred Conſpirators, I haue alſo added. Where we from vnder our owne vines without feare may behold the prints of indured miſeries, ſealed with the blood of thoſe times, to the loſſe of their liues, and libertie; our ſelues (as in the reigne of Auguſtus, when the Temple of Ianus ſtood ſhut, and Mars his bands bound with chaines of Braſſe as Virgill ſpeaketh) beare not the ſound of the Alarū in our Gates, nor the clattering of armor in our campe, whoſe ſwords are now turned into mattocks and ſpeares into ſiſhes, as Micah ſheweth the peaceable times vnder Chriſt. In ſhewing theſe things I haue chiefly ſought to giue ſatisfaction to all without offence to any, whereof if I faile, yet this to my ſelf haue I gained, that whileſt I ſet all my thoughts and cogitations bereon, I had ſmall regard to the bewitching pleaſures, and vaine enticements of this wicked world, neither had I leaſure to be led by an ambitious deſire to raiſe my ſtatiō aboue the lenell of my equals, or with baſe flattery to follow, and fill the eares of Fortunes Deputies, the rains of theſe intents checking the bit of affection into another way. And applying my ſelf wholly to the frame of this moſt goodly Building, haue as a poore labourer carried the carued ſtones and poliſhed Pillars from the hands of the more ſkilfull Architects

THE PROEME.
TO THE LEARNED AND LOVERS
GREAT BRITAINES
GLORY.

Having thus farre trauelled in the protract, and description of this famous Empire of GREAT BRITAINE, I might here have rested, and claimed the priuiledge that yeeres and imbecillitie haue brought me vnto: had not a further desire in others vrged it a matter incident, historically to lay downe the originals of those Nations and succeſſions of those Monarchs, which either by birth or conquest haue aspired to the Imperiall Crowne.

And albeit I finde my selfe both tired in the former, and most vnfit to prosecute this latter, yet will I endeouour to giue herein my best assayes; though as my labours, so my wants also, thereby will be made more vulgar to the world.

For if those men were blame-worthy against whom Heraclite exclaimeth, who with long toile and great trouble finde a little pure substance in a great deale of base earth: how shall I then free me from the like imputation, that from so many mines of pure metals, haue gotten so little Oare, and the same neither well tried in my defectiue furnace, nor yet artificially cast off through the default of the mould, wanting both skil for to fashion, and measure to performe, the true proportions that in such a proiect is to be required; and how often these my defects haue dissuaded my proceedings, is best knowne to him that is the searcher of the heart.

But by what fate I am enforced still to goe forward, I know not, vnlesse it be the ardent affection and loue to my native Countrey; wherein I must confesse that Nature in those gifts hath bene both liberall, yea and prodigall, though Fortune as sparing & fast-handed against me, euer checking the Bit with the Reines of necessity, and curbing the meanes that should illustrate my labours: which moues me sometimes to thinke that if the great Philosopher Theophrastus, had caule on his death-bed to accuse Nature, for giuing man so long a lesson, and so short a life; then I against Fortune may as iustly exclaime, that hath assigned me so great a labour and so little meanes. And therefore let it not seeme offensive that I draw my waters from the Cessers of others, who am not able to fetch them at the spring-head my selfe: Neither that I strike vpon the same Anvile vnto their sound, though nothing so loud, nor with the like strength; wherein yet this fruit at least wil (I hope) redound of my endenours that I shall incite the more learned: if not otherwise, yet in emulation of me, to free the face drawne by Apelles, from the censure of the fault or defect in the foot, and not onely to amend, but euen to new-mould the whole. Which thing though my dayes are neere spent; and with Barzillai I may say that musick to me is now vnpleasing: yet doth my eare thirst after the set of that straine, as Socrates thoughts ranne euer on his Booke: who the night before he was to suffer death, was desirous to learne musick, because he would die learning still something. Moses when he foresaw the destruction of his Common-wealth, which whilst it stood, was the glory of the earth, and a paterne to all kingdomes succeeding, left this for a Law among the rest, and euen to remaine for euer, that the fathers should teach their children, and should commit vnto writing those things which the Lord in their dayes had done, and enioyned the children: Like-while to enquire of the times that were past, euen from the first creation of man: For when as Empires and Kingdomes, Common weales and Cities, do end and perish, yet the Histories thereof do remaine and liue; And that made Cicero to say as he did, that Salamina should be vterly forgotten, before the things that were done in Salamina should perish: And therefore as among the wise answers of Thales, the Histories of Countreys are to be accounted for principals, either as Cicero calleth them the Mistres of life, and expositions of Times; so likewise let vs from the lyricall Poet Simonides learne this further, That he is perfectly happy which knowes his native country to be truly glorious. And as Callidore calls him a worthy Citizen that seeketh the commodity of his country: So contrariwise he is by Bale esteemed but a fruitles clod of earth, that sucks the sappe of his soile onely to himselfe, whose memoriall shall perish as the disperfed smoake in the clouds, though for a time he mount aloft in his swelling pride. This naturall loue and true affection to our native Countrey, we may further learne from the ancient Patriarks and Fathers themselves, who besides a desire that they had to theirs, continually to liue therein during life, commanded their bodies to be buried therein after death: from whose Bowels they first had assumed their breathes, and in whose bosome they layd their bones, as in their last bed of rest. Yea, of the vnreasonable creatures, the Birds and Beasts, we may learne this loue, that alwayes are willing towards their home. And if it happen that Countreys grow vnkinde as Homers did, that in his old age and blind, suffred him to beg his bread; or that a Prophet in his owne country is not esteemed, as Jeremy felt it, and CHRIST IESVS taught, yet did the one for his peoples captiuiety, wish his eyes a fontaine of teares, and the other for his countreys destruction lamented and wept, holding it vnlawfull to take the childrens bread, and to giue it vnto others.

That this our Countrey and subiect of History deserueth the loue of her inhabitants, is witnessed euen by forraigne writers themselves, who haue termed it the Court of Queene Ceres, the Granary of the Westerne world, the fortunate Island, the Paradise of pleasure and Garden of God; whose Typographicall descriptions for the whole Iland, and Geographicall iurneyes for the seuerall parts, exceed any other kingdome vnder the cope of Heauen; that onely excepted which was conquered and diuided by Josuah; And for fruitfulness and temperature may be accounted another Canaan; watered with riuers that doe cleane the earth, as the Prophet speaketh, and make the land as rich and beautiful, as was that of Aegypt. Our Kings for valour and Sanctity, ranked with the worthiest in the world, and our Nations originals, conquests, and continuance, tried by the touch of the best humane testimonies, leaue as faire a Lustre vpon the same stone, as doeth any other, and with any nation may easily contend (saith Lanquet) both for antiquity, and continuall inhabitants, from the first time that any of them can claime their originals.

And although our many Records are perished by the inuasions of strangers, through their couetous Conquest of so faire a Land; or in the ciuill dissensions of homebred aspi- rers that haue sought the possession of so rich a Crowne, yet Truth hath left vs no lesse beholding vnto her, then mightier Nations, and them that would be far more famous.

Neither

either is it to be wondred at, that the Records of GREAT BRITAINE are eaten up with Times teeth, as Onid speakes, when as in Times ruines lye buried their Registers, that haue bene kept with a stronger guard, as Titus Liny in the entrance of his Hi- story affirmeth of the Romanes. As for those things (saith he) as are reported either before, or at the foundation of the City more beautified and set out with Poets fables; then grounded upon pure and faithfull reports, I meane neither to auerre nor disproue. Of whole uncertainties, let vs a while heare the reporters themselues speake, before we proceed to the certaine successions of our British Monarchs: vntill which time the credit of our History may wel be said to waigh with (if not downe peize) many others. Varro (that learned Romane writer, who liued an hundred yeeres before the birth of our Saviour Christ) calleth the first world to the Flood uncertaine; and thence to the first Olympias fabulous: Because in that time (saith he) there is nothing related (for the most part) but fables among the Greekes, Latines, and other learned Nations. And therefore Plutarch beginneth the liues of his worthy men, no higher then Theseus: because (saith he) what hath bene written before, was but of strange things, and sayings full of monstrous fables imagined and deuised by Poets, which are altogether uncertaine and most vnttrue. And Diodorus Si- culus (that liued in Augustus Cæsars time, a great searcher after Antiquities, and for thirty yeeres continuance a traoueller into many Countreys, for information and further satisfaction) writing his History called Bibliotheca, conteyning forty Bookes, and yeeres of continuance one thousand, one hundred thirty and eight, of his first sixe himselfe giueth this censure in his Proeme. These Bookes (saith he) contayning the Acts of ancient men, before the destruction of Troy, with the ancient Histories aswell of Grecians
 as Barbarians, are called fabulous: Which moued Lucretius the Poet to demaund this question.

*Cur supra bellum Thebanum & frustra Troia;
 Non alius quondam cecinerit Poeta?*

Why haue not Poets in their workes of fained stories brought,
 Things done before the Warres of Thebes, or Troyes destruction wrought?

Yea and of Troyes story it selfe, if we may beleue Thucydides (whom Bodine commendeth for an absolute Historian) though it be ancient (saith he) yet a great part thereof is fabulous. And Tully out of Plato complaineth of as much: For you Grecians (saith he) as children in learning, deliuer onely things uncertaine, and haue mingled fables with the Warres of Thebes, and of Troy, things (perhaps) which neuer were, but gathered out of the scattered Verses of Homer and others, not digested by Aristarchus, and are yet un-certaine and obscure. And that the Greekes indeed were but babes in Antiquity, Jose- phus in his Nations defence against Appion, sufficiently doth proue, where he affirmeth, That the inuention of their Letters was not so old as the siege of Troy, insomuch that the Poetrie of Homer (then the which there is none more ancient among them) was not committed to writing, but sung by rote. And the Latine tongue it selfe by M. Cato is said, not to haue bene in vse foure hundred and fifty yeeres before the building of Rome.
 And Titus Liny their famous Historian, freely confesseth, That the vse of Letters and learning among the Romanes, was rare and hard to be found before the taking of Rome by the Gaulers. Yea, and of the uncertaintie of Romes foundation, how lauih loeuer Histori- ans haue written, not onely Fenestella hath continued whole Pages, but Plutarch likewise in the life of Romulus, hath many sayings, whereof this is one. The Historio- graphers (saith he) do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause the great name of Rome (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through the world) was first giuen vnto it.
 some affirming, that the Pelagians after they had runne ouer a great part of the world, lastly stayed themselues in that place where Rome was new built, and for their great strength in Armes, gaue name to that City Rome, which signifyeth power in the Greeke tongue. Other say, that certaine Troians after their siege, in certaine vessels saued themselves by flight, and being put into the Thuscan Sea, anchored neere to the Riuer Tyber: whose wines being extremely Sea-sicke, through the counsell of Roma a Lady, the wisest and worthiest among them, set fire on the whole Fleete; whereupon their husbands (though sore offended) were inforced to make vse of their present necessity, and neere vnto Palantium planted this City, whose same presently grew great, and in honour of Lady Roma, named it Rome; and from hence they say the custome of kissing in salutations came, after the example of these wines, who to appeale the husbands wrachs with smiles and imbracings kissed their mouths. Some will haue the name from Roma, the daughter of Italus and of Lucaria, or els of Telephus the sonne of Hercules, and of the wife of Aeneas. Others of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas. Some againe from Romanus the sonne of Ulysses and of Cyrce, will haue it named Rome. Others from Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy. There are that bring the name thereof from one Romus a tyrant of the Latines, who droue the Thuscans out of those parts. And they who thinke that Romulus (as that is most generall, and carieth the most likelihood to be Romes founder,) do not agree about his auinceflours, as more at large in Plutarch appeareth. And therefore with Thucydides we may well say, It is a hard and difficult matter to keepe a meane in speaking of things, wherein scarcely can be had a certaine opinion of trueth. And the rather, for that the writers themselves haue blamed each others of affectation & falsehood, as in Iosephus we may see; who affirmeth, That Hellanicus dissented from Acusilaus, Acusilaus with Diodorus correcting Herodotus; Ephorus accused Hellanicus of vntrueths; so did Timens reprove Ephorus of as much; Philistus and Callias dissented from Timens in his History of Sicily, and Thucydides accounted a lyar by some. Caesar is taxed by Asinius Pollio (saith Suetonius) to be partiall in his Commentaries. And Tacitus by Tertullian is blamed for vntrueths; Fabius Maximus is reprehended by Polybius for defectiue writing the Punicke warres; and himselfe againe with Silenus, Timens, Antigonus, & Hieron, as much found fault with by Dionysius Halicarnassens, for writing the Romane histories so vnperfectly. And a man may vse the very same speech against Dionysius, saith Bodine. These things thus standing, let vs giue leaue to Antiquitie, who sometimes minglcth falsehoods with truth, to make the beginnings of Policies seeme more honourable: And whose power is farre serued into the worlds conceit, that with Hierome we may say, Antiquity is allowed with such generall applause, that knowne vntrueths many times are pleasing vnto many. Yet with better regard to reuerend Antiquity, whom Jobs opposer wills vs inquire after, and to our owne relations in deliuering their censures, let this be considered; That more things are let slippe, then are comprehended in any mans writings, and yet more therein written, then any mans life. (though it be long) will admit him to reade. Neither let vs be forestalled with any preiudicate opinions of the reporters; that in somethings may iustly be suspected, or in affectiō, which by nature we owe to our naturall Countrey; nor consent (as Linie speaketh) to stand to the ancientnesse of reports, when it seemeth to take away the certainty of truth. To keepe a meane betwixt both, my selfe with Bildad doe confesse, that I am but of yesterday, and know nothing, and therefore will relate the originall names and Nations of this famous Fland; with the successions of her Monarches and Historicall actions, so farre only as is most approued by the best Writers, and will leaue other clouds of obicurity to be cleared by the labours of a more learned penne.

THE SITE AND CIRCVIT OF GREAT BRITAINES MONARCHIE.

CHAPTER I.

BESIDES those fruitfull Ilands that disperdely are scattered about the Mayne, like to beautifull pearls that uncompass a Diademe, the Ile of GREAT BRITAINES doth raise it selfe first to our sight, as the Bodie of that most famous & mighty Empire, whereof many other Kingdomes and Countries are parents and members. Being by the Admiralty so set in the maine Ocean, as that there is thereby the High Admirall of the Sea, and in the terrestriall Globe so seated, as that the is worthily repeated both The Garden of Pleasure, and The Storehouse of Profits, opening her Havens every way, fit to receive all fortaine trafficker, and to vtter her owne into all other parts: and therefore (as the Soueraigne Lady and Empresse of the rest) deserves our description in the first place.

(2) This Iland is so spacious and ample, that Cesar (the first Romane discoverer thereof) supposed that he had found out another World: for to his seeming it appeared, that the Ocean was rather contained within that Mayne, then that Mayne to be compassed with that Ocean about. And Julius Sallust, for her circuit and largenesse, faith that it deserveth the name of Another World. But Aristides a Greece Author speaks much more properly, who by way of excellencie termeth BRITAIN, The Great Land: As likewise Tacitus, that undertooke to describe BRITAIN by his owne knowledge, who faith, that of all Ilands knowne to the Romans it was the greatest: And so doth Dionysius in his description of the World.

(3) But as Strabo compares the then known World, to a Cloake, Strabon Nomastion Italy, to an Oken leafe, and Dionysius Spain, vnto an Oxe-side: so the said Tacitus in the life of Agriola, from Linie his ancient, and Fabius Rusticus his moderne, doth liken the fashion thereof to a long Dish, or two-headed Axe: whose forme notwithstanding may better be expofed to the eye, in the draught before scene, then can be explained in words to conceit, or vnto any other thing bee compared besides it selfe: especially seeing that so many good Writers haue had but very bad success in their resemblances of Countries. And this of them is rather vnlike to either, if wee speake of the whole, which then was vnkownen, as it seemeth by Tacitus. And the huge enorme tract of ground beyond Caledonia, which runneth vnto the furthermost point, growing narrow and sharpe like a wedge, was first redoubled with the Romane Fleet by Publius Agriola, and BRITAIN discovered to bee an Iland, one hundred thirty and six yeeres after Julius Cesar first entrance therein.

(4) Some haue beene Induced by the narrownesse of the Sea, and likenesse of the Saile, to thinke that BRITAIN was sometimes ioined to the continent of France: whereunto Seruius Honoratus subscribeth in his Commentarie vpon the first Eclage of Virgil, who there mentioneth

— Poenius toto diuisos orbe Britannos.

The Britaine people quere from all the world diuind.

As likewise by Claudian another ancient Poet it is said,

— nostra deducit Britannia mundi.

The Britaine soile remoued from our worlds continent.

And Vinsianus with them affirms, that in the beginning Britaine and Gallia were both one Land. The like doth Virgil verifie of the Ile of Sicilie, which in times past hee reports to haue beene one with Italie. Others bold, that all Ilands had their first separation from the Mayne by the rage of the generall Deluge, and that the mountaines thereby shewed their tops about the plaine grounds; and the plaines settling lower, became deepe vallies. When or howsoeuer, by Gods diuine ordinance and wisdom, wee see that these Ilands situated in the Sea, doe no lesse ferue and adorne the Ocean it selfe, then the Lakes and Foales of water doe the drie land, and all of them (as members of one masse) to minister sustenance for the life of all things liuing, and pleasures to the vse and seruice of man.

(5) The Iland of BRITAIN, of all others the most famous (by Catullus reputed the furthest towards the Well) is bounded on the South with Normandie and France, vpon the East with Germany and Denmarke, vpon the West with Ireland and the Atlanticke Ocean, and vpon the North with the vast Deucaledon Sea. The length thereof, measured by the gradations to both extremes, that is, from the Lysford Point Southward in Cornwall, which lieth in the Latitude of 50. degrees and 6. minutes, to the Strathly head in Scotland (being the furthest point of this Iland towards

And the extent of the Land in the broadest part is from the Lands end in Cornwall in the West (situated in 14. degrees and 37. minutes of Longitude, according to Mercator his Atlas) unto the Land Tene in the East of Kent (lying in 22. degrees 30. minutes) and containeth miles 340. as they have delivered, that with curious search have laid the dimension thereof.

Britain abundant with all kind of Graine.

(6) The site of this Land is set by the Mathematicians in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and the Longitude likewise placed betwix the Parallel fourteenth and twenty six: a feat as well for Air as Soile, both fruitful and milde; and for length of daies, pleasant and delightfull: for in the height of Summer the day is said to be eighteen equinoctiall boares long, wherof sixteen and a halfe are spent from Sunne to Sunne. Yea and Tacitus saith, that in the furthest North part of the Island the nights are so short, that herewith the going out and coming in of the day the space is hardly perceived, and the Sunne seems neither to set nor arise: Because (saith he) the extreme and plaine part of the earth present a low shadow, and raise not the darkness on high, so the night falleth under the shade and starre. Better might hee have said, by reason of the inclination of his Circle to the Horizon defending not directly, but passing obliquely, tazing as it were under their Horizon.

(7) The aire, saith Strabo and Tacitus is rather inclinable to flowers then to fowes. And Cesar commendeth it to be more temperate, and the cold lesse, then that in France, as not subject to either extremes, as the more Northerne and Southerne Countries are: to which temperate Ceterius Genialis a very ancient Poet seemeth to have respect, when of this Land thus he verifieth:

Non illic Aries vernis ferit aera cornu, Gaulis ne Geminis praedant cornua Tauri.

The horned Ram there butteth not the aire of tender Spring: The Twins, nor Bull do in this Isle uniformly seasons bring.

(8) And although the Seas thereof are accounted and called by Nubius the Arabian, The darke and dangerous Seas, in regard of the misty vapors that therefrom arise, yet in the winter season those clouds are dispersed into still showers of raine, that doe dissolve the rigour and great extremity of the cold: yea and those Seas themselves stirred and working to and fro with the windes, doe thereby wax warme (as Cicero saith) so that a man may easily perceive within that world of waters a certain heat included. And Matius Felix proving that G O D hath a special regard to the severall parts of the world, as well as to the whole, saith, that BRITAIN, though otherwise walled from the aspect of the Sunne, yet it is relieved with the warmth of her entraining Seas; and as much refreshed, we may well say, by those sweet and gentle windes that in the height of Summer are sent from those seas, and doe abate the rigor of the Sunnes great scorching heat; and yeeleth not only entercount for traffique into all parts of the World, but plentifully aboundeth with all sorts of fish, to the great benefit of the Inhabitants; and bringeth forth Pearles, as Tacitus sheweth, which were usually cast out with the flood, and gathered at the ebbe. These Pearles, though not altogether so orient as they in India, by Ammasius in his 23. booke and 12. chapter, are called Rich Gemmes. And Pliny in his ninth booke and thirty fifth chapter, vrbeth the like term: The desire wherof (as Suetonius saith) drew Cezars affection for the Conquest of BRITAIN.

(9) The soile (saith Tacitus) setting aside the Olive, the Vine, and such other plants as are only proper to hotter Countreys, taketh all kinde of Graine, and beareth it in abundance: it flourisheth up quickly, and ripeneth slowly: the cause both is the same, the over-much moisture of the soile, and the aire. And Cesar writeth, that for timber it was stored of all kindes, as in Gallia, the Birch and Firre tree only excepted. Forabundance of Graine, Britaine is said to bee The seat of Lucene Ceres, by Orpheus the old Poet; and the Granary and Storehouse for the Western World, as Charles the great termed it: and by our owne Antecessors in the blacke Booke of the Eschequer it is called a Paradise of pleasure. From whence the Romans were wont yearly to transport (with a fleet of eight hundred vessels bigger then Barges) great store of corne for the maintenance of their Armies. But vnto the particular relation of each severall blessing belonging to this most happy Land, we will not againe enter, seeing that in every Country we have sufficiently, and no more then truly, spoken thereof. Only, if you please, heare what hath bene said of this Land by the Roman Orators, and first in the Panegyricke to Constantine the Emperour.

(10) O happy BRITAIN, and more fortunate then all other Lands beside, which first didst for Constantine Emperour I For god cause both nature endowed thee with all blessings both of aire and soile: wherin there is neither excession cold of Winter nor extreme heat of Summer: when as there is so great abundance of graine, that is sufficient both for bread and drinke. There the fowells are free from savage beastes, and the ground void of noisome serpents: to whose feed an infinite multitude of tame cattle there are, with their odders stirring full of milke, and laden with fowles to the ground. And verily (that which for the use of our lives we most esteeme) the darts are therein very few, and he may live without fume light, for that they amongst plumes by the facile east and raise no shadowes on high: and the aspect both of day and starres passeth beyond the bound of the night: yea the very Sunne is selfe, which once so seemeth far to set, appeareth there only to pass by a little, and goe aside.

And in another, spoken to Constantine, the father of Constantine the Great, this is said:

Though BRITAIN be but a single name, yet surely the States last have bene manifold, in sowing a Land so plentyfull in fruit and graine, so rich in pasture, so full of mines and mines of metall, so gainfull in tributes and renewers, so accommodated with many houses, and for civill pleasure and pleasure.

And a Poet of good antiquity, of natures motherly affection towards this our Land, hath thus writtzen:

*Tam non sit fructu a gelu, nec frigore feruens, Clementis caelo temperatque places.
Cum pareret Naturae parces, varique fauore Insideret dote: omnibus una locu,
Sepulchra prior aetate, matrumque professa,
Insula sit solus, plenusque pacis, ut.
Quicquid amat luxu, quicquid desiderat aequum,
Ecce pronunciet, vel alioquin tibi.
Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art;
Thy aire is evenly temper, sweetly breath'd:
So pleas'd Dame Nature when she first bequeath'd
To every soule of her rich gifts a part;
Thou art all other like better: for she first sought it
To be thou (quoth she) the blessed Isle of peace.
What ever please ye yield, or wealth increase,
From thee shall grow, or shall to thee be brought.*

(11) And that BRITAIN hath bene taken for those fortunate Islands wherof the Poets have imagined a perpetual spring time, is certaine by Isidore Cretzer a Greeke Author of good account. And in Robert of Ancharie we read, what time Pope Clement the sixth had elected Lewis of Spain to be Prince of the Fortunate Islands, raising him powers both in Italie and France, the English Liger Embassadors, that lay then in Rome for King Edward the third, were so deeply set in the opinion, that this preparation was made against BRITAIN, that they wrote their supplications concerned, and presently with-drew themselves into England, to certifie the King of the said designs. And it seemeth Pope Innocent the fourth was of the same minde, when (as Math. Paris writeth) hee said, Veri hunc delictum esse Anglia: veri patrum unchastitatem esse: Et vbi multa abundant, de multis multa multa possunt extingui, &c. Certes the Kingdom of England is the very Paradise of pleasures, a Well which can never be drawn dry: where many things doe abound, and whence many things may bee extirped, &c. With which his conceit he was afterward so farre transported with a longing desire, as hee made great manes and earnest suit to the King of England (as the said Author writeth, ad. an. 1250.) that hee might come into England to see that Country which was every where so much renowned. In a word, BRITAINS is so rich in commodities, so beautifull in situation, and so replend in all glory, that if the Omnipotent (as one hath said) had conspired to fashion the world round like a ring, as he did like a globe, it might have borne most worthily the only Gemme therein. Whole Vallies are like Eden: whole Hilles are as Lebanon: whole Springs are as Pishah: whole Rivers are as Jordan:

whole Vallies is the Ocean: and whole defense is the Lord Iehovah.

(12) The body then of this Imperiall Monar-chie sheweth not only the greatnesse of it selfe in it selfe, but also extendeth her beautifull branches into many other Countries and Kingdomes farre iacent and remote. This greatnesse is made the more sensible, for that the Island in times past sustained at once no lesse then eleven Kings in their royall estates, all of them wearing Crowne, and commanding great powers. Such was the Heptarchie of the Saxons: seven Kingdomes, seated on the South of Severus his Wall.
Two Kingdomes thence had their sitings in that Nor-therne part, and their severall Kings of Scots and Pitts ruling on both sides the Glade, even vnto the Descaledonian Seas. And two Kingdomes (if not more) divided into North and South, and their Kings of the ancient Brittaines ruling the West part of this Island beyond the Glade Offe, or Offe his Dure, commonly called WALLS.

(13) The Islands likewise belonging to this Empire had Kings of their owne, as that of Man, the Orcades, and in Irelande one time five Kings reigning together. France also is annexed, and so was Cyprus sometimes with some Prouinces of Syria, subdued by King Richard the first, surnamed Cœur-de-lion. And at this present in the new World of America a Colone of BRITAINS is seated in that part now called VIR-GINIA; whereby the borders of our Soveraignes command and most rightfull title may be enlarged, & the Gospell of Iesui Christ further preached, which no doubt will in time be embraced, to the saluation wrote for his title: which further is confirmed by the Charter of King Edgar for the foundation of the Ca-

S touching the first Inhabitants and originall Names of this Island, things so farre cast into the mistie darke-nesse of obiscure and obli-uion, that there is no hope left vs, so lately born, to discover them; especially knowing that the first Inhabitants being merely barbarous, neuer troubled themselves with care to transmit their Originals to posterity: neither if they would, could haue done, being without Letters, which only doe preferre and transcribe knowledge vnto others. And say they had letters, yet was it not lawfull for them to commit their affaires to writing, as Cesar doth tell us of the Druides, the only wise and learned men among them, that had the managing both of Iustice and religious Rites. And had they committed these things to writing, yet doubtlesse had they perished in the revolutions of so many ages as are pased, and so many conceptions or eversions of the State. Gildas and Nennius, the Brittaines first Historians, confesse plainly, that they had no understanding of the ancient affaires of this Island, but from foraine Writers; and neither that about two hundred and odd yeeres before the birth of our Saviour Christ. At which time Polybius a most great Writer, and an attendant vpon Scipio, saith, that the Regions Northward from Narbona (as this is) were utterly unknown; and whatsoever was written or reported of them, was but a dream. And therefore vntill such time as the Ro-mane Writers reach forth their hands to direct vs, wee shall wander, as without a guide, and shall seeme to heape more rubbish vpon former ruines.

(2) Yet let this bee granted, that the Originall names of Countries and Prouinces were first affixed from their possessors, whereof Iosephus in the tenth Chapter of his first Booke of Antiquities is a sufficient Witness, who in the dispersion of Noahs sonnes and his nephewes, nameth the Countries according to their families. So did the children of Dan name Layb after their father: Iair his Cities that he conquered in the Land of Gilead: and Iudra from Iudah whose King was of him. And that this also was the practise of the Gentiles, Periculus doth their, who saith, that himselfe knew no Nation in the earth, which would not haue their names either from their Prince, Captaine, or King: the example whereof hee interesteth, that Spane was so named from Hispan, Italy from Italus, and the like.

(3) And accordingly from Samothres the sixth sonne of Iapheth (whom Moses calleth Meseth)
the brother of Gomer, and of Iman, whose seed is said in the tenth of Genesis to haue replenished the Isles of the Gentiles,

Gentiles, is brought by some Authors into this Island, the yeere after the general Flood two hundred fiftie and two, where he lived, and gave Lawes to his people, and left to his posteritie the name thereof to be called Samothra, after his owne. But fish the credit of this Samothra and his Samothra ariseth onely from a small and new pamphlet, bearing the name of Berufus the Chaldean, bolted out vnder a shew of aged Antiquitie, and thrust into the world vnder the countenance of the ancient Historian himselfe: I meane not to enforce, seeing my purpose is to expose this most beaustifull Island in her owne befeeming attire, and not deformed by these rotten and patched ragges. And of this forged Berufus we have better cause to vpbraid Iohannes Amos his Countenancer and Commenter, than the Egyptian Priests had to twit Solan, in accusing the Grecians, that for Isyrie had not attained to the yeeres of a gray head. For it exceeds not much one hundred and twenty yeeres since the same booke first appeared in the world; and then vehemently suspected as fabulous by Lindseyus Pines, and afterwards considered by the learned Galfridus Ferrarius in a severall treatise, and now vniuersally reiected of all skillfull Antiquaries.

(4) But the name ALBION is better received, being found so termed of the Grecians in ancient time, as in the booke De Mundo, written to Alexander, and supposed to be Aristotles, play in his Natural Historie, Ptolomee, Strabo, and others: yet vpon what ground it should be so called there arise many considerations. Pomponius Mela, Nicolas Perattus, Regemarus Philofophus, Aristotle, and Humfrey Lloyd, deriue it from Albion Marcianus a Giant, and sonne of Neptune, that conquered (as they say) these Samothras, and leaved himselfe in this Island the yeere after the Flood three hundred thirty five. And if that be true which Perattus and Edm. Geraldus haue written, then may this Albion giue name to this Island. Notwithstanding, Strabo, Manilius, and Prier Herodotus, will haue it to be named albius rapibus, of the rocks and white cliffs appearing towards the coasts of France: which carrieth the more likelihood through the credit of Orpheus a most ancient Poet, who in his Argonauticks (if so be they were his) calleth the Island next vnto Hibernia or Hernia, which questionlesse is this of ours, uandis, that is, the White Land. And accordingly haue the Welsh Poets called it Iau Wen. And this is further confirmed from Cicero, who termeth these whitish cliffs uirgineis mules; as also by the antike Coines of Antoninus Pius and Seuerus the Romane Emperours, wherein BRITAINES is stamped in a woman's attire sitting vpon rocks. And the same being chalkie, or of a plaister-like substance, Strabo supposeth was the cause of the sweating Jewell, and wherof Albion had the name. Vnlesse some will deriue it from Alphen, which as Seffus saith, doth signifie white in Greece; or Albion, rich or happie, in regard of the fertilitye of the soile, whose some temperature of the aire, and the rich commodities in the same: either from Albion for the high situation. But from the Laone albius rapibus it could not be deriued, when that language was vnknown to the world. Marianus the Monke, Iohn Row, Daniel Penciar, and William Caxton, from others more ancient, doe fetch the name thereof from Albina the beautifull daughter of Dioscorus King of Syria, who with her sisters, thirty in number, for the slaughter of their husbands, were banished their Countrey, and without man, oares, or tackles, were committed to the mercy of the Sea, who after many aduentures, lastly arrived vpon this shoure, where they inhabited, and gaue name to this Island, calling it Albion after the name of their eldest sister: and accompanying with Dionysius, brought forth a progeny of Giants, if we will beleue the Legend of this most impudent lye, which is worthily reiected by Badius, Valerianus, Harding, Bale, Iohn Row, and others. But that the name Albion was both of great acceptance and long continuance, is apparent by the worthy Epitheton of King Edgar the Saxon, who in his Charter for the foundation of the show, yet did I well perceive the word PRYTANIA, (not called so, from the adjunct white and beauteous) but rather from the Greek word prytania, Prytania, which as he saith, doth signifie mettals. For the Grecians flourishing in wicdome, and experience, entered the Ocean, and finding this land full of Brass, Tyne, Lead, Iron, Gold, and Silver gave name thereunto accordingly and called it Prytania. Thus farre be. And some in regard of these rich commodities thence brought, will have it named Britannia, as upon like occasion Pilius Sequeler affirmeth Calydonia sometimes to have beene so called. Others, and those many do hold a more strange opinion, namely, that this land was called Britannia of Briella a Spartan word which signifieth Earth, for that it was separated from the maine land, and say they it was once used with the continent of France.—Of this opinion are Antonius Vellius, Dominicus Morus Niger, Serapius Humeratus, Pylanius, Bodius, Tyrone, and Periclerus. But how that name from that separation may be gathered I understand not: for if it be granted, that this land also was cut from the continent (as it is thought all others in the world were), by the violent rage of the vniuersall flood, yet it followeth not, that this only should claime that name, and from that occasion, more than any other, or then all of them be diuided and set apart in the maine Ocean. Other there are that would haue the name Britania to be brought from Britania a Nymph in Greece, daughter to Mari, who (as they say) to auoid the lecherous intents of Miner, forsooke the conuery, and passing the seas arrived in this land and by her the name arose, this hath Tector. But I might as well call Calpurne for his Anglia and Marianna for his Albion, being all fables concurring alike together, and fictions of the time authority that Vergili Dido is. Hefistius derieth the name Britania from Britannus the father of Celtice on whom Heraclius beate Celtice the originall of the Celts as Parthenius Nicaeus a very ancient author writeth. And Sir Thomas Eliot a learned Knight draweth the name of this land from the Greek fountaine alow, but of other signification, viz. Numus Præstia, by which terme the Athenians signified their publicke revenue, and yet that is infinitely excepted against, seeing that it is a peculiar terme only to the Athenians, and that the Grecians called this land ymon not numus. Grospius Becanus in his Originall of Antwerp saith, that the Danes saye be here to plant themselves, and so named this land Britania that is free Denmarke. And others deriue it from Prætoria a country in Germany. But that both these are fictions is manifestly appeareh, for that this land was famous by the name of Britannie many hundred yeeres before that either Dania or Prætoria were heard of in the world.

Abbie of Ely, hath these words: Ego Edgarus Bafilus dilecti Insula Albionis, subditis nobis scriptis Scotorum, Cantuariam, & omnium circumiacentium Regionum, quieti pacis fructus, &c. By which hee knitteth the whole Island together, as a Land worthily to be beloved, and calleth it ALBION.

(5) The next name ascribed vnto this Island is BRITAINES, and that first found and giuen by the Grecians, who were the first discoverers of these Western parts of the world: either from their painted bodies, as their neighbours (if not ancestors) the Gauls were named of their long flaxen haire, or of their rich metals therein gotten, and thence carried in abundance into other Countreies; or from Brute, that with his dispersed Traians conquered it, as he of Memoratus hath translated; or what occasion soeuer, I dispute not: only it feares me I shall giue but small satisfaction to the desirous Reader, of the cause and originall of this name, being comforted with so many vncertainties, wherein the further we follow this intangled thread, the further we lead into the Labyrinth of ambiguity. But as Plutarch, Livy, and other Latine Writers haue complained of the many fictions and fables of Poets intermingled with the histories of truth, wherby truth it selfe was often made incredible; so we in rehearsing the diuers names of Britannia, and the reasons thereof by sundry Writers alleged, rest free in our relations, either from impeaching the power of Antiquitie, or approving those things that are as yet wrapped vp in Times Obscuris, leaving the credit to them that haue left the same vnto vs, and the censur of their opinions to the iudgement of the learned, and those of better experience.

(6) The vulgar received opinion, held on with four hundred yeeres continuance, (some few mens exceptions had against the same) is, that this Island tooke the name of Britannia from Brute the sonne of Syluius, of whom more shall bee spoke in the next Chapter for the peopling of this Island, and from whom some (following a suspected Gildas) doe write the name Britaine: for so doth Hierome, who translating Athenas that excellent Syrian Philosopher, calleth both this and the Islands adiacent, Insulas Britannicas. But besides the many objections made both by forraigne and home-bred Writers, that seeme to make the storie of Brute doubtfull, Humfrey Lloyd a Cambre-Britaine, a learned and diligent searcher of Antiquities, doth confidently deny the name Britaine to be taken from Brute; and among many other observations, makes this an infallible argument, that the letter B is not the first radical of that name; and affirmeth boldly, that there is not any British word whose first radical letter is B. And therefore hee will haue it to be anciently written PRYDCAIN, compounded of two British words, PRYD and CAIN, which signifie (as he saith) Beauty and White; the C, being lost in the latter word, for the more easie pronunciation in the British tongue; and the P in the former changed into B, by the Latines, for the more gentle and pleasant sounds sake: so that himselfe thinketh, that those learned and expert men in the British tongue, which wrote the Islands name with B, doe therein rather follow the Latines, then iudging that to haue the true name indeed: for prooof whereof hee citeth both ancient Copies and Traditions of their owne old Poets the Bards, by whom (saith he) it was usually called Prydain, as the fittest denomination for so beautifull a Land. But if either colour or commodities were her Godfathers at the first, why was she not rather named The Palace of Quene Ceres, as old Orpheus termes her; either Insula florum, as it hath bene foond written in a very ancient manu-script? And yet to second this his conceited name, I finde recorded by Bishop Cooper, a learned Writer, that which makes for that purpose. At Exeterburgh (saith he) two miles from Salisbury, in the digging downe of a wall, a booke containing twenty leaues of very thicke volume was found, which from the hands of Master Richard Pace, chief Secretary to the King, I received; but being sore defaced, could read no one sentence thereof.

Pompeianus Laetius would have it Briton, and that name given it from the Britanni in France. Indeed it is probable, that from the Celtæ, the old Gaulæ or originals coloured: but that the name should come to them hath no colour of truth, seeing that those Britanni came from us, and not we from them: and in Cæsar's time that coast was called Armorica, but this of ours Britania. Forasmuch betwixt the name thereof from Britania a drink, which as Athenæus saith was used among the Greeks. And others will have it from the Brutus arousing and fragling people in Italy: both which are accounted but idle conceits and for no less will we leave them. White of Egges fish will have the name thereof derived from an Hebrew word, and J-filver from a word of her own language. Thus then is Britanny burthensd with many titles vnder one trust, and these are the ascriptions, causes and exceptions, as far as we are able to gather: all which must give place to that which is to follow out of the painful collections and judicious observances of our illustrious Antiquaire Master Camden. Whose words I will abridge, and by his good favour bring to finish this chapter, and further to satisfy the unsatisfied Reader.

to the analogie or proportion of their speech, people & names, upon Regions and countries; so much rather their demonstrations from these people and in dwellers. So seventy was named from the Jews, Britain from the Medes, Ponia of the Persians, Scythia of the Scythians, &c. And why not then by the authority of Martial, Juvenal, Ausonius, Procopius, and in old inscriptions first by the Brittain themselves, BRITTA, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITVVS, from BRIT, or BRITH, from whence say one being of that nation might be termed NATVS BRITTO, as it seems so inferi'd in Saint Mary the Aunne of Rome? the Saxons likewise they called the Britains Brioðr, and Wicthindane the Saxons wrote where nameth the Brittainer Britze, for that the word BRIT is doubtlesse the Primitive, from whence BRITO is descended, and from whence the first glimpse of light leading to the word BRITAIN, seemeth to appeare. And that all nations denieth their names of that, whereas they either excelled others, or were knowne by from others, whether in regard of their first founders bene, as the Ionies of Iapane, the Iherosolites of Irael, the Canaanites of Canaan, or whether in respect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations; as the Iobites after the Hebrew Erymanthe because they were Mavens, the Hencites because they were flaytelles the Nomades for that they were breeders of Cattell, the Almaines for their excellent valour and manhood, the Frankens for being free; the Pannonians, as Dio conceiveth of their coats with clath-beries, the Aethiopsians of their blacke hue, and the Albanes because they were borne with white haire for so faith Solinus, that the colour of their heads gave name unto the people. Seeing then that these our Islanders were known and called by a name common to both them and their neighbours, Cimbrs or Cimmerians, and had no better mark to be differing myself and knownen from the bards, then by their custom of painting their bodies, wherof the most approved authors doe witness, as Caesar, Mela, Pliny, Martial and others; soe affirme that the Brittaines used to colour themselves with wood, called the Latine lignum (and Glais at this day with them dath gwynn bled) wherof I then should conceiue (with he) that they were called Britains from thence painted bodies; for what is this painted or coloured, in their ancient country speech is called BRITH. Neither let this Etymologie of Brittain seeme to be either harsh or absurd, forsooth the very words found aith, and the name also as an expressive image representeth the thing which in Etymologies are chiefly required for Brith, and Brit, also passing well accord. And the word of Brith among the Brittaines, importeth that the Britains were wader in wate painted, flamed, dyed, and coloured, as the Latine poets describe them: having their bache pike or richly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them. From which colours and way of painting, the ancient Brittaines; as beehindeth had their names, and as yett in way among the Welsh. And this is certain that a Brittain as he is called in the Brytish tongue BRITHON, and as BRITO came of BRITH, so did BRITANNIA, so was as I sidore fash took the name from a word of their native nation: for what time the ancient Greeces (that first gave name to this Iland) either as voyers or merchants, travelled into other remote and farre distant countries (as Eratosthenes reporteth) learned from the inhabitants themselves, or els of the Gauls which spake the same language that their native was called Brith and Brithon: They then onely the word BRITH, added TANIA, which in the Greeke Languages betokeneth a REGION, and wherof they made a compound name wiche is that is the BRITONS-LAND. And that this is so, the countries also lying in the West part of the world, as Mauretania, Lusitania, and Aquitaine, also sufficiently conuince; for the Greecians bring the first Surveyors of these regions, of Mauritania, from Sertor, who was called Numidia, made Mauritania, of Lulius the sonne of Calpas, Lusitania, and of Aquitania, as two Carnotus is of opinion called the country Aquitaine, as also Tardennia, and Balthania. Prouiders in Spain, maye arise from the Turdi and Bati, these possessors. And that this manner of composition is well vsual in the names of countries, yett see: For came not Ireland by composition of the Irish word Eriu? Did not Angle terre arise together, of an Enneth and Enneth-lonian word, which with them betokeneth a plant, and was not Danish compounded of Dan and the Dutch word March, which signifies a bound or limit. Neither have we cause to wonder at this Greek addition Tania, seeing that S. Hieron. in his questions upon Genesis proved out of most ancient Authors, that the Greeks inhabited along the sea coasts and Iles of Europe thenceforth as far as to this our Island. Let us read, saith he, Varro's book of Antiquities, and those of Silius Capito, as also the Greek writer Phileon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall find, that the Greeks well knew, and all the sea coasts of the whole world, to have been taken up with Greek colonists, who, as I said before from the mountains Amans and Taurus even to the British Ocean possessed all the parts along the sea side. And verily that the Greeks arrived in that our region, viewed and considered well the five and nature thereof, there will be no doubt our question made: if we observe what Athenas hath written concerning Phileon Tantomines who was in Britain in the year one hundred and sixty before Christ's coming: if we call to remember the altar with an inscription unto Vlysses in Greek letters, erected in Caledonia as Scinius saith, and lastly if we mark what Pytheas before the time of the Romans here, hath delivered and written as touching the distance of Thule from Britain. For who had not determined unto the Greeks, Britain, Thule, the Belgick countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greek ships had not entered the British and German Ocean, sea, and related the description thereof unto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thence you came to the knowledge of five days sailing beyond

Britain, and yet some of the Greeks had borne it the same?
Who ever told them of Scandia, Burgos and Negroni, out of which men may sail into Thule? And these names seem to have been better known unto the most ancient Greeks, then either to Pliny or to any Roman. (Vergil. Melas-siphich) that Thule was much mentioned and returned in Greek writers: Pliny likewise writeth thus; Britain an Island famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of us. By this means therefore, so many Greek words have crept into the British, French, and withal, into the Belgick or Low-Dutch language. And of Lazarus Baynus and Budnus do make their want and glory in this, that their French-men have been of old nations that is, lawes: and Judsons of the Greeks, granting their reason upon few French words of that Island, which receive some marks and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrianus there is yeth no less, because in the Belgick words there be certainly Greek Erymologies: then may the Britains make their boast in whose language many words there be derived from the Greeks. Thus saith Mr. Camdens judgement for Britannia.

Which name we find first mentioned by Polybius the Greek historian, who lived and traveled with Scipio thorow most parts of Europe about 265. years before the birth of Christ. And after him Athenas a Greek author of good account, and before the yeere of grace 179. mentioneth the name of Britaine, and that upon this occasion: King Hieron, his father, framing a ship of such huge size and burden, as was admirable to the world, was much troubled for a tree, whereof he might make the maine mast: which at last with much ado was found in Britaine, by the direction of a Swineherd:
and by Philas Tantomines the Mechanick counted into Scellie, whereby that want was sufficiently supplied. To this let not the Criticks from Caesar say, that Britaine brought forth neither Beech nor Firre, as he in his list book of commentaries affirmeth (if by fagus he meane the Beech; seeing that the same kind doth most plentifully grow in all parts of this Island, and the Firre-trees for masts in the North west of Scotland upon the banks of the Loagh arichte of such great height and thicknesse, that at the root they beare 28.
handfuls about, and the bodies mounted to 90. foot of height they beare at that length 20. inches Dimetres, as hath been measured by some in communion, & so certified to his Majesty: and at this present growing upon the lands of the right worthy Knight Sir Alexander Hayes his Majesty's principal Secretary for Scotland.

But among the Latine Writers Lucrinius was the first that before Caesar mentioneth Britaine in these verses:
*Nam quid Britanniam celum deferre potamus,
Et quid in Aegypto est, quid mundi claudat Axis:
Ite for the difference in the spheres where Britanes Summe doth goe
From Egypt's Clome, wherein Charles waine is said to draw so low.*

(8) Other names hath this Island borne termed by, and that either by way of note for his situation, as Insula Cerasi, the Island in the Sea, so written in the first or paradis made against Venerius Bassus, and by Clandian confirmed, whose verses (saith hee) the azure Sea doth wash. And in a very ancient manuscript it is found written, Insula florum, an Island of flowers, for the abundance of Graine therein growing: as also for his situation to the Romans, hath bene called by Aegyptus, the Romane World, and by her owne Historian Gildas, Romana: for being first subdued by them, the very name of servitude (saith he) stucke fast to the Isle. And Properius Aquinas in expresse words callith it, the Romane Island, and so did the South-sea fishers when the flames of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperours were by lightning overthrown, who prophesied, that an Emperour should arise out of their familie, that should find a Pro-consul to the Romane Island. Upon the like cause of conquest and subjection we read in Ammian, that what time the Island had assaid a dangerous revolt in the reigne of Valentinian the Emperor, Theodosius as then Governor of Britaine, reducing them under their wonted obedience, in honor of Valentinianus, caused the Island to be called VALENTI-TIA, which name notwithstanding died either with or, immediately after the death of the said Emperour.

(9) But about the same time, when as by Gods decree the Romans fulnesse was come to the wane, and the greatness of their glory did abate by the downfall of that one Empire many Kingdomes beganne to arise, and to have their Rulers, Lawes, and Limits of themselves. Among the rest, that Island Britaine ther-lie came to be divided into three several Kingdomes, and each of them to retain an absolute power in their owne dominions, and known by their feutall and proper names. The first was Scotland from Scottis, and that from Seythia, as the best supposeth, whose Southerne borders was the famous Wall from Carlisle to Newcastle, and from thence the enemie tract of all that Northerne promontorie was called Scotia, or Scotland. The second was Cambria, or as called Wales, situated in the West of this Island, inclining those waste mountaines with a ditch drawn from Basingwerk in Flintshire in the North, to the mouth of Iffe neere Brittoll in the South, so separated by great offe the Mertic King. And the third was Angle-land, the East, the most fruitful, and best of the Island, lying coasted with the French and German Seas, so named when the vinted Heptarch of the Saxons was ruled by King Egbert, who by his edict dated at Winchester, Anno 819.
commanded the same to be called Angle-land, according to the name of the place from whence his ancestors the Angle-Saxons came, which was out of the continent part of Denmarke, lying betwixt Island and Hollands, where to this day the place retaineth the name Englun. And therefore Calpurne is to be rectified, that would have the name from Lucene Angula, and Gorgopus, of good Anglers: either from Pope Gregorie his attribute of Angell-like faces; or from others that would faineit from Angula the Giant-like brother to Danau; or force it from Angulus Orbis.

(10) Neither indeed was it called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane; but with Angle-land, retained still the names both of Alban and Britaine, as in a Saxon Charter made by King Edgar the tenth in succession from Egbert, and no less then one hundred forty and nine yeeres after this Edict is seene, where in the beginning he stitheth himselfe thus: Ego Edgar totius Albionis Reginis, &c. And in the end of the same charter thus: Edgar Rex totius Britannia. *Domoc-

Neither did William the Conquerour attempt to alter it, it ſtanding beſide ſo Angelike in his cares, accounting himſelfe moſt happy to be King of ſo worthy a Kingdome: the glorie whereof is further enlarged by the ranking of Chriſtian nations, affirmed in their generall Councils, wherein England is accounted the fifth, and hath place of preſidencie before kingdomes of larger territories.

CHAPTER III

T is not to be doubted, but that this Iſland with the Fruiſerfall was repleniſhed with people, immediately after that men began to be multiplied vpon the earth, even in the daies of the former Patrimony, and long before the Flood of Noah, as ſundry ancient

Writers have related. And ſurely if we conſider in thoſe firſt ages of the world the long life of man (the only means to multiplication) and the worlds continuance for one thouſand fix hundred fifty and fix yeeres before it was deſtroyed, we ſhall eaſily yeeld, that every Countrey and corner of the earth was plentifully peopled and inhabited. And ſo much doe the Sacred Scriptures intimate vnto vs, where, by the Prophet Iſay it is ſaid, Thus ſaith the Lord, that created heaven: God himſelfe, that framed the earth, and made it: he hath prepared it; he created it not in vaine; he formed it to be inhabited.

(2) But when the wrath of GOD was executed vpon the world for ſinne, and all over-whelmed with a Flood of waters, the whole earth thereby became altogether vnpeopled, paſſim perſus only with the breed-retraced creatures ſaved in the floating Arche: Whole Port or Hauens was the mountaine of Ararat in Armenia: whence, with the bleſſing of procreation, mankind againe began to be multiplied vpon the earth; and from the confuſion of Babels building, to be ſcattered by Tribes and Countries, according to the diſeritie of Languages, into diuers parts and Countreies of the world, giuing names to the places where they ſtated, according to the names of their Princes, or chiefe Commanders. Amongſt whom the ſonnes of Iapheth the eldeſt ſonne of Noah (whom Moſes declarcth to haue peopled the Iſles of the Gentiles) betooke themſelves into Europe, theſe were the parts of the world: as Sem did into Aſia, and Cham into Africa: whoſe poſterities accordingly diſperſed Iſſephus in his firſt Book of Antiquities hath both branched into their ſeverall diuiſions, and reduced them to their firſt roots and originals.

(1) Now that the Iſles of the Gentiles mentioned by Moſes, were theſe Europe, all learned men conſeſſe: and therefore thoſe eſpecially of Britannie and Scythia, as Wulfangus Muſculus is of opinion. And that Europe ſell to perſus portion, Iſſephus and Iſidore doe agree: who affirme his off-ſpring to haue inhabited from the Mount Taurus all Europe Northward, ſo farre as the Friſiſh Seas, leaſing names both to places and people. And Gildas, as Netherſenſis witneſſeth, and Polydore Vergil granteth, will haue this Iſland inhabited even from the Flood. But of theſe ancient things, ſaith ſchylus Myſter, no man can write certainly, it depending only vpon coniectures, and the ſame by heare-ſay, and flying reports of priuate men, as Oregon ſpeaketh.

(5) And that of theſe Gomerians were alſo the Gauls, learned Ciceroneſus that brighteſt lampe to all Antiquities, out of Iſſephus and Zenarus infinitely hath obſerued; who that they were alſo called Cimbri, he propoeth out of Cicero, & Appian Alexandrinus; that thoſe Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainly termeth Gauls, where he ſaith C. Marius repelled the armies of the Gauls entering in great numbers into Italy: which, as all Hiftorians witneſſe, were the Cimbrii, And the Habermans of their king Belodiggedus was Aqua Sextia, where Marius put them to flight, doth ſhew the ſame: whereon was engrauen in ſtrange characters BELTROSCHIMBROS; as alſo the testimony of Lucan doth no leſſe, who calleth the Ruffine hired to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Livy and Plutarch in the life of Marius affirme to be a Gaul. They alſo who vnder the conduct of Brennus ſpoiled Delybe in Greece, were Gauls, as all writers with one voice agree, and yet that theſe were named Cimbri, Appian in his Iſthyria doth 2587 and after the universal flood 1231. in the eighteenth yeere of Itlo his Prebend in the land of Israel, and before the incarnation of Christ our Saviour one thousand fiftie nine. This Brute is brought from the ancient Travay by descent, yea and from the persons of the heathen deified Gods: as that he was the sonne of Sylanus, who was the sonne of Africanus, the sonne of Aeneas, the sonne of Achilles by Venus the Goddess, and daughter to Apollon their greatest account. And if Pliny and Varro hold it praiseworthy to challenge descents (though fallily) from famous personages, whereby, as they lay appeareth an inclination to vertue, and a valorous conceit to perfwade unto honor, as spring from a race divine and powerful: then by all meanes let vs listen to him of Mammouth, who hath brought his Nation to ranke in degree with the rest of the Gentiles, which claime themselves to be the Generation of the Gods.

(12.) But why do I ascribe the worke to him, as the Author, lieth he professeth himselfe to be but the translator of that history out of the British tongue, which Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford brought out of Normandie, and deliuered vnto him? For the further confirmation thereof, and more credit to his story, Henry of Huntingdon, who lived in the time of king Stephen, and wrote likewise the history of this land, bringeth the line of Brute from Aeneas the Troiane, and his marriage and conquest to happen in the time of Itlo his Prebend in the land of Israel: as Geoffrey of Arthur hath also done: not taking (as some thinke) any thing thereof from him, but rather out of an ancient booke intituled De Origine Reppum Britanniarum, found by himselfe in the library of the Abbey of Bee, as he traueiled towards Rome: which history began at the arrivall of Brute and ended with the acts of Cadwalader, by a treatise of his owne inditing, bearing the same title, hath been compared, and found in all things agreeing with our vulgar history, as industrious Lambert affirmeth himselfe to have seen. And Nennius is said by the writer of the reformed history, to bring these Britaines from the race of the Troians, foure hundred yeeres before that Geoffrey wrote: yea and long before Ninnius also, Taliesin a British Poet in an Ode called Hanes, of Taliesin has coured of life, in these words, Mia deylhyn yna at Weddion Treia, that is, I came hither to the Remnants of Troy.

(13.) That William of Malmesbury (who wrote in the daies of King Henry the first) was before him of Mammouth: is most certaine; yet doth he make mention of Arthur a Prince (saith he) deserving rather to be aduanced by the truth of records, than abused by false imputation of fables; by the only prop and upholder of his country. And Beda his ancient also, nameth Ambrosius Aurelianus to be King of the Britaines, long before that Geoffrey was borne: So was Brennus mentioned by Lucy, Bellinus, (Of the be Brilgus) by Isidore, Cassiodorus by Cassius, Conuincion by Suetonius; Armorius by Martial; Lacius by Eutropius; Cael, Comlanctus, Carasius, and others by Eutropius and Petrid Dionysius; and Idena by Nicompert, Amberg, and Sacrales. These are the affirmatiues that give countenance to the Archdeacon of Mammouth translation, and credit to Brutes conquests and successours, yea and Iohn Harding his Herald, in his home-spun poetry, can easily emblaze his armes to be Gales, charged with two lions rampant endorsed Ore; and the same to be borne by the Kings of Troy. And his banner displayed at his entrance is said to be Peri a Diana of gold litchel, crowned, and unthroned, the same that Aeneas bare, when he entered the land of the Latines. But the censures of these relations I leave to the best liking of iudicious Readers, only wishing them to be vnlike the inhabitants vnder the rocks of the Carazats of Nilus, whereof Cicero and Antoninus make mention, who were made deaf by the continuall noise of the fall of Nilus: left by the found and loud voices of these writers, the exceptions of others can not be heard, which from the fullness of their penes I will likewise declare, without offence, I hope, vnto any.

(15.) Whereupon Gildas our ancientest home-borne writer, (cited and in whole sentences followed by venerable Beda, who termeth him the Britaines historiographer) in this of Brute is silent, and in his lamentable passions neuer dreames of him, but as one overwhelmed with griefe bewaileth the wickednesse of the time wherein he lived, who was borne, as himselfe saith, in the forty fourth yeere after the Saxons first entrance, about the yeere of Christ incarnation 493, and died, as Kale citeth out of Polydore, the yeere of our redemption 780. Ninnius also another ancient writer, who lived about eight hundred yeeres since, taking in hand the Chronicles of the Britaines, complaineth that their great Matters and doctores could giue him no assistance, being ignorant of skill, and had left no memoriall of things passed, nor committed their acts vnto writing, whereby hee was enforced to gather what he had gotten from the axons and Chronicles of the holy fathers. Beda likewise, whose history ended in anno 733, beginneth no sooner then with Iulus Caesar entrance, notwithstanding he had the assistance of the Abbat Aldwin, who was brought vp vnder Theodore Archbilhop of Canterbury, and had begun the history of this land with most diligent search from the records of the kingdomes of Kent and the prouinces adjoining; as also being further assisted by Daniel Bilhop of the West-Saxons, who first him all the records that were to be found of the same Bilhoprick, South-Saxons, and the Isle of Wight. The like helpe had he from Abbat Eborac, for the country of East-Angles; from Cymbertes and the brethren of Leasing for the prouince of Mertie, and East-Saxons. And from the brethren of Lundisfarnum, for the country of Northumberland; besides his owne paines in collections, knowledg and experience: all which he did digest and historically compile, and before the publication thereof sent it to king Cenwalde at that time reigning in Northumberland, to be approved or corrected by his most learned skill: yet in none of these found he that history of Brute nor his successours, which as some would haue it, was then vnknown to the world.

(16.) After him Eborac, as William of Malmesbury calleth him, or rather (as he writeth himselfe) Patrias Confessors Gregorius Ethelwardus, a diligent searcher of antiquities, a reuerend person, and of the blood roiall, wrote foure bookes, briefly comprising the whole history of England, from the beginning of the world vnto the time of king Edgar wherein he lived, of Brute nor his Britaines speaketh a word; but palleth with silence to the Romans and Saxons. What need I to cite Ingulphus, who died anno 1109. Florentius of Worcester, that flourished in the daies of King Henry the first, or William of Malmesbury, that wrote vnto the end of his raigne; all of them writers before Geoffrey of Mammouth, but none of them mentioning this story of Brute. This moued William of Newburgh, borne (as himselfe saith) in the beginning of King Stephens raige, & living at one and the same time with this Archdeacon of Mammouth, too too bitterly to inquire against him and his history, euen so soone as the same came forth: as in the proeme of his booke is to be seen. And that the words are his and not our own, take them from him as they lie. In these our days (saith he) there is a certain writer risen up, devising fictions and tales of the Britains out of the vague humors of his own brain, extolling them far above the valorous Macedonians, or worthy Romans; his name is Geoffrey, and may well assume the surname Arthur, whose tales he hath taken out of the old fables of the Britains, and by his own invention augmented with many contrivances, fusing them over with new colour of the Latine tongue, and hath mingled them into the body of an history. Admiring further to dwell under the name of antient prophetic, deceitful conceits and foretellings of one Merlin (a wizard), whereunto also he addeth a great deal of his own. And againe: In his booke which he hath intitled the Brittaines History, how shamefully, and with a bold countenance he doth lie, there is no man that readeth therein can doubt, unless he hath no knowledge at all in ancient true histories; for having not learned the truth of things; indeed, he admisteth without discretion and judgement, the same and contraries of fabul. J. faber et faber (saith he) what great matters this fellow hath forged of the Brittaines ailes before the Empire and coming in of Cæsar. Thus farre Parvus.

But I know the answer to this so great an accusation: namely, that this William making his vato David ap Owen Gwyneth, Prince of North-wales, for the Bishoprick of Saint Asaph, after the death of Geoffrey, and thereof failing, falsely scandalized and impudently belied that most reverend man. Which surely had not been a great fault, and might of vs be beleaved, had not others of the same rank and time, verified alinnch.

(17) For Syllaber Gerdal, commonly called Cambricus, that flourished in the same time with the said author, made no doubt to terme it The fabulous story of Geoffrey. The like is verified by John Wearhead Abb. bot of Saint Albans, a most indolent man that wrote in anno 1440, who in his Gromatic giurth sentence of this history as followeth. The whole defense of Brutus (saith he) is rather poetical, then historical, and for duers reasons is built more upon opinion then truth. First because there is no mention thereof made in the Roman story, either of his killing his father, or of the said birth, or yet of his coming to the throne. Secondly, for that Alcanine begat no such sonne as he had for his proper name Syllaber by any apparent Author: for according to them, he begat only one sonne, and his name was Julius, from whom the family of the Iulii took their beginning. And thirdly, Syllaber Posthumus, whom perhaps Geoffrey meaneth: was the sonne of Aeneas by his wife Lavinia, and he begetting his sonne Aeneas in the thirty eighth year of his reign, ended his life by cause of natural death. The kingdom therefore now called England, was not heretofore, as many will have, named Britaine of Brutus the sonne of Syllaber. Wherefore it is a vaine opinion and ridiculous to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of the challenge: for it is manhood only that ennobles a nation; and it is the mind alwaym perfect understanding, and nothing else, that gaineth gentility to a man. And therefore Seneca writeth in his Epistles to Plato; that there is no King but he came from vessels, and no vessel but he came from Kings. Wherefore to conclude, let this suffice (saith he) that the Brittaines from the beginning of their nobility have been courageous and valiant in fight, that they have subdued their enemies on every side, and that they utterly refuse the yoke of servitude.

(18) Now that William of Newburgh, had sufficient cause (say some) to exclaim against the fancies of Merlin, and the fictions of Arthur, is made manifest in the sequel, not only by the decree of that obdurate Council of Trent, wherein was inhibited the publication of Merlin's books; but also (in effect) by the statute enacted the fifth yeere of our last decaided Queen Elizabeth of blessed and immortal memorie, wherein is forbidden such fantastical predictions, upon occasions of Armes, Fields, Battles, Badges, Cognizances, or Signets, such as Merlin flood most upon; and likewise William of Malmbury flood most upon; being the only prope that upheld his country, deferred rather to be advanced by truth, then abused with fables wherewith that story is most plentifully stored. And also that Wearhead had reason to account Brutus acts and conquests, to be rather poetical then any waies warranted by the records of truth, appeareth by the silence of the Roman writers therein, who name neither Brutus nor his father in the genealogie of the Latine Kings: and if any such were, (saith the contradictees) how could they be ignorant of the vintime death of their king, Paine by the hand of his namall (though in this act vinturally) sonne? or what should move them being so laith in their own commendations, to be thus silent in their Brutus worthinesse, that with ten thousand dispersed Troians warred in victoriously in Gallia, conquered a kingdom of Giants; subdued a most famous land, reigned gloriously, and left the fame to his posterity; none of them, either in prose or poetry once handled, but left to delinay to be preferred by a long enising means, or to perish in oblivion for ever? And surely this moved the whole lenate of great Clerks to give sentence, that neuer any such Brutus reigned in the world; such as were Boccaccio's, Hadrion Janus, Polydore, Buchanan, Guesard, Malblanc, Palsgrave, and others.

(19) Yea, and there are some Critics that faine would take advantage from the defenders of Brutus history themselves, as from Sir John Fry, that produceth many vaine examples of the original of other nations; which granted, (say they) doth no waies confirm the truth or certainty of our owne; neither is it any honour to derive these Brittaines from the fume of such conquered people as the Troians were. Hamfray Lloyd likewise denying absolutely the derivation of the Brittaines name from Brutus, and bringing it from two compounded words, (as we have said) doth thereby weaken the credit of his conquest of this land to their understanding, as also the catalogue of his successors, which are said to reign successively for many hundred of yeeres after him. And another indolent Briggs writer, having the helpe of two most ancient Briggs copies, the collections of Cadwallader of Carnarvan, their owne Bartholomew third-yeeres visitation, and twenty seven authors of good account, (all of them cited in the preface of his Chronicle) besides his helpe had in the offices of records for this realm, yet ascending no higher then to the person of Cadwallader, Prince of Wales, whose reign was in the yeere of Clovis incarnation 682, and no lesse then one thousand seven hundred twenty and five yeeres, after that Brutus is said to come into this land, doth not warrant (say they) the story that is included betwixt, but rather even the same is encreased with many doubtfull vncertainties, and so left disputable by the said compiler himselfe; as namely whether that this Cadwallader whom the Brittaines claime to be their king, be not the same Cledwallader whom the Saxons would have theirs; both living at one time, both in all alike, and names neere, both abandoning their kingdomes, both taking the habit of religion, both dying in Rome, both buried in one Church, say, say they, in one Sepulchre. The like he bringeth of the Brittaines law, and the Saxons law, in the like coherences of names, acts, denotions, and deaths: so that this history of Brutus carrieth not so smooth a current for passage as is wilbed, nor is that Gardanus not so easily valioled.

Again, the Reformer of the British history himselfe, although he hath written one whole chapter in defence of Geoffrey Malmbury, and straint to make his booke authentical, complaining often and accusing learned and vapariall Camden severall times, for blowing a way fixity of the Brittaines Kings with one blast: yet when he compareth the generations with the time, is forced thus to write: From Porrex to Mynogen are reverts one Kings in a lineall descent, and but yeeres many two: now divide 92. by 21. and you shall find, that children beget children, and these (saith he) by George Owen Harry in his booke of pedegrees dedicated to his Majesty appeareth to be one lineall descent, besides three or four Brutus was mentioned in the genealogie of the Latine Kings.

Never any such king in the world as Brutus. Seneca, Palsgrave, Buchanan, Janus, &c. He is a Cretian argument.

No honor to the Britains in the descent from the Troians.

A further dissent of Brutus history.

As he should have said, And yet goeth further: Though the Scripture (saith hee) alleges Iudah, Hezron, Salomon, and Ezechiah, to be but young when they began their summes, which (as Rabbi Isaac) might be at thirteenth yeeres of age: And although Saint Augustine say, that the strength of youth may beget children young; and Hierome bringeth instance of a boy that at ten yeeres of age beget a child: yet this doth not helpe to excuse the multiplying of yeeres for the British Kings above mentioned.

And yet goeth further: Though the Scripture (saith hee) alleges Iudah, Hezron, Salomon, and Ezechiah, to be but young when they began their summes, which (as Rabbi Isaac) might be at thirteenth yeeres of age: And although Saint Augustine say, that the strength of youth may beget children young; and Hierome bringeth instance of a boy that at ten yeeres of age beget a child: yet this doth not helpe to excuse the multiplying of yeeres for the British Kings above mentioned.

Thus far John Lewis: and for the exceptions made against Brute: wherein I have altogether vied the words of others; and will now (without offense, I hope) adde a supposal of mine owne, seeing I am fallen into the computation of times, which is the only touch-stone to the truth of histories, especially such as are limited by the bounds of the sacred Scriptures, as this for Brutes entrance is. And that the same cannot be so ancient (supposing it were never so certain) as the vulgar opinion hitherto hath held, the circumstance of time, to my seeming, sufficiently doth prove.

(20) For Brutes conquest and entrance are brought by his Author to fall in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Priesthood in the Land of Israel, and so is fitted into a computation that cannot erre. Now the eighteenth yeere of Heli's government, by the holy Scriptures most sure account, is set in the yeere of the worlds creation 2887. after the universall flood 1231. and before the birth of our blessed Saviour 1079. yeeres. Brute then living in this forlaid time, was foure decades vanto the conquered Trojans, (as he of Menelaus hath laid downe) which were Aeneas, Ascanius, Syllus, and himselfe: so that by these generations successe in order, the very yeere almost of Troys destruction may certainly be pointed out and known: which in searching hath bene found so doubtful, that by some it hath bene thought to be a mere fable. Yet with more recurrence to antiquitie observed, let vs cast and compare the continuance of these foure generations vanto Brutes Conquest, not shortning them with Baruch, to be but ten yeeres to an age; neither lengthning them with Josephus, who accounteth one hundred and seauenty yeeres for a generation: but with more indifference let vs with Herodotus, who wrote nearer their times, allow thirty yeeres for a succession, as hee accounteth in his second booke. Now foure times thirty make one hundred and twenty, the number of yeeres that these foure Princes successively did live: by which computation likewise measured by Scripture, the ruination of Troy fell in the thirteenth yeere of Gedeons government in Israel, and was the yeere after the worlds creation 2768. But the authoritie of Clemens Alexandrinus, alleged out of Menander, Perjanemus, and Letus, doth breith that time of Troys destruction, and placeth it fully two hundred and thirty yeeres after, even in the reignes of King Salomon: for in his first booke Stromata thus he writeth: Menelaus from the overthrow of Troy came into Phoenicia, at that time when Hiram King of Tyre gave his daughter in marriage vnto Salomon King of Iudah. Where, by him we see, that Troys ruines and Salomons reignes fall both vpon one time. And so Brute hath lost of his antiquity, by this account, 230. yeeres, and entred not in Heli's Priesthood, but rather in the viurpation of Iudahs Kingdome, by Athalia, and in the yeere of the world 3118.

monie of Josephus be true, then fals Troys destruction about the twentieth yeere of Iuss reignes ouer Iudah, which was the yeere of the worlds creation 3143: wherunto if we adde one hundred and twenty yeeres for the foure decades before specified, then will Brutes conquest of this land fall with the twelfth of Iothams reignes in the Kingdome of Iudah, which meets with the yeere of the worlds continuance 3263. And so hath he againe lost of his antiquity no lesse then 375. yeeres.

(22) And yet to make a deeper breach into Brutes storie, and to set the time, in a point so vncertaine, as from which neither circle nor line can be true drawn; Menonthe the Historian Priest of Egypt, in his second booke cited by Josephus, affirmeth that the Israelites departure from Egypt was almost a thousand yeeres before the warres of Troy. If this be so (as it seemeth Josephus alloweth it so) and one hundred and twenty yeeres more added, for the foure decades above mentioned, the number will fall about the yeere of the worlds creation 3630. long after the death of Alexander the Great, and Greeces Monarch. By which account the great supposed antiquity of Brute, is now lessened by leuen hundred fifty and two yeeres, and the time so scameled betwixt his and Cesars entrance, that two hundred forty six yeeres only remaine: a time by much too short for seauenty two Princes, which successively are said to reigne each after others, and from Brute to Cesar recorded to haue swayed the regall Scepter of this land.

(23) But vnto these objections I know the answer will be ready; namely, the discrieties of Scriptures account, being so sundrie and different, that the storie of Brute cannot thereby be touched, but still standeth firme vpon it selfe. Indeed I must confesse, that from the first Creation, to the yeere of Mans Redemption, the learned Hebrewes, Greekes, and Latines, differ much, and that not only each from others, but even among themselves so firre, that there can be no indifferent reconciliation made, as by these severall computations may be seene, as followeth:

Hebrewes:	Real Seder-Holam	3518.
	Talmudistiles	3784.
	New Rabbinis	3760.
	Rabbi Nathan	3740.
	Rabbi Levi	3786.
	Rabbi Moses Germainy	4078.
	Josephus	4192.
Greekes:	Metheodorus	5000.
	Eusebius	5190.
	Theophrastus Antioch	5476.
Latines:	Saint Hieronym	3941.
	Saint Augustin	3317.
	Isidore	5210.
	Origenus	5190.
	Alphonsus	5934.

And yet doe these disagreements helpe little the Obiectors if this be considered, that the maine foundation of these discrieties consisteth chiefly in the first world before the Flood, wherein it is manifest, that the reputed Septuagint addeh to the Hebrew Original five hundred eighty and six yeeres. And from the Flood to Abraham birth, is accounted two hundred and five yeeres more then Moses hath. As likewise the like is done in the latter times: for from the Captiuitie of Babylon to the death of Christ, one hundred thirty and seven yeeres are added, more then the Sunnes course hath measured: so that it seemeth the differences were not great for the times of Heli, Salomon, nor Iudahs Kings, in whose reignes Brute is brought to people and possesse this land. But leauing these discrieties, and to come to a certaine, let vs calculate the yeeres of the holy historie according as Fun-Tun, Beroldus and sundry other Theologicall Chronologers Brute conquested Iudah betwixt 3118. and 3143. 1. King. 15. 23.

Menonthe cited by Josephus, affirmeth that the Israelites depart from Egypt about the twelfth of Troys by Josephus account, 1000. years. Brute conquested Iudah after Alexander the great.

nations have done; who from the Scripture will have account, to tie the stories of times together, that like to a golden chain, the links are fastened each to other, and the whole so compact, that a year is not missing from the fall of man, unto the full time of his redemption.

(24) First then from the Creation to the Flood are reckoned yeeres 1656. gathered by a triple account, from the ages, begettings, and deaths of the fathers. The like is hence observed for four hundred twenty and seven yeeres, that is, to the seaventh fifth of Abraham's life, wherein God began to see the times accounted in holier summes; for T'erah, the first recorded Idolater, was the last in honour that had his Summe commensured by mans life. And now the bounds of time tie the Promise to Abraham, to bee before the Law four hundred and thirty yeeres, as the Apostle to the Galatians affirmeth. From the Law to the building of Solomon Temple, and that in the fourth yeere of his reign, were yeeres four hundred and eighty; and from that foundation, to his death, were thirte six yeeres: for his whole reign was forty. From his death and Kingdomes dissolution, unto the burning of that Temple, which was executed in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babel, were yeeres three hundred and ninety, as by the daies of Ezekiel's liege and sleepe appeareth in the second and fifth verses of his fourth Chapter. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Jewish captivity, were yeeres fifty and one, for the whole time of Babel's bondage contained seventy yeeres, as Jeremy 25. 11. whereof nineteen were expired; and fifty one remaining unto the first yeere of Cyrus their deliverer, whom the Lord in that regard calleth his anointed 1. Isay. 45. 1. In the first yeere of whose Monarchie he published an Edict for the returne of the Jews and new building of their Temple, as in the books of Chronicles and of Ezra is scene. And from this first yeere and proclamation of King Cyrus, unto the last yeere and death of Christ our Saviour, the great yeere of Iudaea, the acceptable time, wherein he tread the vinepress alone; to the finishing of the ceremonies, the taking away of sinne, the reconciling of iniquity, the bringing in of everlasting righteousness, to the sealing up of vision and prophesie, and to the anointing of the most holy; were yeeres four hundred and ninety, as the Prophet Daniel from the Angel Gabriel receiveth, and unto vs hath delivered Dan. 9. 2. 4. all which added together make the number to be three thousand nine hundred and threescore yeeres. And by this last computation, I have accounted Brutes story, as all others wherein I shall bee occasioned to speake.

(25) Lastly, if from among these misty cloudes of ignorance no light can be gotten, and that we will needs have our defects from the Trains; may we not then more truly derive our blood from them through the Romans, who for the space of foure hundred threescore and six yeeres were planted amongst vs? in which continuance it is most certaine, they tooke of our women to be their wives, and gave their women to be wives unto vs, seeing that some of their Emperors did like themselves, and from whose blood, both Scots, the Britaines Ambrusius lineally descended. And if beauty and parts be the intigaters vnto loue, as in the first world we see it was, no doubt then the features of the Britains were moose Angles vnto the Romans, whose faces even in those times were accounted to be angelicall, and whose personages as yet, are respected as the best if not better then any other in the world. But that the Romans themselves descended from the Trains, or Aeneas should be the roote of the Italian family, how foucer the fictions of Poets as a spring tide haue flowed from the fullness of their penes, yet Tacitus their best writer accounteth those things not far vnlike to old fables, wherein he judgeth that Nero to win credit before the Consuls, and to get reputation in the glory of eloquence vnderooke the pleading of the Thucydides, declaring the Romans descended from Tris; and the Italy from the loines of Aeneas, which notwithstanding he censureth as is said. And Iosephus in the description of Nabhi sonnes and families, affirmeth that Rome was the Originall of the old Romans and he of Chon, and Chon, if he meane as he speakech. To conclude, (by what destiny I know not) nations desire their originals from the Trains; yet certaine it is, that no honour from them can be brought, whose city and fame stood but for six descentes, as vnder the reignes of Dardanus, Erichonius, Tros, Ilium, Laomedon, and Prismus, during which time they were thrice vanquished; twice by Hercules in the daies of Laomedon, and the third time raled by the rage of the Grecians in the reign of King Prismus, and the Trains themselves made as it were the skum of a conquered people. And therefore as Erasmus hath cast off their Trains King Prismus his sonne, Scotland their Scotia King Pharus daughter, Denmarke their Dana, Ireland their Hibern, and other Countries their Demi-gods; so let BRITAINES likewise with them disclaime their BRUTS, that bringeth no honour to forenamed a Nation, but rather cloudeth their glorie in the murders of his parents, and imbrutheth their descentes, as spring from Venus that lasciuious Adulteress.

Britains may more truly derive their descent from Tris by the Romans. Brutes took wives of the Romans, and they of the Britains. Isid. lib. 1. cap. 16. Gell. lib. 1.

Romans to be descended of the Trains is false. Tacit. ann. 12. 12.

Isid. lib. 1. 7. Rome the originall of the old Romans.

To have a descent from Tris, cannot be so honour to any Nation. Trains thrice vanquished.

Brute established the descent of the Britains.

THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE ANCIENT BRITAINES.

CHAPTER IV.

not so pleasing or acceptable as were to be wished, for

Asing thus farre spoken of the ancient Names of this famous Island, and of the Nations acknowledged to bee the first Planters and Possessors thereof; it remaineth that somewhat be mentioned of the Manners and Customes of those people and times, though that the cloudes of ignorance and barbarous incivillitie did then shadow and over-spread almost all the Nations of the earth; wherein I desire to lay imputation no further then is sufficiently warranted by most autentick Writers: and first from Cesar, who formeth of all the Romans discovered and described our ancient Britaines.

(2) Touching their persons: All the Britains (saith Cesar) used to dye themselves with woad, which giveth a blew colour upon them, and that maketh them more terrible to behold in battell. But Pomponius Mela therein cometh

carrying a stern and grim countenance, after the wonted heathenish manner: here we see (saith he) upon these desert walls, the very features of the Britains I dole, merely diabolical, and in number almost exceeding those of Egypt. So by Tasitus they are noted with the common custome of the Gentiles, which was that they fought for the direction of their Gods by the looking into the entrails of Beasts, yea and of men too; and that they honored the Altars of their Gods with the sacrifice and blood of such as they tooke captive in wars. And Plinius writing of Magick, saith, that in his daies the art thereof in Britaine was highly honored, and all the people thereunto so much devoted, yea and with all such complements of ceremonies in the same to be performed, that a man would thinke the Perfians had learned all their Magick skill from thence. Prisels and instructors had they, whereof the chief were called Druides, whose office was imploied about holy things, saith Cæsar for they had the managing of publike and private sacrifices, and to interpret and discusse matters of religion. Vnto them doe resort great numbers of young men to learne at their hands, and they be had in great reverence. For they determine almost all controversies, and matters in variance, as well publike as private. And if there happen any thing to be done almost, if there be any further committed, if there rise any controuersie concerning inheritance or bounds of lands, they take the matter into their power, and award either recompence or penalties in the case. And if there be any, be he private person, or be it corporation, that will not stand to their iudgement, they interdict him, which punishment among them is held most grievous. They that are so excommunicated are accounted in the number of the wicked and vagrantous: all men shun them, all men eschue their company and communication, left by conuersing with them, they should defile themselves and receive harme. If they demand law, they may not haue it: neither may they enioy any place of honor. Out all these Druides there is one Prime, which hath chiefe authority ouer them. When he is dead if there be any of therest that excelleth in worthinesse, he succeedeth: or if there be any equal, he is chosen by voices of the rest, and diuers times they strive for the sovereignty by force of armes.

These men at a certaine season of the yeece, in the borders of the Cæcarter (whose country is counted the middle of all Gallia) do sit together in a place hallowed, whereunto resort from all sides all such as haue any controuersies: and looke what is decreed and iudged by them, that they stand vnto. This order of discipline is thought to haue had beginning in Britaine, and from thence to haue been brought into Gallia. And at this day, they that are desirous to attaine this skill more exactly, do commonly repaire thither to learne it. These Druides customably are exempted from the wars, neither do they pay taxes and tallages with other folke: for they are privileged as from the warres, so from all other burthens. Allured with so great rewards, many euen of their owne accord, do register themselves in that order, and diuers are sent thither by their parents and kinsfolke. Where they are reported to learne a great number of verses by heart. Whereof it cometh to passe, that diuers continue twenty yeeres in learning. Neither do they thinke lawfull to put them in writing, whereas in all other things, for their accounts, as well publike as private, they vse the Greek letters.

This order they seeme (in mine opinion) saith he, to haue taken for two considerations: partly because they will not haue their discipline published among the common people; and partly because they will not that they which shall learne, trusting too much to their bookes, should haue the lesse regard of remembrance: in that it hapneth well nere to most men, that vpon trull of the helpe of their bookes, they are slacke in learning things by heart, and lesse care to beare them in mind. This is one of the chieft things that they labour most to beate into mens minds, that the Soules die not, but do after death passe from one to another: and hereby they thinke men should be most stirred vnto vertue, when the feare of death is nothing regarded. Also they dispute many other things: as of the flames, and of their moouings: of the bignesse of the world, and the earth: of the nature of things: of the strength and power of the goddes immortal: and do therein inbriute the youth. Vnto these Druides and their doctrine had Lucan the Poet relation in his first booke towards the end, where he writeth thus of them.

*Et vos barbarici ritus, moremque, fœderem

You (Druides) free from wars, with barbarous deuities Suffer from rites performe, and vncouth sacrifices.
High Mysteries of God, and Heavens, you only know
Or only erre therein. Where shady woods doe grow
There you repose, and teach thist Soules immortal be Nor sitst Erebus, nor Plutons Hell sitst
And, (of your Sages be forth) Death is no small dome,
But only Mid-way, first life past, and life to come.

Death (greatest feare of feeres) amates thoe with no terror.
Hence fly they many rash on pikes, and grisly death,
And fœrne boie minds, that stick to fœid remanng breath.

(9) These Britainers being merely barbarous, as most of the Western parts of the world then were, liued priuately to themselves with scarce any commerce, or encounter with any other nation: neither indeed were much known to forraigne people, for a long time. For the first notice of them extant, was by Polybius the Greek writer, that accompanied Scipio in his warres, about the yeece of the worlds creation 372 o. and two hundred and nine, before the birth of our Saviour Christ. Which Author nameth their Iland to be piteously floored with Tyune: but of other things therein is silent, saying that those parts which lay betwixt Tanis and Narbor bending Northward in his daies were vnkown and vncertaine, and therefore the reporters of them he held as dreamers. So doth Maister Camden another Polybius, & no way his inferior, account it a prodigall humor of credulity, to be persuaded that Hannibal, from the streets of Carthage sent to discouer the coasts of Europe, in the said expedition entred this Iland: or that Hannibal should war in this Iland, because Polybius in the Elogues of his tenth booke saith that he was inclosed within the streits of Britaine, which place is mistaken for the Strait in Italy: or that Alexander came from the East Indians, to Gades, and from thence into Britaine, though Cædrenus say, loosing all other writers are against it, or that Plyssus (ancient enough if he be that Elishah the sonne of Iacon, the fourth sonne of Israhel) should visit Britaine in his travels, whereof Strabon maketh doubt: though Salmus report that an Altar in Caeredonia was erected, and Plyssus in Greeke letters thereon inscribed. Which might very well be, for who doubteth but that the Greekes, in their vaine deuotions, did both build and sacrifice vnto their Gods, which they made of their worthiest men? and such Plyssus, (in regard of his farre sea-trauels) was had in speciall account among all navigators, why might not such monuments be reared, and his name inscribed, as farr as the Greeks travelled, though his person neuer came there?

The first Britons
coyned with

ent times, as that neither Thucydides nor Herodotus made mention of them: yet with much ado at last were heard of by the Grecians themselves; as Josephus affirmeth; And if the Gauls and Spaniards, (inhabitants in the continent) for many years together were utterly unknown to the worlds historiographers; shall we then think, that this remote land, and people then far from civility, were noted forth with marks of more certainty? surely to my seeming, nothing less: seeing that their next neighbours the Gauls knew not so much at what manner of men they were: none reporting thither, except some few merchants, and they no further, then upon the sea coasts, neither able to describe the bignesse of the land, the puissance of the inhabitants, their order for war, the laws that they used, the customs of the people, nor their haunts for the receipt of ships; all which Cæsar by diligent inquiry sought after, but could find no satisfaction till he had sent some purpoely to search it out.

(10) Neither is this their want of knowledge to be wondered at, seeing the intercourse of their trafficke was upheld by few meane commodities: for Strabo saith, that their merchandizing chiefly consisted in Ivory Boxes, Sheeres, Onches, Biers, and Bridles, Wreaths & Chains, with other conceits made of amber and glasse; for which notwithstanding they were compelled to pay customes and imposts unto Ossianus Angustus, as elsewhere shall be shewed.

(11) And as their commodities were very mean, so were their meanes either for exportation or importation very slender in those times; I meane their shipping. It is true, that some are of opinion, that Ships were first invented in these our Seas: but that this should be true, I have cause to doubt, that Art being long before inspired by God himselfe into the heart of Noah for making the Arke, and no doubt practised by that paterne of many others. But that the ancient Britaines had ships of reasonable use, though of simple Art, Cæsar testifieth, saying, that the keeles and ribs of their ships were of light wood, and covered over with leather: which kind the now-Brittaines call Carracks; and with them (saith Polybius) they did sail betwixt Britannie and Ireland, (which sea for roughnesse and danger may be compared with any other whatsoever) though the bulke of their vessels were but of some flexible wood, covered with the hides of buffles: and as long as they were sailing, so long did they abide from meat: whereby it seemeth they never sailed any great journeys. And of this their shipping Pliny also speaketh, and Lucan singeth, thus:

Premium cæna salæ, modestæq; cæmine paruum
Tæxiter in puppim, casq; induta iuvenæ,
Victoris parvus tumidum super emicat ensium:
Sic Vinctus flagrantis Pado, fuscq; Britannus, Navigat Oceano.

At first, of Ivory fallowes wreathed boughs, the ships
Small bulke is trimly trimd, and clad in bullocks hide:
Then, patient to be rul'd, on swelling waves the ships
Thru on the spacious Pæthos the Power Merchants glide,
And Brittain Pilots saile on surge of Ocean wide.

But after-times brought the Brittaines to more exquisite skill in navall affairs, infromch as the royal Navie of this Kingdome hath beene reputed (and so is at this day) not only the invincible walles of our owne, but the incredible terror of all other Kingdoms; which haue or shall enjoy our happie peace: and the adventures likewise of Merchants, and the skill of our Seamen, hath left no corner of the world vnsearcht.

(12) And their trafficke amongst the islands was not of much worth, in that, as Cæsar saith, the Cornes which they had were either of barley, or of iron rings fixed at a certain night, which they used for their munes. Of which kind some have asserted they have sene found and lately taken up in little cruets or pitchers of earth. But as times grew more civil, and trafficke more frequent, they shortly after stamped both silver and gold and thenceon the faces of their King, even in the daies of Iulius Cæsar, who was the first that had his owne stroke on the Romane Coynes. Many of these are amongst vs remaining, whereof I have inserted some few, as in their due places shall follow, which I received from the liberall hand of that most learned Knight, and worthy florist of Antiquities Sir Robert Cotton of Wotton. These Coynes are commonly imbossed outward and shield-like, whereon the inscription, or face, is seen; the reverse hollow, and therein their device set: and by these formes they are known to be the Britains, no other nation stamping the like, except some few amongst the Grecians.

(13) We come lastly, to speak of the manner of their warfare, which Cæsar thus describeth. First (saith he) they ride round about all parts of the battell, casting off their darts: and often times with the terrible noise of their horses, and the rattling of their chariot wheels, they amaze the enemy and break his array. And when they have wound themselves in amongst the troops of horsemen, they leape forth of their waggons, and fight on foot. In the meane while the waggons withdraw themselves somewhat out of the battell, and set their waggons in such order, that if they be overcharged by the enemy, they may haue speedily and easie recourse unto them. By meanes whereof they are both as ready to remove as the horsemen, and as fittest to stand in the battell as the footmen, and supply both duties in one. And they are come to such perfectnesse by daily practice and exercise, that even in steepe and falling places they will stop their horses running a full gallop, and guide and turne them in a short roome, & run upon the verges, and stand steadfastly upon the beames, and quickly recover themselves back againe into the waggons.

Their woe often giue ground to egge their enemies from their maine battell, and then would leape out of their chariots and fight on foot. And they kept also such an order in fighting on horseback, that whether the enemies charged, or were charged, they were alwaies in danger. For they never fought in great companies together, but scatteringly a great way distant the one from the other, and bad flahs lying in diuers places one to supply another, haueing ever fresh and lusty men in the rooms of them that were weary. Of this their manner of fight in chariots, Strabo also do declareth; and Dionidius Siculus saith that the Britains lived after the manner of the first age of the world, using chariots in their fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Troian warres. Pomponius Mela also describing these Britaines, affirmeth that their fight was not only with horsemen and footmen, but also with waggons and chariots, harnessed, and armed at the ends of the axle-trees with hookes and fitches, after the manner of the Gauls; but with appearance of greater courage, as Tacitus saith; as being not yet mollified by long peace. Their strength in field consisteth most of footmen, yet some countiees there are (saith he) that war in waggons, the greaterl persons guiding the time; and so much doth Lauren intimate, who in shew of propheticke but indeed in flattery of the Emperor Domitian, salutes him after this manner.

It beeds their Triumph great to captinate some Kings
Or force Asvragas from Chariots became to dings.
Die Nitum from Xiphiatum more particularly declare their strength; T heir horses (saith he) are but little, yet therewithall swift of pace: their footmen also run very readily but in their standing are the strongest: their armour are shields, and short speares, in the nether end whereof is fastned a round bell of brass like unto a ball, which at the first onset of encounter they shake with great courage, supposing that such a rattling noise doth much amaze the enemy. And Hærodian saith that their shields were narrow and speeres short, spearing fowards hanging down their naked loines, having neither knowledge nor use either of cursets or helmes.

(14) Some haue thought that their women also were not exempted from the wars, but certaine it is that many of that sex were renowned for their valour amongst them. Which made Tacitus to say, it was of all all for the Britains to fight under the conduct of women, (which the Romans found to their smart) nor to make any difference of sexes for government. A more noble pattern whereof, never had any age, then in our late glorious Virgin Queen, (the wonder of her sexe, and of all future ages,) who, as she was inferior to no Prince ever living, for her admirable government in vpholding of her kingdomes peace, so was she a match (to say no more) to the proudest monarchs, in her managing of her wars; as (when occasion was offered) she was ready to make good, in her owne roiall person in the field. But besides the vie of armes, the ancient British women had another imployment in the field,

which I will only set downe in Tacitus his words, speaking of Paulinus Suetonius his assailing of Anglesey: The British Army (saith he) stood on the shore, thick of men and ammunition and women running up and downe amongst them, like furies, carrying burning torches in ruffall attire, and with their haire hanging about their shoulders. The Druides meane while went with their hands lift up to heauen, pouring out prayers and imprecations.
The strangeness of which sight so amazed the Roman souldiers, that they stood still like stocks, whiles
the other wounded them at their pleasure; till Paulinus encouraged them, and they excited one another, not to be so daunted by an army of women and warriors.

(15) In the relations of these things, let no man think, that the glory of these ancient and warlike nation of Britains, is any waies disparaged, or made inferiour to them that would be more famous, whose beginning have been as meane, and state as rude, if not more. For let vs consider the Romans to laish in their owne worths and greatness; who notwithstanding,

bring their name and originall from Romulus, a bastard by birth, nourished by a beast, educed among a sort of rustick shepherds: and grown to the ripeness of his owne affections, he became ring-leader of a damned crew, that liued by robberies and without lawes: besides the shedding of his naturall brothers blood, as Titus Livius their owne historiographer witneseth: and both himselfe and followers; had in such contempt and denision by their neighbour nations, that they both disdained and refused to giue them their daughters in marriage, left in time they also should become lawlesse, vntill that by subtilty and force, they had murthered their virgins, and thereby made them vnworthy of other matches. Yet when their after fortunes and successe had moued them vpon the wings of glory, and seated them on the necks of their laboured neighbors, their Caesars would needs be more then mortall, and their pedigrees mult linally be brought from the Gods.

(14) And, to let passe many others, the like may be said of the beginners of the Seythian and Turkish Empires, two golden pillars raised vpon leaden bases;
how soeuer now, the power of their command, circles three parts of the earth. Nay what more is, that pretious, roiall, and Gods only people, from whom the eternall King of Kings descended, in their offerings made in time of their highest glory, were by the Lord thus commanded to acknowledge and say: A Syrian was my father, who being ready to perish for hunger, went down into Egypt, and foundered with a small company. And the richest stone of that most beauteous building in his highest pride is counselled by the Prophet, to look back to the rocke whence it was hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence it had beene digged.

THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAPTER V.

EE come, at length, to speak of the government and politick estate of the Britains, which doubtlesse (the times then considered) was as honorable in their rulers, and as manageable in the subiects,
as any other nations in these West parts of the world: their temperance, religion, learning, and noble resolution shewing no lesse. But in this point I must craue pardon of our British Heraults, and some learned Antiquaries, if I bring not a lineall succellion from Brute, and a monarchicall government in those times of obscurity, though whole millions no Egles rich could pierce, before the daies of Goffrey or Arthur, as before was touched. And therefore following his counsel, who is best able in these things to giue direction, I will begin the succellion of Great Britains Monarchs, at the entrance and person of Tullius Caesar: at which time, it seemeth, by him and other Latine writers (the best Recorders of kingdomes affaires,) this I-land was goarned rather after the manner of an Aristocratie, that is, by certaine great Nobles and Potent men, then vnder the command of any One as an absolute Monarch; though herein is a difference, in that in the Aristocraticall regiment, the rulers are all Peeres of one Common wealth; whereas here, as many Princes, so many seuerall Publike weales. For so Caesar himselfe found the state of Brittain to be diuided into Provinces vnder the names of her inhabitants; and to be ruled by diuers Peeres or petty Kings.

(2) And such a Gouernor was Casibelan, ouer the Trimantes; Cingetorix, Caradoc, Taximagalus, and Segomax, all foure Rulers together in Kent: Cornel supposed to be King of the Atreburys, and to be the same Common of Atreburys, whom Caesar imploied to reade and worke the Brittaines to his subiection. Caradoc the warlike King of the Sulures; Gulguac the worthy King of the Caledonians; yea and women also, without exception of sex, held government among them, such as was Isidore Cornemundae Queen of the Brigantes, and famous Boudicea Queen of the Iernians. Whereby it seemeth that euerie seuerall Province owed feruice and allegiance only to their owne Prince. And as their governments were confined vnto certaine bounds and limits, so were the Inhabitants diuided and distinguished by diuers Names: of whom because we shall haue occasion hereafter often to speak, it shal not therefore be amiss in this place once for all, to table wife to lay downe the same; whereby our narrations may passe vntroubled without more explanations, and the readers mind carried with lesse incombrences. Those ancient names of people, and places for abode, throughout the whole Island, from Pictland were as follow.

Their emulation & ambition.

Pompeius Mela.

Tacitus in vita Agricola.

Caesar first emperor, Julius Caesar.

Caesarian.

(3) These States ambitiously banding each against others, to raise their owne Prince to a more souveraign supremacy, and to enlarge their Provinces vpon the borders of the next, were ever ready, the last occasion ministred, saith Pompeius Mela, to enter quarrels, and seldom held amity, or were quiet. This was the cause, as Tacitus tells vs, which brought that puissant nation into bondage: and was the only helpe to the Romans villany: for seldom it chanced (saith he) that two or three states met in counsell, and concurred in opinion to repulse the common danger: so that whilst they resisted and fought one by one, all at length were subdued. But this was not at once performed by Julius Caesar the first Roman enterer, who (as he saith) rather showed the place to posterities, then gave them the possession thereof, supposing in his glory sufficient, to have done what he did. For vnto the daies of Dominian, they held play with the Romans, and that with such valour, that the subduing of some small part of this Island was accounted by themselves to match the conquests of other mightier countries, and more notes of honour shewed in their publike triumphs for one Britaines misfortune, then usually was solemnized for whole kingdomes subdued.

(4) That such people possessed, and that many Kings together reigned here in Britaine, Pompeius Mela doth shew: Britaine (saith he) bringeth fourth Nations, and Kings of nations, though they be all without civility and barbarous. And Caesar intendments being known vnto them, it is said that many of their Cities sent him by their Ambassadors proffers of submission: whereby appeareth their diuersities of States, whereof only two held promise, and the rest failing was the occasion of his second expedition for Britaine. And Tacitus, speaking of the shipwrack suffered by the Romans in the raigue of Tiberius, saith, that many of their soldiers then distressed and torne, being cast vpon the coasts of Britaine, were by the people curiously relieved, and by their petty Kings sent backe vnto Germanicus their Generall into Germanie; which Princes or petty Kings, were drawn (as else where he saith) by emulation into many partialities and factions, which was indeed their owne destruction. And by Gildas these were termed cruell Tyrants, taking his authority out of Saint Hierome.

(5) Let thus suffice in generall, of these ancient Britains; whose particulars we will further prosecute in the places of their residences, lest otherwise they should seeme to fight only against themselves. And therefore so many of these Governors, as either yielded their subiections to the Romans, or stood their opposits till their owne strengths were spent, I will briefly touch, vntill such time as the land was made a Province, by the valour and industry of Julius Agricola the first Roman that found it an Island, and left it more ciuill, and in subiection to the Roman Empire; and by the way I will insert some of such ancient Coynea, as among them were then vied, exprelling their names, and places of coynage.

THE KINGS AND GOVERNORS OF GREAT BRITAIN VVITH THE ANCI- ENT COINES VSED IN THEIR TIMES.

CHAPTER VI.

He first British Coyne (as is supposed) both by the fashion thereof being shield-like, and Name thereupon inscribed REX COM: denoteth Comius, (if he be a Britaine) King of the Atrebaty in this Island: whom some iudge to haue fled thence vnto Caesar, as a traitor to his Natiue country; and so Gallia vanquished those parts, that lay coasted against the Whights, wherein (by Ptolemy) the people called likewise the Atrebaty inhabited: ouer whom he receiued the gouernment by the gift of Caesar, and was by him imploied to worke the Britaines to his obedience. And that he was King of the Atrebaty in Britaine, may be strengthened by that which Caesar in his second booke of Commentaries affirmeth, where, by his owne knowledge he saith, that one Duntius reigned ouer a great part of Gallia, and some portion of Britaine also: and so likewise this Comius is reported to be of great respect among our Britaines, and able in that country to doe much. Neither is it altogether vnlkely, seeing the Britaines distasteth his loyalty to Caesar, and his Ambassage for their subiection, with such dislikes, that they laid violent hands onely vpon him, and cast him in prison; vising no such rage against the rest of their owne Ambassadors. Notwithstanding when soeuer altered, they set him at liberty, and made him their means to pacifie Caesar.

Other Coynea I haue inserted to such British princes as by their inscriptions are known to be theirs. And whereas some are not yet noted by that honor to the world; I haue vnto such added only blankes, if happily more be reuelled hereafter, and the bowels of the earth deliuer to others, her treasures hid, as formerly (and in these our searching daies) she hath already done.

(2) Casibelan, as the most worthy among the Britann Kings, so withstand the common danger now ready to light vpon them all, by the inuasions and wars of the Romans; was by a generall consent chosen their chiefeaine, though in times past, he had molested his neighbouring prouinces to the enlargement of his owne. Whole signiorities, as Cesar saith, were leuered from the Cities towards the sea coast by the river Thames, about fourescore miles from the same. He had obtained the government of the Trinobantes, by the slaughter of Imanence, and the expulsion of Mandubrace his sonne. And, with great valour, held opposit to the Romans, vntill the reuolt of his chiefe Cities, the Cenmagres, Segontians, Analitis, Bibraces, Casflans, and other states, which drew backe, and yielded to the enemy; his confederates, the foure Kings of Kent overthrown, his owne towne won, and himselfe forced to yeild vnto Cesar, and the land to pay a tribute of 3000. pound yearly to Rome. A British Coyne of gold with the inscription C A S in scattered letters we haue inserted, as also another wheron is instamped the word V R, supposed to be his, because it is thought to haue bin coined in ancient Verulam, the City of Casibelan, and that in his daies, before the Romans won it.

(3) Cingetorix: whom Cesar calleth Kings Caruall: that reigned in Kent, were in Taximagall: fligted by Casibelan suddainly Segonax: ly to set vpon, and to assault the Roman forces, that lay incamped vpon the sea shore whilst he kept Cesar occupied further in the mayne: which thing they attempted, but failed of their hoped expectation, their men being slaine, three of them chased, and Cingetorix the chiefe taken captiue. This heauy newes and vnfortunate successe, caused Casibelan to sue vnto Cesar, and by the meanes of Cemius obtained his peace.

(4) Mandubrace a prince of the Trinobantes, but a traitor to his country; whose father Imanence being slaine by Casibelan, and his owne life likewise fought after, and in danger, fled vnto Cesar into Galles, and followed his fortunes in the wars; wherein, he was a great spurte vnto Cesars forwardnesse for Britain, both to be reuenged vpon the murderer of his father, and to recouer the government of the Trinobantes usurped by Casibelan: preferring his owne ambitious desire, and the reuenge of one mans death, before the freedome of his native Country, or the deaths of many his countreymen, that daily stopped the Romans passage with streames of their blood. He recouering his chiefe City with the protection of the Romans, yielded subiection, & forty hostages to Cesar: whose example drew others to sell their owne liberty, & to buy many miseries at too deere a rate, and with too late repentance, him doth Beda call Andregorinus.

(6) Canobeline (for so vpon his Coyne his name is instamped) was the son of Theomastus and he the sonne of Lud (as say our British Historians, by whom his name is corruptly written Kynobeline) he haied at Rome, and in great fauour with Augustus Caesar the Emperor, by whom he was made Knight, and by his meanes the peace of Britaine was continued without the paiement of their Tribute, as Fabian out of Guide de Columna hath gathered. In the foureteenth yeere of his raigne the Day-star of Isacoh appeared, and the red out of Ilhah did flourish from the wombe of a Virgin, when the wonderfull Counsellor the mighty God and Prince of Peace the Emmanuel with vs was borne at Beth-lehem of his maiden-mother the blessed Virgin Mary, and was made man like vnto vs in all things, sune only excepted. These were the times that great Kings and Prophets desired to see, but saw them not, when the Wolfe and the Lambe, the Leopard and the Kid, the Calf and the Lyon fed together; for war was not heard of then in the world, but rather their swords were made into mattocks, and their speares turned into sikes, as the Prophets, Sibyls, and Poets from them haue affirmed. In Rome the temple of Ianus was shut, and in Britaine Canobeline enioied peace with the rest of the world, and his fame made more famous by the many Coyne instamped of him, and whole face thereon among all the British Kings was first inscribed, as hy these here inserted doth evidently appeare, one with two faces, like vnto Ianus, and foure more with his owne, besides three others wherein is read his name, one of them with a womans head, another with a horse, and the third with a wreath, all these (if not more) are knowne to be his, which sheweth his wealth, his fame, and his ciuill respect. The chiefeist Citie for his princely residence was Camelodunum, now Malden in Essex, wonne by Claudius from the sonnes of Canobeline, as by the inscription of the Coyne next ensuing appeareth, and wherein many of the British monies also receiued their impress. This City with the free towne Verulam afterwards felt the heavy hand of mercilesse Boodvo in her reuenge against the Romans, who laid the beaurty and gorgeous buildings thereof so leuell with the earth that those walles and mounted turrets neuer since aspired to halfe their wonted heights.

(7) Admirus the first sonne of Cunobeline, King of the Britaines, by Suetonius his report, upon some offence was banished the Iland by his father; and with a small traine fled over the seas into Belgia; where Caius Caligula was in making his ridiculous expedition against the Ocean. And yielding himselfe to his protection, added matter to his vaine glorious humors, as of a great victory and conquest, sending the newes thereof to Rome, with an especiall command that his letters should be delivered in the Temple of Mars, and that in the assembly of a full Senate. It is judged by learned Cambden that the Roman Coyne above prefixed, upon whose reverse is inscribed Metropolis Eboracensis, to be means of this Admirus the sonne of Cunobeline, whose Ciue Camladunum, Claudius Caesar the Emperour afterwards wonne, and wherein a temple was built and consecrated unto him, attended by the Priests Augustali: which heavily burdened the poore estates of the Britaines.

Suetonius in vita Caligulae lib. 41.

(8) Cataseratus another son of Cunobeline, immediately after the death of his father, found himselfe agreed as the Romans, for the retaining of certaine fugitives the betrayers of their native country; whereof one Vericus was a chiefe, and a great firebrand of Claudius his attempts against the Britains. This Cataseratus maintained resistance against Julius Plantius the Emperors Deputy, with such noble resolution and warlike encounters, that often he endangered both his person and army. But Fortune and victory attending the Romans, brought at length Cataseratus their captive into hands, with great slaughters of his Britaines, himselfe led shortly after in great triumph through Rome, in honor of Plantius his so fortunate successe. The miseries of others thus made the Romans to mount the chaire of their triumphs; and the chains of their captives, the records of their present aspired pride.

But the bordering Dobuni seeing his fall, made their owne standings surer by yielding themselves subjects to Rome.

Dion calls him Cataseratus.

(9) Togodannus the third sonne of Cunobeline, and successor to Cataseratus, professed his countries quarrell with the like boldnesse and resolution as his brother before him had done: & was the only touchstone that gave Vespasian his lustre, whose interpositions (as Tacitus saith) was the beginning of that greatness whereunto afterwards he aspired. And with such manhood followed the chase of the Romans, that in a bloody battell he ended his life, and brought Plantius their Lieutenant vnto a stand, where strained in dangers both of place and people, he was forced to send to Claudius the Emperour; whose conceit was then grounded, that in Britaine was greatest glory to be gotten, and therefore came to his assistance in person himselfe, the first since Julius Caesar that attempted their conquest. His recorded compositions made with Arminius, the marriage of his daughter and building of Gloucester, I leave to be read out of Gessory of Monmouth, and to be allowed at the choice of his hearers; only noting that the possession of so faire a land drew the affection and aged person of this Emperour to vndergoe so farre distant and dangerous a iournee, as this of Britaine lay from Rome.

Tacitus in vita Agricolae.

(10) Cogidannus a Britain borne, received in pare gift at the hands of the Romans, certain Cinere, which he peaceably reigned their King. For when they had conquered the neerest part of this Iland, and reduced it into the forme of a Præmure; according to their ancient policie, it was their custome, (saith Tacitus) to use Kings themselves for instruments of bondage, both in admittance of their authority, and in protecting them against their opposites. Other memoriall of him none remaineth, but that he is reported to haue rested ever most faithfull to the Romans, and was of them accordingly esteemed, albeit his owne people bare him no such good will, but rather accounted him and others his like, to be Romans only instruments, and Britains vipers, that brought in strangers to eat out the home-bred inhabitants, and fettered the freedome of their land, with the heavy chaines of a forreign subiection.

(11) Caracallas the most renowned prince of the Solares, in nine yeeres resistance waded through many adventures against the common enemy. For when as the Iscamius, Cangi, and Brigantes began to faint and give over, he only with the Ordanaces held out with such feruice and fame, that thereby he grew both famous and fearefull to the Romans. But Destiny determining the downfall of Britain, the props that were set to stay it still vp, proued too slender and brake vnder the weight. For this bold Caracallas overthrown in battell, his wife, daughter, and brethren taken prisoners, and his forces defeated, committed himselfe to the protection of Carismandua the Brigantes faithlesse Queene: who by her was deliuered to the Romans; and by P. Oflerius brought to Rome; where beholding the riches and glory of that City, he openly and boldly checked the avarice and ambitions humors of the Romans, who being owners of so great and glorious things, were (notwithstanding) couetous and greedy for the poore possessions of the Britains. And there being led in triumph, with admiration he was beheld of all the spectators, and for his vndanted spirit and magnanimous resolution released of bands, and taken into fauour by Claudius the Emperor. And the Lords of the Senate assembled together made glorious discourses touching Caracallas capuicity, affirming it to be no lesse honorable then when P. Scipio shewed Syphax vnto the people, and L. Paulus, Perseus, or if any other had exhibited to the view of the people kings vanquished and overcome. The British Coyne here aboue shewed, by the scattered letters therein inscribed, is by the iudicious obseruers of such ancient monies supposed to be his.

(12) Ventius, a famous King of the Brigantes, and husband to Carismandua, (a woman of an high and noble linage, but of a base and vnassisted lust:) finding his bed abused by Vellucatus his seruant and harness-bearer, raised his power against her, and her paramour. With him sided his Brigantes, and the neighbour countries adjoining, whose good will went generally with the lawfull husband, fearing the ambitious authority of a lustfull woman. With her went the Romans, at the command of Didius their Deputie: and these striking battell vpon the day: yet so, as the war continued to the Romans, the kingdome to Ventius, and the infamy with Carismandua, both for betraying the pledge of her trust reposed by Caracallas in his distresse and her truth to Ventius her noble Lord and husband: preferring the licentious pleasures of a vassall, before the bed of chast marriage, or the nuptiall imbracements of a worthy King, and hath to ages following left her name noted with the scarres of infamy, that time nor continuance shall euer weare away. His ancient coyne is thought to be as thou seest here aboue described.

against all manly ciuility, or womanly (much lesse, princely) respect, conumeously and despitefully whipped. In the reuenge of which vnassailable wrongs the so opposed and oppressed the Romans, that at one battell seuentie thousand (or as Dion Cassius saith 30000) of their slaughtered bodies the sacrificed to her dead husbands ghost; and hath left the fame of her proceedings registered, even by her enemies themselves, to her immortal and neuer dying memory. The strong Catix, Caledonum, and Verc- Lentini,

Leisurus, she sacked with the rage of mercileffe war; Pe-silus, Lieutenant of the north Legion, she discomfited, Catus the Procurator drove over the seas, Posthumus
the Campo-maſter durſt not reſiſt her, and all indeed feared the valour of this heroick Lady: whoſe lawes were not martiall to liue vpon ranſome: whoſe revenge was not pacified with yeeldings or ſubmiſſion, nor did ſhe thinke there was blood enough in the Ra-mans to imbrue the altars of her aſſiſting gods, or to walk off the ſtaine of their vanable and vomanly injuries. But when ſucceſſe altered, after loſſe, and valorous reſiſtance, ſhe made an end of her life by poilon, leſt liuing ſhe ſhould ſee either her owne miſeries in their triumphs, or leaue her remembrance in the records of their lauiſh and ſelfe-pleaſing hiſtorians. Her Coyne of gold we haue here expreſſed, the forme ſhield-like, and vpon the emboſſement thus inſcribed: SODVO.

(14) Arminius, the valiant Britiſh King, whom Hunſfrey Lloyd confidently affirmeth to be the ſame man that is called Mennius, and is ſaid to withſtand Claudius in his enterpriſes for Britaine, vntill a compoſition of marriage was concluded betwixt the Em-perors daughter and himſelfe. Notwithſtanding by Iuuenal it is plaine, that this Arminius was in his time in the daies of Domitian, vnto whom the Poet, as a Prophet, would foredoome his happy ſucceſſe in the diſpoſſeſſion of his gouernment ouer the Britaines, as in theſe his verſes are ſeene;

*It breeds great honor to thy ſelfe, ſince King thou ſhalt deſpise,
Or ſit Arminius from the rule of Britains maner ſhall deſiſe.*
An ancient Britiſh Coyne of ſiluer is here inſerted, and a mans head thereon inſtamped, which is ſuppoſed to be his, the letters alluding to neere to his name.

(15) Gulgaew, a worthy and moſt valiant prince of the Caledonians, for vertue, and birth, preferred
before any other in the Northern parts of this Iſland, and made their Generall againſt the inuaſions of Iulus Agricola, was the laſt Britaine, that againſt the Ra-mans ſtood out: accounting thoſe only happy, which were free from the contagion of that Roman tyranny, and themſelues the flower of all the Britiſh nobility,
that yet had not ſubjected their necks to their yoke.
The reſiſtance which he made was great and warlike, but againſt the decree of God no man can ſtand; for the Romans riſen to their grearneſſe, bare downe all that withſtood them; and in a bloody battaile ſub-dued him, and his forces, making all ſilent before them where they came, and leauing deſolation in the places where they had been. Thus then was the whole Iſland ſubjected to the Roman Emperors, about one hundred thirty and fix yeeres after Caeſar firſt entrance, and the land that had been ruled by many petty kings, was brought now (as moſt parts of the world belides were) vnder the gouernment of one abſolute Monarch. Griuous, no doubt, was the loſſe of their liberties, but a greater gaine was gotten not many yeeres after; for from the rude and ſavage manners of the barbarous, they were reclaimed, and became moſt ciuill. And he that had given their Iſland to his Chriſt, prepared their hearts to receiue how their King; vnto whoſe ſubiection alſo they were motiues to the Romans themſelues. Two ancient Britiſh Coynes ſtamped in ſiluer we haue here ſet downe, attributing them both to this Gulgaew of Caledonia. Notwithſtanding in theſe (as in the reſt) I muſt ſubmit my ſelfe to the more experienced, and the cenſures of theſe ancient things to the learned and more iudicious.

Fig. 1.

(16) Theſe then were the reſiſters of the Ra-mans proceedings, that rather yeelded their beſts to the ſword, then their necks to the yoke of a forreign ſubiection, and made their aſſaulters more famous in their conqueſts, and themſelues more renowned to following poſterities: neither in theſe relations haue
we followed the records of our owne, but the approued teſtimony of their beſt writers, who haue delinered what we haue ſaid, and no doubt firſt the like repugnancy of many others, both in the South and North of this Iſland, though their names died with their valiant reſiſtance. And as theſe Britains held the Romans at euen hand the ſpace of one hundred thirty and fix yeeres, neither yet then were ſub-dued without themſelues, that euer ſided with the enemy againſt themſelues, and whoſe ſictions made way for the feet of their conquerors, as from Tanſtan

we haue declared: So their ſucceſſors the ſaxons found as warlike withſtanders, till God for Britains ſinnes had caſt downe their ſtrength, whereof more ſhall follow (Chriſt aſſiſting) in the due place of their ſtoories, that from the rage of Vtrigern the ſcourge

of his country to Cadwallader the last prince of the Britains, spent their lives in the quarrell of liberty, and hath left their memorials famous for their countries defence.

(17) But the state of kingdoms (how largely so ever extended, or by what humane wisdom strengthened with defence) do find their periods not to exceed much the number of six hundred yeeres, as by common experience among most nations is seen. In these times therefore when the world was shaken with wars, first by the Romans that strove to mount the spires of their intended glory, and were by Gods decree appointed to overrun and assault the earth, when Kings of people (I say) were enforced to lay the Crowns from their heads at their conquering feet; and free nations loaded with the yokes of their bondage: then was fulfilled the resolution of this question demanded, Alas who shall live when God hath thus? And then among the rest, Britaine gave place to necessity with as manlike resistance as did states more stronger, or kingdoms confined with far more larger compass. And Cæsar himselfe bought his entrance with such losse to the Romans; that no Emperor after assailed the like, before aged Claudius, whose opinion was, that thence the remembrance of his succeeding glory should wholly arise.

But when the props of that Empire began for to faile, as nothing can bee firme in this still-wearing world, the Saxons, for their valour a second triumphant nation, began as it were where the Romans left: for besides the continuall possession of their owne country, as in that case vnpartiall Tacitus doth tell vs; their legions were transported into all parts of the world, and without whom almost no victory was wonne: of whose power and prowesse in the expeditions of warre both Dionysius, Arrianus and Seneca, doe speake. To these then likewise if the Britains gave place, their lots came fourth with the like price of the rest, and in this Iland they bought their conquests as deere as they had done in any other part of the world. Neither was Britaine subdued by either of these nations, or their invasion and exchange of police altered, but with as vniuersall subiection and streames of blood as had been flusled out of the sides of their mightier nations, or by them had bin tamed to follow their triumphall chariots. And more honour attributed to passe these Britons as, with more admiration only to see the Iland it selfe, then was usually conceiued of kingdoms more larger, or that lay iacent as farre from Rome. And the conquest of some small parts of Britaine in no small selfe-glory to be inscribed as trophies of their victories vpon their Coynes, and to give surnames to the Emperors and their toores: as shall be shewed, when the age of this history shall be increased with the times of the Romans affaires in this Iland. Free from subiection before the attempes of Cæsar subdued Cæsar by the testimony of Dionysius Siculus, and neuer had yielded to any forein power, as not provoked by Dionysius or Hercules, nor enforced by any to maintain their liberties by the feats of warre. But Cæsar in Gallie thirsting after nouelties, or his conceited humor to purchase renowne, made the sea seeme safe from dangers in passage, and himselfe resolute to venture his person amongst those bold and barbarous Britains: wherein he left no means vnassailed for their conquest and subiection, nor his successors omitted any proudent care to retaine and keepe the Land in their possessions, which whilst it stood a province in their obedience was held and accounted the fairest plume in their triumphant Diadem, and the losse thereof (if no more but only in name) as was publicly affirmed, would proue a great detriment to the Empire. This made the Romans to desire it as they did, who besides the great glory they conceiued in the conquest, made it the granary for the western garisons, besides the delicate provisions for their Emperors owne tables.

And the German Saxons strained in their owne countries through increase of their people, or haply to supply their owne wants, infected with piracies these West parts of the world, and among all others for the eie of their affections vpon this most beautifull Iland, and neuer left their attempes vnassaulted till they set the glorious diadem thereof vpon their owne heads. Changing the name Britannia into Anglia, a terme most fit to expresse that subiect, and pleasing in sound as Angelicall like, neither haue themselves proued vnworthy of so rich a possession, that in wars haue maintained, and by voyages made known her fame as far as the sunne hath his beames, or the endlesse Ocean her ebbs and tides. But of these things wee shall haue occasion hereafter.

And now adresse our selues to describe our ancient Britaines, and to shew their true pictures as they are reported. At first rude and vniuersall (I take them no further then all others then were in the world, some few excepted that were only taught by God) and with the first were reclin'd to a more ciuill respect, both in their apparell and apprehension of literature; whose pictures in the Chapter succeeding we will demonstrate they are described by Cæsar, Pliny, Dio, Herodian and others; at first altogether naked, cut, and painted as thou seest, afterwards partly clad in imitation of others which frequented their country either for traffick or conquest; in both which manner take them as they are reported to bee by these authours, and impute no liberty in the draught to the workmans best liking, nor thy selfe any whit disparaged to be brought from such parents, which here are set as the pillars spoken of by Iosephus, that after the flood did preserve the inuented science of the celestiall bodies, left time or elements should consume that knowledge or deuour those rules before demonstrated: So the true portraiture of our ancient progenitors may by these be preserved from the ruines of time & made our moimes to be thankful vnto him that hath brought vs forth in these most ciuill times, and not only clad vs with the garments of humanity, but by his spirit hath guided vs vnto a celestiall knowledge.

CHAPTER VII.

He vnderstanding and apprehensions of men clouded in ignorance are by a Great Philosopher compared to the eye-sight of such men, as stand and behold things as farre-off; because both of these, though they apprehend some generall shapes and notions, yet can they not discern of the true proportions and proprieties of their Objects. The like happeneth in the search and survey, as of all other Nations, so of our owne, of our first beginnings from antique Customes, behaviour, habits: the true Circumstances whereof are the more difficult to find, in that those things are not onely remote many degrees beyond the kenning of our Eye, (yes sometimes Ages from the times wherein we liue,) but are also shadowed and euerrapped in manifold vncertainties and contrarieties, wherewith euen those Writers haue perplexed our way, who vnderooke to be both our Guides and our Lights. Notwithstanding, our purpose being to propoſe vnto the eye of our now glorious and gorgeous Britames, some generall draughts of our poore and rude Prætorians, (that as King Agastius in his chiefe seals vied onely carthen diſhes to put himſelfe in minde that his Father was but a Potter, so we may remember that true British Nobilitie is more in Fortue then in Amesities;) let vs first see what the principall notes and markes are wherby the portions of those first Britaines were made to remarkable among all other Nations.

(2) These Notes were chiefly three; first, their going naked, secondly, their staining and colouring of their whole Bodies hardly, their earing, pincking and pouncing of their Beards, with garnishments (for so they thought them) of sundry shapes and fashions, as the two first ensuing Notes or *Portraiture*s doe represent. Touching all which, the reports of Authors are very discrepant; and therefore, first light is gotten out by collation of ſtories, we will essay, whether out of those Writers contradictions (brought to the stroke, and confronted together) we may strike some glimmering light to direct vs how to paint them forth, who so delighted in painting their faces.

(1) First touching their going naked, the authority of Cæſar mailt ouerſway (as being augmented) the too generall reports of ſuch others, as ſeeme to relate that the Britames generally vied no Couerture, as neglecting either of weathers iniurie, or of ciuill modesty; for he saith, interiores plerique sunt nudissimi: the In-land men for the most part were clad with skins. And yet these Inlanders were the reuel of all the rest, the Scottish and Sea-borders being full of humanity and little differing from the French civillite.

So that when Herodian saith, Proſit uſum non cognoscunt, nec induuntur quidem, They neither know the use of Garments: nor put any on; either he speaks on hearcly, or his large report muſt bee restrained to some extreme Perions, Times, and Places. And for certain Persons and Times indeed Plinius ſomewhat limits it, ſaying, that their married women, both elder and younger, (coniuges, matres) in certain ſignalls vſed to goe naked: ſo doth Dio alſo ſet certaine Places: in their Tent (ſaith he) they lye naked and vnſhod, where he ſeemeth to allow them ſome conſtrict abroad. The like may be ſuppoſed in time of Winter on War, where Herodian himſelfe ſaith onely, pleraque corporis nuda, A great part of their body was bare.

(4) It may ſeeme hereby, that thoſe Originals of Particular Nations were not much unlike that firſt beginning of the vniuerſall profumination of Mankind, when our firſt Parents Innocent walked in naked ſimplicity: the foundations of all things being, as fartheſt from our ſight, ſo more ſimple and ſure from thoſe artificiall fraudes, which ſome call Wit and cunning. And though an ancient Father be miſtaken, in conceiuing that by the foure letters of the name of Adam, were ſignified the foure quarters of the World, (that being an Hebreu name of three letters, and not a Greece of foure) yet all thoſe Quarters of the World participate ſomewhat of Adams diſpoſitions; and as all Natural things reſort by courſe to that whereof firſt they were framed, ſo if Lawes, diſcipline, and Cuſtomes, did not reſtrain men, they would in time, of themſelues reſolute to that firſt neglective condition, and careleſſeneſſe of thoſe outward reſpects whence men are now named Ciuill.

(5) But in our Britames, three reaſons there ſeeme of this their going vnclad. Firſt, their hardier, which was partly natural, and partly acquired by practice of their bodies to durance: of whom Dio records that all of them had an excellent habit in tolerating hunger, cold, and labour: inſomuch as they could endure to abide many daies together in the water up to the ſhins without any food, at all that they would lye in the weeds on roots and barkes of trees; though one kind of food he there mentioneth vnknewe in our times, whereof ſaying to make as much as a beane only, they were not ſubiect either to hunger or thirſt. No maruile, if thoſe, who would endure this, could endure the wear of garments: eſpecially in a ſolle winter we find this Euloge. Tanimum nec ſtilla gelæ, &c.

Not freezing cold, nor ſcorching hot they are;
Twixt both thou boldſt the meane and pleaſureſt part.

The like patience we find euen now not onely in the wilder Irish and Virgineans, but in rogues and Wanderers of our owne Countrey, who often pickeſt of themselves voluntarily deprive their Bodies of this Protection against the Aires offence, to procure pittie of others. And what speak we of these? seeing even children for Custome, and Women for pride, will suffer their Breasts, and most tender parts of their Body, to be exposed not only to offence of weather, but of modesty also? yet generally, the hendes, and feet, being of most subtilt fence, yet by custome are enabled now to endure that, which by the like custome the olde Brittaines endured in their whole Bodies; whereby Plutarch thinks they usually lived so long even to the age of fourscore, the extreme cold keeping in and augmenting their internal heat.

(6) As a shillie to endure colde, so ignorance (in many) of meanes to prevent it, may seeme another occasion of these Brittaines nakednes. The Romans (it seemes) in their old Causus times, and after, had not the skill nor use of Hats, Breaches, &c. That Britaine abounded with wool and other materials for cloathing, is past all doubt, for which cause, by one Pausanias, it is named Riche in Pasturage, which by another is thus explicated, that therein was an infinite multitude of tame cattell both with V. Aders full of milke, and laden with Fleeces to the ground. So then Wool was noe wanting, but Wool or Skull, the latter in most likelihood: for, as Strabo saith, that though those strutting V. Aders yielded great store of milke, yet some of them had not skill to make cheese, and having to rich grounds, yet had not the art of milke, so their sheepe might have such heavy fleeces, yet some of their Owners no cunning to keepe themselves warme therewith. Some of them, I say; for otherwise, as Pliny, touching Tillage, gives light to Strabo, witnessing, that others of them were so good Husbands as to measure their grounds with Measures, as likewise doth Diofcorides, saying they had skill to make drinke of Barley: so probable is it, that those other who were by Cæsar and Tacitus said to be so like the French in conditions, had also some part of their Art in fitting the Burthen of their Sheepes hackes to cover their owne.

(8) And thus we are now orderly fallen on the second of those three notes appropriated by Authors to our Brittaines, which is their painting and staining of their Bodies, which appears by Cæsar to have bene more vniuersally vsed, then going naked, for all the Brittaines (saith he) dye their bodies with staining. As Authors differ in the reason of this their painting, (as we shewed) so in the name, perchance also in the substance of that wherewith they stained themselves, and somewhat also in the colour it selfe. The substance Cæsar calls luteum, which yet in vulgar conception is thought to be some yellow substance, as Pliny calls luteum, the yelke of the Egge. Pliny himselfe saith the Frenchmen call it glayum, describing it to be an herbe like Plantayne, which Orbasius (as learned Cambden sheweth) doth terme Pistum, in which sense Mela is vnderstood, to say, that they were stained Pistum (and not Pistum), it being generally taken to be Woad, from thence ancient times hath crooked for this end it staineth. But for the colour which is made, Cæsar and the rest agree; it was Caruleum, blennif or asner, which colour the Cambro-Brittaines doe yet call glaze, whence our glaze for windowes (called also ourum) seemeth by reason of the colour so haue taken name. Onely Pliny leaueh some scruple, in saying, that the naked painted women imitated the Aethiopian colour, which must he vnderstood either comparatively, in respect of People white and vn-painted, or because he saw a turre of liath the appearance of blacke.

this painting, hath been already shewed out of Igidore, who writes, that they had that name from a word of their own language, wherein Pictis significeth as much as painted or stained; but whether those other Inhabitants of the more Northern parts of this Island, called also Picti or painted, had their name upon the same ground, & whether they were some branch of the British stock, or of some transmarine Celtæ, it is a question not yet decided. Pomponius Mela, and some other, derive them from Germany, some from the Pictines in France, but Beda, from Scythia, whence heith bee, they are reported to have come into Ireland in a few long battlements, and finding no footing there to have entered into Brittain. Though Beda has a authority be venerable, yet the learned find reasons to induce them rather to believe, that they were the remains of those ancient Brittaines which either inhabited the North-part of this Island, before the Romans entrance, or which (upon their Conquest) fled thither to avoid the Romish yoke, where the difficulties of the aire & soile protected them from the Romans ambition and invasion. Whereof Strabo well accorderth, saying, that Agriola drove the Romans Enemies (he means the more vntaileable Brittaines) into those parts, as it were into another Island. And it is thought incredible, that those Enemies of the Romans, who sent forth against Agriola an Army of thirty thousand strong, and who vexed Seneca, that in one Expedition hee lost twenty thousand of his Romans, & their Asiers were so victoriously extinct, as that none of them remained; but that rather they wonderfully multiplied, being those who afterward much perplexed and ouercast the Roman Province, and to whom (not vnlike) some other, (such as Beda mentioneth, did afterward ioinc themselves.

(10) If we would adde reasons vnto Authorities, to proue that these Picti were no other then that multiplied offspring of those Brittaines, we could produce these * Language, their manners, their kind of Government (all bearing British Resemblance) to con-

firme the same. But what need! since the selfe-manner of painting is an vndoubted marke in the Children representing of what Parents they were borne. That they were painted, Claudian shewes, calling them, The Pictes so truly named, which Isidore well expounds, The Pictish Nation had their name from their bodies, daubed with the iuce of an herbe growing amongst them. When therefore the Romans excluded them from their other Provinciall Brittaines, this name (Pictes) for distinctions sake was in vye amongst them; before which times, yea and long after, they were knowne to Writers by no other name then Brittaines, and the Romane Emperour, Commodus, Severus, Diocletian, Geta, vpon the Conquests of them, intituled themselves Britannici, British (not Pictish) Conquerors. But after the Romane league had prevaile with the Romane sword, the Brittaines themselves vied to name any thing painted by the name of Pictis, as may bee gathered out of Vegetius, who saith, that the Brittaines called certaine Shallaps, Pictis, because their saies, Leek, and Marriners apparel, were coloured blew, the very colout, wherewith these British Pictes (as some where they are trooly called) vied to flaire themselves. When afterward the Irish Scots had confederated themselves with the Picts against the Romans, they all beganne by degrees to be more civilized: the more Southerly of them being by Numa the British conquered vnto Christ, about the yeere of Grace 430. those other more Northerly, by Columbanus Anno 565. by which time it is likely, that Civilitie increasing, their painting and other like ruder Customes were well nigh forgotten, both amongst them, and also amongst those other Brittaines vnder the Romane Government. In which regard we haue besides those perfixt Seneca, and Diocletian of their first and most savage times, here added also their Habits, a while they beganne to put on, with conditions, a little better cloathing also.

colouring of their Bodies: for besides it, some other be-liniments they had, which they effected much more gracefull, then either their painting was, or any Cloathes could be. Whereof the Brittaines, Salomon thus deliverteth: The Country is in part (note that the makes it not general) inhabited by People barbarous, who by artificiall formes of infection have from their Child-hood faculty (supers) of Beasts depertraied in their bodies, and as their limmes increase in growth, so doth the pictured marks together therewith, neither doth these wild People boast of any greater kind of patience, then in bearing long-lasting feavres, where the paint had deeply functioned in their faced flesh. The very parallel whereof is also by thisre let downe touching our Picts whose bodies fierced and picked be an artificiall punchion, did suck in the woe of the flaying herb, carrying the sear-sore on their pictured limmes, as badges of their Noblenes, thus endamished. Neither only the shapes of Beasts, but of all other things, were so printed in their flesh, which Herodian takes to bee the prime reason, why they delighted to goe naked, least they should hide thesi: their pleasing garnishments. Where also by the way may be observed, since Salomon saith that the barbarous onely vied so to doe, and Herodian, that those who did so, vied therefore to goe naked, that therefore not the Brittaines in general, but the most barbarous of them vied to goe naked. And very answerable to Salomon, (who elegantly calleth such their figuring of themselves, inscriptis visceribus, a writing on their Bodies;) is that of Claudius, Perieget examines Pict's marvellous figure as, On dying Pict's he reads the horrid shapes, and the beasts so lively portraied on them, seemed to be dead together with the murdered bodies of the Picts.

(12) By these varieties of pictureing, (if some have not misinformed vs out of their alliged ancient Anthe 1.;) those people so distinguished themselves, that the marred women were knowne by having pictured on their shoulders flowers and knots; the heads of some fierce beasts, as Lions, Gryphens, &c. On their Belly, the Sunne spreading his beames: on their Pappes, Moones and Scarres &c. On their armes, thighs, and legges, some other fancies of their owne Choice. But for their Virgins, their whole Body was garnished over with the shapes of all the fairest kinds of flowers & herbes; which (so speake indifferently) could not but yeeld, though a strange, yet so vncleaving aspect. Whereas the Men were (as Caesar speaks) very horrible to be looked on, having all their beault & bodie disfigured with vgly Beasts, Serpents, ravenous Burdes, scales and finnes of fishes &c. In which relation yet, this scruple will not easily be removed (if it bee true, that from their childhood their prints covered with their bodies) how those, who being Virgins had no print but of herbes and flowers, becoming Men were so easily transformed either into Beasts or beaustly Creatures.

(13) The later Women, (as you see by the later portraiture,) became faire more modest, that is indeed more womanly, having learned that then they openly shew most beaulty, when openly they shew not their beaulty; much lesse should they expose to the view, that which nature most endeavoured to hide, as knowing it least worth the viewing: yea

some oblerue that women being drowned, naturally swimme with their face and foreparts downward, whereas Men doe contrary, as if the impression of modesty were not to leave a Woman even after death. Aegyptus who mentioneth it, reporteth also of some Macrones, so too-mo-Jell, that they chose rather to die, then to expose some hidden discaies to their Chirurgicalians view: A point unfortunately inscribed into his witty books, in praise of women, which he dedicated to Atargata wife to Antemilian (afterward Emperour) their, of womanly bashfulness choosing rather to die, then to have her thigh cured, which was broken with a fall from a horse. The picture of this British woman here last depraicted, is framed to that description of the most valient British Lady, Boudicca, of whose braue attempts on the Romanes you shall read, more hereafter in the 7. Chapter of the Sixth Booke.

(15) For their other habiliments of warre, and the manner thereof, we have described it in the same 4. Chapter, their fight being (as Dionysius saith) after the fashion of the Heroes in the first age of the World, who fought on Chariots; yet on foote also they were most brave (saith Dio) and also most swift, which makes me marvaile why Strabo should say, they were pedestum male-fiduli, not fitly so interpreted. Who also adds that they were (as himselfe observed at Rome) much taller then the Gauls, but yet of no very elegant shape and temper. Vñ as (Caesar saith) to were their haire very long and curling, otherwise shaven all their bodie save, except onely the upper lippe. Their weapons (saith Herodian) were narrow stiletts and short spearres, at the end whereof (saith Dio) was a little bell like a ball, which they shooke at their first encounter in Warre for terror of the Enemy. Swords also had they, but short, hanging at their naked sides; but helmet and casque they vied none, as esteeming them burdens rather then helps in warre. But about their necks they wore a round circle of Iron as an ornament, which they adorned their gold with other Nations; as also about their waite, whereas they hung their skinner, being doubtlesse, a most warlike Nation, (as their posterity have ever since proved,) and most desirous to spill blood, wherein yet their Offspring by diuine blessing are now most different from their Ancestors.

THE SVCCESION OF THE MONARCHS OF GREAT BRITAIN IN THE TIME OF THE ROMANS, WITH AN HISTORICALL RELATION OF THEIR EMPEROVS AND LIEVTENANTS:

So far as toucheth the affairs of this land, and so long as it stood a Province to that Empire.

BOOKE VI. CHAPTER I.

He next Nation that to the Britains obtained possession, and sovereignty of this land, were the Romans, and of them Caesar Julius Caesar the first, what time their State had undergone all kinds of governments, and now ripened almost to their highest pitch of glory. This Caesar bearing the office of Legation in Spain, and naturally disposed for great affairs, was thereto the more incited at the sight of Alexander's portraiture, standing in the temple of Hercules at Gades, where beholding it with great admiration fell into a sudden dislike of himselfe, and (as Alexander in seeing Archilles tombe) with an ambitious, yet honorable emulation, sighed and said: Hast thou at my years attained the conquest of the whole world, my selfe hitherto having done no memorable action? After which he disdained that his petty charge, and made suite to the Senate to be dismissed, holding that the cloude which overshadowed his following (and soone after) flowing fortunes. And forthwith returning to Rome obscured every occasion that might make him gracious in the peoples eyes, having the advantage of the time which then was swayed with most dislikes: and entering into many factions, yea and some of them not without suspicion of conspiracy, did notwithstanding so manage his proceedings, that their constructions were ever made honorable, and himselfe the man by all assents that did support the glory of their State, unto whom offices of high dignities were assigned, which daily increased his credit and power. And in the time of his Consulship, took upon him the government of Gallia, where he remained ten yeeres together, and forbore no occasion for warre, were it neuer so vniust or dangerous: Inasmuch that framing a Bridge of wood over the broad and fruitfull Rhene, he entred the country of the Sueui, being the first Romane that assailed the Germani: And thence with victory returning, found his charge the Gauls in quiet: both which fortunes were as spurres to his aspiring minde, and set his thoughts to worke vpon other attempts.

(2) For now intending a voiage into Britaine, he prepared thitherward, as well to enlarge the extent of his ambition and glory, as to satisfy himselfe with the sight and seat of the land, as for a further knowledge of those people the inhabitants, after whom he had most diligently inquired, yet by no relation could find content. But his pretence was reuenge against the Britains, for that thence (as himselfe speaketh) the Gauls had recruited most of their supplies against him in all his warres, or as some haue written, for the desire of Pearles that therein plentifully grew, whose beauty and weight he had oft obscured.

But because the summer was almost spent, and that the voiage seemed dangerous through want of knowledge, either for place of entrance, or safety in harbour (for our learned countryman Roger Bacon was doubtlesse in an error, who thinketh that Caesar set up perfect his glasse on the coast of France, and thence saw all the ports and creeks in England) he thought good to send one Cassius Volsenus a military Tribune in a galley before him, giving sufficient instructions for so great an enterprize in hand, himselfe drawing towards those parts of Gallia, that lay neerest coasted vnto Britaine, thence expecting his successe.

(3) These things were not so secretly done but that the Britains received notice thereof, and therupon some of their private States sent Ambassadors with proffers of submission vnder the assurances of their hostages. Which Caesar accepted and sent back again with liberrall promises, joining in commission with them Cannus a king of the Atrebates (for so he is called vpon his Coyne) a man well reputed, and respected among the Britains, that he might perswade the rest of the States to embrace Caesar's amitie. In effecting of which businesse, some few daies being spent, Volsenus returned, having waited vpon the coasts of Britaine so far, as with safety he might, which was no further then to view it with the eye, his foot not daring to tread the shore replenished with those barbarous people, as it pleased the Romans to terme the Britains: His discouerie and relation gave small encouragements to Casari hoped success, and had not the Morines yielded him their obedience, it may be thought his voyage at that season had been staid.

(4) But now comparing his affairs in Gallia, and having ready an hundred ships (wanting but two) besides many Galliaris for transporting his army, he looked from the shore, having a good wind, about the third watch of the night, taking order for his horsemen to imbarke with all speed and follow after him, his life early in the morning attained the fight of Brittaine, where cliffes he found covered with armed men, and place for entrance so naturally befit and furnished with steepe hills and rocks, that hee there cast anchor, and called to counsell the Legats and Tribunes, declaring unto them the danger of the haven that gave such advantage to their enemy, whose darts from the higher ground might much impeach their arruage, and therefore determined their landing elsewhere.

(r) Their Counsell was no sooner dismissed, but Cæsar both tide and wind fitting him, nor foreflowing the occasion, gave game of remove, and some eight miles distant came to a plaine and open shore, and made preparation to land his men. Thither also the Britains had removed part of their forces, and so valiantly withstood the enemies, that Cæsar himselfe, though wholly addicted to honor himselfe and his Romans, yet confesseth that his army was fore over-laid and terrified with that incounter; and had they not been assisted from the Gallies with an vnsual kind of Engines, which did beat backe the Britains (vncpert of that strange manner of assault) from the shore, the Romans had not fet foot on Briggs sole, nei-

durst they then adventure it, until the standard-bearer for the tenth legion desperately leapt forth to the ship with his Eagle, calling on the dandered soldiers and asking whether they would dauntedly forsake their ensigns and betray it through cowardice to the enemy! which opprobrium provoked them to follow his example and to throw not the hoarse after an encounter fierce and terrible on both parts, as Cæsar acknowledges. But the first of all (even before the Standard-bearer) who put courage into the Romans and taught them how to deale, was (as testifieth Strabo) one Seana a Britaine (who formerly had fled to Cæsar) and guiding foure other soldiers in a boat to a rocke neere the shore, where the tide leauing them, his fellows slanke backe in the boat, but hee most boldly defended himselfe from the rocke against the Britains, like a Beare at a stake among a multitude of mistiues, till having all his armour broken in peeces and himselfe all wounded with darts, hee swamme to the fleet, and begging pardon for his foolish forwardnesse, Cæsar both forgane him, and rewarded his valour with the honour of a Centurion: and hee did Cæsar afterwards noble service at Dyrachium in the ciuill warres. Cæsar confessing, that hee alone saved the fortification against Pompey, at which time his target was shewed to Cæsar, having 230. holes pierced in it by the enemies, whereof Josephus saith that ancient Poet of Excellence writeth thus:

person and loss of his 18. ships (coming vnder sale with his horsesmen to his assistance) through the violence of a storme, and rage of Sea.

(7) In the mean time the prisoners, that after flight had again recovered head, and in their assemblies adufully considered their imminent dangers, concluded their submission for the safest remedy, and to that end sent their second Embassadors unto Cæsar, with whom Cæsar before remembrance was imploied, whom they had retained in strait prison for Cæsar's ease, but now made him a meane to worke their peace; which was granted after some soft and gentle reproofs, with bullages received for performance of Contents, and relout of their Nobler to Cæsar's campe, to yeeld themselves and Cities to his will.

(8) These Britaines, although rude in regard of the Romanes, and vnmatchable to them in educated civilitie, yet were so skillfull in the affaires of warre, and so ready to discern the least advantage, that the easily perceived the weaknesse of Cæsars power, both in want of horsemen to equall their wagens, wherein chiefly stood the strength and order of their fighte, as also of ships for service and safety, as occasions should be offered : whereby their mindes touching their promised subjection began to wauer, and the matter with better aduice to be pleaded in their assemblies, for that not only these foresaid ships for Cæsars supply were dispersed and hindered, but euen his owne fleet, which lay then in harbour by the rage of winde and sea, (beeing then spring tide, and the moone in the full) was not onely filled with waues, but also their sackings, sailes, and anchors spoiled or lost, the violent storme so dashing the bankes one against another, that their bruiſed bottomes were thereby made vnfit for burden.

(9) This truffe was so great, that it is accounted the first of the three adverse fortunes which ever happened to Cæsar in all his proceedings: and it was so well observed by the Britannians, that immediately they intended a revolt, and in Councille wrged this, as the materiall point that breathed hope and life to their former liberties, condemning themselves as impious if they should refuse to joine content with the heavens, whose elements had thus farr fought for their freedom and fall deliverance, assuring themselves (if on this advantage they might cut off these new guelphs) that never any afterward would adventure to enter Britany in hostile manner.

And thereupon they began both to slacke the performance of courants, and daily to withdraw themselves from Cæsars Campe, which gaue him iust occasion to suspect where they aimed. And to prevent their proceedings he as wisely wrought : for first repairing his Nauie with the huls, timber, and tackling of the most bruiſed ships, with the losse of ruine ships only, the rest were made able to brooke the sea. And providing against the aduantage of the enemy, he first forth the seuenth Legion for forrage to supply any occasion.

(10) Thus Legions taking the coast clear, and little furnishing so sudden a result, fell to the fickle and fish like harleut labourers, and laid their weapons apart, mistrusting no Enemie. Now the Britaines as forward to put in practice what they had determined, closely had laid themselves in ambush, for thither they knew the enemie would come, a pecke of corne there standing, whereas in all other parts harvest was past : and so having these workmen in their danger, suddenly fell vpon them, slaying some, and forcing the rest out of their array, who not knowing the order of their fight, cast themselves in a ring (the best defensive forme of embattelling) and stood on their guard as they might be: but had they not happily beene rescued, Caesar had lost one whole Legion at that time.

(11) For though this shin thus in a ling was altogether unknown and unexpected to the rest of the ROMANS, yet by the rising of the dust, appearing to the Cohorts that waited before their Camps, the same was mistrusted, which caused Cæsar in all haste to make thitherward with part of his host.

(12) The Britains thus prevented, seeing more supply to maintain the battle, stood still, without further stroke: and the Romans as much amazed at this sudden attempt, and order of their fight, made a stand, not venturing any further. Which order in fight so often mentioned, and so much admired, in Cæsar's words we will declare, the rather because some have thence collected, that the Britains were the offspring of the Trojans, who with other Eastern Nations only used this kind of fight in Chariots.

(13) They used (saith he) to ride in wagons against the approach of the enemy, and to circulate them about with a whirling compass, and rattling noise, each waits casting their darts as they did drive, and ever as they saw advantage would wind themselves in amongst the horse and foot, to break the array: which done, they would forsake their wagons, and on foot most dangerously assault the enemy. In the mean while the Waggoners would withdraw themselves somewhat out of the battle, and place their wagons in such order that if their masters were over-charged, they might have speedy access, and opportunity of retreat, by which means they were ever as quick to move as were horsemen, and as speedy to stand the battle as were the foot, whereby they did supply the duties of both at once, and by daily exercise grew so expert in managing their horses, that running them forcibly down a steep hill, they would stop, and turne them in the mid-way: and they would run along the beam, and stand firm upon the yoke: whence with like facility they would againe returne into their Chariots.

This order Cæsar so well observed, as that notwithstanding his desire of revenge, yet warning his horsemen (as he pretended) wherein consisted the chiefest resistance, hee durst attempt no further on them, but was content to keepe the field without proffer of battle.

(14) The Britains likewise hopelesse of further success at that present, departed without any impeachment, intending to prosecute their cause with a greater and more general supply: and thereupon sent messengers to their severall States, with notice of their hopes against so small a power: whose Camps by them if any way might be vanquished; the purchase of Slaves, besides their freed liberties, would requite the paines.

(15) These States, though maintaining civil factions amongst themselves, yet seeing the intended danger of this general enemy, presently assembled a great power, purposing yet once againe to trie the hazard and fortune of warre. Cæsar, whose vigilancy did ever equal his valour, prepared his army, where in now only 30. horsemen were present, and those brought to him by Comius the King. The battle joining continued not long, but that the Britains gave backe and fled, whom the Romans pursued as farre as strength indured, and returned with the slaughter of many, burning the Countrey where they came.

(16) Thus the Britains once againe vanquished, forthwith sent their third Embassage unto Cæsar, desiring peace, with promise of quiet subjection; whom he with hard termes now reproached, and imposed a double number of hostages to be brought him into Gallie, whither he made all possible preparation, for that the Aquinoctium drew neere, doubting his cragged ships would hardly brooke the winter storms, that usually rage upon these Seas. And having gotten a faire wind, embarked all his forces about midnight, and so brought most of his fleet safe to the continent. This enterprise so fortunately accomplished, Cæsar by his letters made known to the Senate, who decreed and proclaimed to his honour a general supplication or thanksgiving to their Gods, for the space of tredecim diem together, wherein all the Romans, clothed in white garments, and crowned with garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and offered sacrifices for so glorious a victory.

CESARS SECOND EXPEDITION INTO BRITAIN.

CHAPTER II.

CÆsar expecting the performance of Covenants agreed upon in the treaty of peace with the Britains, received hostages from two of their Cities onely, and no more: the rest drawing backe, refused his subjection: whereupon intending not to lose so rich glory thus farre in his Horizon had ascended, hee appointed some troubles in Gallie, and in the winter season began his preparation to that enterprise. And having had experience of his former wanes, he furnished himself accordingly, and the next spring following drew his forces towards Calve, the shortest cut into Britaine. There committing the charge of Gallie to T. Labienus his Lieutenant, himselfe with five Legions of footsouldiers, 2000. horsemen, and 800. ships, about going downe of the Samee looted from the shoare, and with a soft Southerne gale were carried into

(2) Therefore falling againe with the change of tide, and inseason of their Oares, about noone the same day hee recovered the shore, even in the same place (and that without any loss of resistance) where he had found best landing the Summer before. There in convenient manner he encamped his host, and by certaine Fugitives got notice of the power and place of the enimie.

the coast before.

(3) And lest delay should afford them advantage, he committed the government of his ships at anchor to Quintus, and his campe on land to the guard of ten Cohorts, besides the strength of three hundred horsemen; and himselfe with the rest about the third watch of the night tooke their march towards the enimie, proceeding with such celeritie, that by the day dawning they were entred twelve miles higher into the Continent: where seeking to passe a river, which is supposed to be the water Barro, the Britaines with their darts and chariots began in most terrible manner to assault the Romans. But being at length by them repulled, tooke into a wood strongly fortified both by nature and mans industrie. For in the time of their owne dissensions they had formerly made that place one of their strongest fortresses, and had cut down many trees, which overthwart the waies of entrance they had beflored.

(4) In this they secretly kept, and where they saw advantage, would by companies fall out upon the enimie to their no little annoiance. Whereupon Cæsar commanded the Eleventh Legion to raise a banke, and to build a glade of boards, covered with raw hides, by which means the place without much adoe was won, and the Britaines forced to forsake the woods. Whole chafe Cæsar forbade both in regard the day was neere spent, as also that the country was altogether unknown to the Romans. But the next day the pursuit being begun, sudden newes was brought from Quintus, that most of his ships the night before by a violent tempest were cast on Land, their bulks shaken, their cables broken, and anchors lost. Cæsar's experience in like mischiefs the Summer before, made him so much more ready to prevent the worst. And therefore recalling his forces, in all haste returned to his Campe, finding the relation too true in their wracke, whereon forty of his ships were quite lost. Wherefore he wrote to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gallia for supply of ships, thence to be sent in all haste. Then gathering his shipwrights out of the legions, with the ruines of the bruis'd bulkes, he repaired the whole; and now having twice felt the dangers of these seas, caused his whole fleet (a strange attempt) to be drawn on land, even into the midst of the fortifications of his campe, so to secure them from the like mishaps, and that one strength might defend both.

(5) In which admirable toyle ten daies and nights were altogether spent, before hee could returne to the place from whence he came, where now the Britaines through great confluence of people had increased their power, and entred againe their fortresse and wood. The chiefe command of these affaires was committed to Calsibelan, whose course we have heretofore likewise set, a Prince of good repute for feats in warre, whose Segnorum was feared from the Coasts towards the Sea, by the great and famous river Tamisis, and extended into the land full foure-score miles.

This Calsibelan present Gouvernour of the Trinobantes, had attained to the possession of their chiefe Citie by the slaughter of Immanence their former Ruler (a man well respected, and much lamented after death) whose sonne Manabrac, a gentleman of great hope, fearing the like danger, by the new established authoritie of Calsibelan, had made over into Gallia, crusing Cæsar's assistance to let him in his right.

Calsibelan's intention at King's Lake.

(6) Calsibelan (if among these authentick Authors the Brutish Writers may be heard) was the brother of King's Lake, and in the noinge of his nephews gathered the Trinobantes, whose bonds hee sought to enlarge upon the bordering Countries of his neighbours, and in his fortunes had to borne himselfe, that he was much maligned, and more feared. But now all their dangers yoked alike in a common perill, they laid aside private grudges, and held him the only man to support the strength of their troubled and declining citie, and by a common consent made him General of their warres. The expectation of whose proceedings hee long delayed, but with a fierce and hot encounter did assault the Romans, and so manfully discharged the parts of his place, that in the sight of the whole Campe Quintus Labienus a military Tribune was slain, (in memorie whereof the place as yet, though somewhat corruptly, is called Lab-lan) and Cæsar himselfe professed hee learned many points of martiall policie by their brave and running kinde of encounter.

(7) But his next daies service proved not so fortunate; for the Romans having learned their owne defects by the former daies experience, laid aside their magick armour, that with the more facilitie they might both assault the enimies, and with like nimbleness avoid their furie, they hasting now befowed their powers disorderly, and scattered their troupees into companies, whereby the Romans were full matched with fresh supplies. A policie no doubt of no small consequence, had not destiny determined the fatal subjection of the Britaines, and Fortune now raised the Romans almost to the height of their Monarchie.

Britains retire

Promontories.

(8) For this falling, the Britaines never after shewed themselves with any united resistance, but having lost the day departed, thinking it better to secure eacrie private by his owne means, than by a generall power to hazard all, as hopelesly any more to uphold that which the heavens (they saw) would hane down. And Calsibelan himselfe despairing of happy successe, drew into his owne territories, keeping with him not above 4. thousand wagons. And fearing the Romans further approach, forthwith the river Tamisis (then passable onely in one place) with sharpened stakes bound about with lead, and driven so deepe into the bottom, that Seda and Aster report them to be remaine in their times. All which notwithstanding, the Romans passed with the repulse of their enimies, and Cæsar, who grew now to the height of his honor, marched further into the Continent, and coming forward, was met by Ambassadors from the chiefe Citie of the Trinobantes, which first of all the States proffered submission, and promised subjection, with this intreatie also, that Manabrac (who being Cæsar's follower, and doublet the contriver of this submission) might be Gouvernour of their Citie.

(9) Cæsar ready to worke upon such advantage, treated them as foety hostages, with sufficiency of grasse for his whole armie, which with all expedition those Suppliants performed, preferring the satisfaction of their owne discontentments before the common cause of their Native Country, thus laid open, and betrayed into the enimies hands; from whose example many other States without stroke yielded to Cæsar's command: yea further treacherously shewing unto him both the power and place of Calsibelan's abode, who had now retired himselfe into his owne Citie called Verulam, well fortified both with woods and marsh grounds.

Thither Cæsar came, and with little losse or labour won the place, and many of the miserable Britaines both taken and slaine. Calsibelan now despairing of his owne power, farr vnable to match, and much lesse to outmatch his Enemies, resigned the Gouvernours of Kent being four in number, Cingetrix, Caracul, Taxamogolus, and Segmax, (whom Cæsar termed

(11) The conditions were hard, but heeleslie must be obeyed: for Caesar imposed a grievous Tribute to be taxed of the Britaines, of no lesse then three thousand pounds yearly to be paid, and moreover included the safety of Mandubrace, with his Tribunes taken into friendship, and protection of the Romans; and lastly, that these Comius should be faithfully observed, he commanded hostages for assurance forthwith to be delivered. These things thus compounded, he tooke the Sea, about the second watch of the night, which then began to equalize the day in length, and safely arrived in the Continent of Gallia; Having rather shewed the place to posterities, then delivered to the Romans the possession thereof, as Tacitus saith, supposing it his glory sufficient to undergoe a matter so rare and difficult, and at his coming to Rome, to have presented his British Captives whole strangeness for attire and behaviour filled the peoples eyes both with wonder and delight. He offered also in the Temple of Venus Genetrix, a Surcoat made all of British pearls, as a Trophy and Spoile of the Ocean. And now his fortunes coming to the highest, the title of perpetuall Dictator (then which the State of Rome could afford nothing greater) sufficed him not, but a King hee will be, and sole governor oer all, though contrary to the Law and liking of the Romans; whereof in short time grew such heart-burning and hatred, that seventy principal men conspired his death, and after his many dangers of enemies in battles abroad, was in the Senate-house amongst his supposed friends, and in peace (if treachery may be called peace) cruelly murdered, revealing in his body three and twenty wounds, whereof he died, after he had been Emperour only five months.

(12) I am not ignorant that the British Writers doe varie from Caesar in relating these his proceedings, and speake more honourably of their owne resistance then himselfe hath set downe, namely, that by the valour of Cassibelan their King, in his first attempts hee was twice driven backe without his purpose, and forced to take the Sea, to the great hazard of his ships and men, yea and with the losse of his owne sword, which with great prowess was wonne from him in a single encounter by Nennius Cassibelans brother. And surely howsoever Polydore accounteth their story new, and Caesar carrieth himselfe glorious in his owne affaires; yet by sundry other renowned writers it seemeth that the current of this Conquest went nothing so smooth and untroubled, or with so little losse of the Romans, nor the Britaines liberties fugene by so easie resistance, which may be collected even out of some court passages of Caesars owne words, where it appeareth, that hee durst not at sundry times give the Britaines battle, though they were only harried in leather, and his Souldiers were all old Legionaries of long service, called for their huge armour, Miles gravis armaturæ, as having a helmet, corslet and boots, all of massy brasse or iron, with a large target, a strong two-edged sword, and a great classe or clubbe headed with an iron pike; which oddes notwithstanding had not Cassibelan beene vndermined by Mandubrace, and traitorously forsaken (which Caesar himselfe confesseth) by the Princes which promised him assistance, but ever maligned him, and had now a faire time of revenge, perhaps Caesar might have missed this parcell of his glory. Yet for all these helpers, Caesar saith expressly of them,

Territa quævis ostendit terga Britanni:
He Brittaines found, but lost them soon by flight.

Extropius saith, He was wearied out and galled, both with the fierce battles of the enemy, and troas of tempests. Tacitus saith, Hee found out Brittaines for the Romans, but could not winne it for them: which was the very cause why (as De Wittes saith) for twenty yeeres after Caesars entrance, Brittaines kept their owne Kings and their owne laws, and had no forraigne Prefects to command them. And Strabo sheweth, that Caesar in this Land was both received with flatter and sore fight, and weakened by the losse of his ships, and with the most part of his men at armes. Tacitus also, vying the speech of Caecilius to his Souldiers, hath these words: He called (saith he) upon the names of his Ancestors, which chased Caesar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whom and by whose valour they were delivered from Harlots and Tributes, and emitted freely their wives and children without-fild. Again, in the consultations of the Britaines intending a revolt, hee allegeth their arguments, whereof one was the sudden departure of Caesar out of this Land, little better then a flight. With whom Dion Cassius also agreeth, affirming that Caesar got nothing in Brittain besides the honour and renowne of that voyage, and sight of that Country, until then unknown to the Romans. And againe (saith hee) Caesar departed thence having done no memorable act, which caused the Brittaines to be secure and careless to provide themselves against his second entrance. Whereby is apparent (even by Romane Writers) both the bold resistance that the Brittaines made, and the deare subjection that the Romans bought. But in matters so farre past, it is hard for mee to auouch any thing resolutely, vntill I could meet with that aged Brittain whom Mr. Asper conferred with here in Brittain (as Quintilian writeth) who auowed that hee was in the British Campe when they did beat Caesar from the shore.

(14) Such was that of Spurinus his diuiner, that forswore him of great danger, which should ouer-passe the Ides of March. And Suetonius out of Cornelius Balbus reporteth, that on the eleuenth of March of Capua, disordered by few months before, was found a Table of brasse, wherein was written the manner of his murder, and the revenge that should follow: his owne dreames the night before, wherein he seemed to lye in the clouds, and to shake hands with Iupiter: as also his vices, that thought him slained in her armes, and to be all bloody in her bosome. Besides many other obseruances both of beasts and birds, and that in such plentie, that it yielded sufficient matter for Ouid the Poet to furnish and fill vpon the latter part of his last booke of Metamorphosis. His feature, qualities and fortunes, are by them thus described: Of personage to be tall, strong, and well limmed, faire, and full faced, with blacke

cies, and bald headed, to cover which he usually wore the Triumphal Laurel Garland. He was well learned, and therewithall very eloquent: and although so great a warrior, thirsting after fame, yet would he be easily reconciled to his enemies, yea and often times seeked the means first himselfe. And hee held it no lesse valour to subdue his wrath, then his enemy: as likewise in his disasters hee was of great temper and moderation, in somuch that Seneca writeth of him, that whiles he was in Britaine, hearing newes of his daughters death (which was lamented as a great losse to the whole State) hee conquered that sorrow as easily and as quickly as hee subdued all things where ever he came. And of his other moderatenesse, Cæsar (who then held the second place of honour and command in the Armie) writeth, that though Cæsar was then so great and glorious a Commander, yet he was so farre from outward pompe, as that when he came into Britannie hee had onely three servants to attend him.

(15) In his enterprises hee was both valiant and fortunate, and is therefore singled out for an Idea or

And therefore with lesse dishonour did nations submit themselves unto him; and this of Britaine with them, whose lay being cast among the hazards of the world, was drawn with an equall chance, as therest, and yielded their freedomes with in hard conditions, as did Countries of more extent, and Kingdomes of greater account. CHAPTER III.

fter the death of Cæsar, thus slain in the Senate, Octavian (the grand-child of Julius Cæsar's sister) whom hee had adopted, and declared his heire, returned vnto Rome from Apollonia, where he studied Philosophie, intending to prosecute the reuenge of Cæsar's death; where falling at oddes with Marcus Antonius a man of great spirit and power, and setting himselfe against Brutus and Cassius, with their Complices, for the murder of his vncle, secretly wrought the friendship of the Citizens, before whose eyes also Cæsar's wounds seemed yet to bleed.

(2) These factions thus begun, grew to such height, that in the Senate-house their causes were pleaded, and by the indignation and eloquence of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Antonius was proclaimed enemy to the State: against whom Octavian was sent, with Ensignes of Consul, and title Properator, being yet not twentie yeeres of age; which duty and office he so well discharged in the parts of a valiant Captaine, that Antony was forced out of the field, albeit in this battle the one Consul was slain, and the other deadly wounded. For which service so effected, he entered Rome in Triumph, though the glory thereof was much blemished, being obtained but in an intestine and ciuill warre, Marcus Antonius, to recouer himselfe, and make good his cause, joined friendship with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Capaine of the horse, who together interpreted themselves against Octavian's proceedings; but by mediation of friends all three were reconciled, and jointly created that forme of government which thence was named the Triumvirat: for the establishment whereof they had severall iurisdictiones assigned them; to Lepidus, Africa, whereof he was present Gouverneur; to Antony, the Countries as well of Greece as Asia, that lay betwixt the Ionian Sea, entering at the gulf of Venice, vnto the river Euphrates: and vnto Octavian all these West parts of Europe, amongst which this our Britaine was one.

(3) In these ciuill broiles, and bandings of great men (as Tacitus termeth it) the State of Britaine lay long forgotten, and stood in peaceable termes, Augustus thinking it wisdom (saith he) to reframe the infinite desire of enlarging the Roman Empire, whose ex-

ness, when Rome was with an uniuersall subiection acknowledged the absolute Lady of the knowne earth. For so in S. Luke wee read, that this Augustus then first ruled the world. A text most strong for the full dissolution of the foure foregone Kingdomes represented in Daniels Image, by the fall of this Rome Christ, the rocke and stay of our eternall happinesse.

(7) This Emperour raigned in great honour the space of fifty six yeeres, and was obeyed both by the Eastern Indians, and the Northerne Scythians, with the subiection of the Parthians, a fierce and vntamed people, and generally with the loue of all. Hee was a Prince indowed with great wisdom, magnanimitie, and justice; yet faulty in this, that he rooke from Tiberius Nero his wife Linia, both great with child, and hauing also formerly borne him a sonne. Devout hee was in the worship of the Romane Gods; amongst whom in the Capitol he built an Altar vnto the Hebrew childe, with this inscription: The Altar of the first begotten Sonne of God: being thereunto moued by the Oracle

Of Stature he was hnt low, and of a good complexion; gray-eyed, his haire sonewhat yellow, and his body freckled with spots, which as his flatterers would haue the world beleue, were in forme like starres. Predictions foreshewing his gouernment and death are alleged, the which I willingly ouerpasse, holding most of them rather fantasies then truth. At his death hee demanded of the standers by, whether he had well acted the enterlude of his life vpon the stage of this world: and died foureteen yeeres after Christ his incarnation, leauing after him so honourable an estimation of his glory, that as the succeeding Emperours in remembrance of Iulius Cæsar gloried to be called Cæsars, so they ever held the name of Augustus to be sacred, and only besitting persons destinated to imperiall Maestie. TIBERIVS.

CHAPTER IV.

Augustus Cæsar thus gloriously rainging, and peaceably dying, had ordained for his successor Tiberius Nero, the sonne of Tiberius the Patritian, and of Linia his wife, whom (as we said before) he had taken for his Empresse, and by whole incitements and continuall insinuations that matter was procured: though Suetonius thinketh, it was by Augustus his owne ambitious conceit, to make himselfe the sooner misfed, and the more lamented, in leauing his sonne so vnlike him to succede, whose conditions as they stood vpon their owne basis, hee knew to bee both reproachable, and also contemptible.

(2) But before the deareh of Cæsar could be divulged, to write his imperiall stile as it were in blood, he began with the murder of young Agrippa the sonne of Iulia daughter to Octavian, and once his owne wife, and continued his raigues with such tyrannie, that many he slaughtered, without respect of person or cause, and in his loofest lasciuiousnesse, thought of nothing but how to subuert the Nobilitie; for rare it was in his daies that any such deed a naturall death: and maintaining a race of men (Procurators, as Tacitus termes them, found out for a common overthrow and destruction of others) assured them by rewards to accuse the rich, though guiltles; so only this fauour granted to the condemned, that if they slew themselves before the day of execution, their bodies should haue buriall, their goods not confiscate, and their testament stand good in law.

(3) A great dissembler he was, seeming euer to hate those vices which in truth he lored, and to loue those vertues which he did most deadly hate: and for life and libidinous filthinesse so extreme, that a Christian pen may not expresse, when the Heathen themselves doe blasphe to name such things as hee showed not openly to commit: his publike drunkennesse, and continuall banquettings, whereat hee spent whole daies and nights together without intermission, caused exchange of names from Tiberius Nero to Biberius Nero.

Mens. Dissolute and careless he was in government, though some have accounted him a wife and politic Prince: for the Provinces he left to defend themselves, and yet daily charged them with larger Tributes, to their great impoverishment, and almost utter ruine.

(4) In this state, amongst others neglected, Britain stood, wherein Tiberius neither maintained garrison, nor attempted alteration, and whereby (as it may be thought) their owne Lawes and Princes bare sway amongst themselves, howsoever the cause for Tiberius was ballized betwixt them. And most certaine it is, the Britaines, if not in subjection, yet were well affected to the Romans, as appeareth by Tacitus in the kinde entertainments, and in relieving their shipwrecked soldiers, that in crossing the Sea were by tempest driven vpon their Coasts, and courteously sent thence by their petty Kings vnto Germanicus their Generall. Notwithstanding, Jeffrey Monmouth seemeth to affirme the contrary, that bringeth the reign of one Guidicus, and the valour of Arviragus, the sonnes of Cunobelin (of whom more hereafter) to withstand the Romish Command, and vterly to refuse the payment of Tribute, banding both against Tiberius, as also against Caligula and Claudius the Emperours succeeding.

(5) Other remembrances of these times concerning vs finde we none, besides that which is common to all, namely the death of our Saviour Christ, which vnder this Tyrant, and in his eighteenth yeere was accomplished by the proceeding of his (as wicked) Deputy Pentus Pilate, who hath admitted him to die, and to be quicke of departing death: whereby was wrought the myserie of our Redemption, with such signes and evidences of his Deitie, that the wicked Iudge himselfe wrote thereof to Tiberius, and hee to the Senate, to haue him consecrated among the Roman Gods. Which they refused to doe, that the wisdom and diuine power of God in the doctrine of Saluation should not need the allowance and commendation of men, as Eusebius hath well obserued.

(6) Finally, when hee had reigned hated of all men the space of three and twenty yeeres, with no better liking then is read of Ioram King of Iudah, that liued without being desired, hee was smothered to death (as is thought) by Caligula, the thirteenth of the Kalends of April, the yeere from Christ's Nativity thirty nine, and the seventy and eighth of his owne age. He was of personage tall, and of body strong, broad chested, and vied both his hand alike, faire of complexion, but great and goggle-eyed, whereby he saw so cleerely as is incredible to report.

1.9.447.3.

Ut Claudius Drusus a man of better spirit and temperance, immediately upon the death of Caligula, and even in the height of those disturbances, by the Pretorian Soldiers (who were encamped nere the walls of Rome) was nominated, and chosen Emperor, whereas the Senate had decreed and determined to reduce the City into her ancient liberty, without admission of any Caesar, or submission to such absolute and sole authority; notwithstanding, the power of this Army, and the vote of the City so prevailed, that the election was confirmed, and the Imperial dignity by him assumed, as the next, and only man to whom it must of right belong: whose father Drusus was the sonne of Livia, wife to Augustus, to whom the Emperours succeeding held it a glory to be any waies allied.

The Britains devoted their Tributes.

(2) In his first proceedings with the Proetorians, hee determined waite against the Britains, whose Tribute had bene a long time neglected, and whose submission was now to be feared: all of them being raised in a tumultuous uprore. The cause pretended was certain fugitives, (the betrayers of their State, and liberties) lately departed, and by the Romans received with protection of the Emperour: a matter that moved them to great discontent, and served as a snare for their iult reuolt.

(3) Claudius, as ready to prevent the worst, being thereto further incited by Seneca one of those British fugitives as Dion reporteth, in the second year of his Empire, and from Chrysipps Natusse forty five, sent Aulus Plautius a Roman Senator, well experienced in the affairs of waite, to take charge of the Army remaining in Gallia, and with those old trained Soldiers to make ouer into Britaine to reaine their obedience. Which seruice upon them thus imposed, was generally dislik'd, as apparently was shew'd by their unwillingness thitherward, muttering and complaining, that they must now be enforced to make waite out of the world, and protracting time, could hardly bee drawne forward, though the Emperour lent his second command.

(4) But being at last embarked and crossing the Seas, their shippes were beaten with contrary winds, which still added discouragements vnto their proceedings, and had not an accident the same time happened, the edge of their courage had bene more abated: for even in this distraction suddenly a fiery leane shot it selfe from East to West, the same way that their shippes made Gile: which presently gaue hopes to their despairing hearts, being heathenly interpreted for a signe of good lucke, and so sent from their Gods, whereupon without any resistance, they came to shore and took land.

(5) The Britains that mistrusted no such sudden ionation, and now thus surpris'd vnawares, disperdely secur'd themselves in woodes and manishes, thereby to detract time, and the more to wearie the Enemy by delayes which thing Plautius well perceiued, and with much labour, and hazard followed to extremely, that many he slew, and tooke prisoner Catrautus their Captaine, the son of Camobeline but lately decaied, which brought such terror amongst the Britains, that thereupon the BODVNI, the inhabitants of Oxford and Gloucestershires, yielded themselves to Plautius deuotion: for which seruice thus effected, the Senate decreed his Triumphs; and it is probable that this defeat of the Britaine forces, and surpris of their King, fell out in the sixt year of this Emperours reigne, by the reuerse of his money then minted with

(6) But he following still the Enemy, being seconded by Flavius Vespasian (afterward Emperour) the leader of the second legion (the foundation of whose succeeding fortunes was first laid here in Britaine) gaue them againe another overthrow. The chiefeft meanes whereof was a poliack they had gotten to gill the Chariot horses, whereby their riders were murthered, and their whole powers disordered: many Britaines in this battaile were slain, and more in danger, had not the night ended the skirmish.

(7) The next day the battaile was againe begun and maintained on both parts with equal aduantage, till C. Silius Geta enforced the Britaines to retire, whereby the victory rested in the Romanes: for which exploit Triumphall honours were assigned him, although he had not yet attained to the Consular degree. In this Conflict, Vespasian hardly escaped, being fore oppressed by the Enemy, and in such fort, that had not Titus (his renowned sonne) come to relieve, he had beene slain, whose valour after: was tried in one and thurty battailes, and in the Conquest of the Ile of Wight.

(8) After this conflict, the Britaines withdrew themselves into places of more aduantage, and in the mouth of Thames betwixt her fall into the Sea, passed the shallows and firme grounds in Essex, whereas the Romanes ignorant of both, brought many into danger, and in their distressed passage, were sharply assailed by the Enemy, in which tumult, a bloody battaile was begunne, wherein Togodannus a British Prince, brother to Catragat, and sonne to Cunobeline, was slain: Notwithstanding, the courage of the Britains was nothing abated, but rather exasperated to a further reuenge: for effecting whereof, new forces were gathered, and confluence of people assembled from each part of the Ile. Plautius the Lieutenant being daily the increafe of their power, Vespasian impliued in other parts, and himselfe furnished in a place of danger, proceeded no further, but sent word to the Emperour of the doubtfull estate of their affaires.

(9) At that time (saith Suetonius) the Senate had by decree allowed Claudius his Triumphall ornaments. But he supposing that such a hore title of honour was inferior to the Maiestie of an Emperour, and willing of himselfe also to enterprife some exploit whereby he might winne the glory of a compleat Triumph, made choice before all other Provinces, of Britaine, attempted by none since Iulius Caesar of famous Memory. And with great strength entered into the journey, hauing with him a mightie Armie both of horse and foote, as also Elyphintia, a beait of great bignesse and barthen, whose intrancible then amazed the Britaines, and whose Carcases falling in this Land, their late found bones (no doubt) haue bred our error, being supposed to be of men, and not of beafts.

(10) With very great danger he passed the Seas, and joining strength with his Lieutenant and Vespasian, they all together crossed the River Thames, where presently they were encountered by the Britaines, who a while maintained the battaile very desperately, but in the end gaue place and fled, whom the Romanes pursued down to their strong Canaledunum, then the seat of Aulemus, a Cunobeline sonne, as may be coniectured by the Medal of Britannicus the Emperours darling, figured in the front of this Chapter, which Citie they surprisid and fortified with their owne Garrisons, which the Emperour in the eleventh of his reign, as appeareth by the other coine, turned to a Colony of Roman Citizens. Claudius now disarming the Britaines, remitted further punishment either vpon their bodies or confiscation of their goods: The which his favourable clemencie moued those distressed Britaines to such liking and love, that they erected a Temple and Altar in his name, and gaue him diuine honour, as a God: The rest as vnable to resist, professed their submission, and promised a peaceable subiection vnder the Romanes gouernement.

sixe months Claudius in his ninth yeare returned and entered Rome in triumph with more then viuall manner, stamping againe vpon his monies his Arch of victory, as appeareth in the face of this Chapter, a perpetuall trophie of his victories and memory of ourirruade. After whose Triumphall Chariot rode Mesfalina his wife, the Mistress of her sexe for impudencie and lasciuious life: and vpon the topp of his Palace he placed a Nauall Ceremony in memoriall of the ocean by him failed oner, and subdued: withall assuming to himselfe, and sonne, the Surname Britanicaus: And honoured Plautius with his presence in his Triumphs for Britaine, giuing him the right hand, ascending the Capitol, and besides graced diuers Captaines that serued vnder him in that warre with Triumphall Ornaments. So great an echeuue was held of the Conquest of so small a part of this Island.

(12) The British Historians relate these things farre otherwise, reporting that their King Arminius, the yongest sonne of Kymbeline, withrood Claudius in his enterprife, with whom (say they) he came to composition by giuing him his daughter Genissa in marriage, in memorie whereof, he built the Citie Gloucester according to his name, which now is called Gloucester: But Suetonius writing the life of Claudius, his wives and children, nameth his daughters onely to be Claudia, Antonina, and Octauia, without mention of Genissa at all, and therefore not likely to haue any such: And Dion Cassius reporteth that Claudius himselfe staied not aboute sixteene daies in Britaine, a time too short for the sending to Rome, and the neede for the returne with his daughter, or for the building of so great a Citie as Gloucester is. Neither indeede was Arminius knowne in the daies of Claudius: But rather liued in the time of Domitian the french in rebellion after him, as plainly appeareth by Iustens the Poet, in those his verses spoken to Domitian, which elsiu here we cited. Whereby appeareth that the stirres of this King could not accord with Claudius, and that the truth of this report is much weakened from more sufficient authorities. But to proceede, Aulus Plautius (the first Lieutenant authorised ouer the Britaines, vpon some occasion was the neede reuoked, the warres not quieted, and with a small Triumph (as Tacitus saith) entered Rome. Vnto him succeeded P. Ostorius Scapula, for reputation in martiall affaires nothing his inferior, who at his first landing found all an vprore: Of whose proceedings let vs heare Tacitus speake: The Britaines (saith he) that were yet unconquered, ranged the Countreies of the confederates, presuming both vpon the approach of the winter, and the Proprietors consequence with his Army. But he knowing that the first successe breedeth either feare, or confidence, gathered the Coherts, and made towards the Enemy, slaying all that made head against him, and disarming those whom hee most suspected. And to retaine Cogidunus the King in stricter assurance and fidelity to the Emperour, granted diuers Cities and States to him by way of Donzation.

The first that beganne to stirre, were the Deceans, the Inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntington-shires, a strong people vnshaken with warre: And with them (at their instigation) their neighbors adioining. These together chose a fit place for fight, compassed in with a rude, but defensible trench, which had only one narrow entrance whereby the Harlemes must be much impeached. This Rampire notwithstanding the Roman Captaine, with the onely aide of the Albion brake downe, and disordered the Enemy euen in this their owne fortreffe, who freing all passages for escape to bee stopped vp, (Ostorius hauing hemmed them in with Garrisons betwene the Ruurs: Antonia and Sabrina) shewed great valour in defending themselves, and

and by their deaths gave place to the Romans. This overthrow and slaughter of the Irish wrought a more staid resolution in those that before were warring between warre and peace. And the Army led against the Cangi, with wife and spoile consumed the Country, the inhabitants not daring to bee scene in field. Whereupon the Romans pierced thorow the Land even unto the Sea-coast that looks towards Ireland.

A small refuge was made by the Brittains, but without much trouble some quitted by the execution of some few, and pardoning of the rest.

(13) But the Silures (that is, those of South-wales) could not be brought to beare the Romany of submission, who besides their owne courage relied much vpon the strength and valour of their Prince Caradac, whose Coine we have here expressed a man which had waded thorow many dangers, and in many adventures both prosperous and luckie had gotten such reputation, that hee was preferred before all the British Captains. This General knowing his owne strength vnable to match the enemy, by police thought to supply that want, and having advantage of the Country, remooued the warre vnto the Ordinices, which is now North-wales, where all joined to him that either feared or dilained to hold peace with the Romans. Heere he chose a place to encampe his host, even on the top of a hill naturally defended from access: and where any doubt was, there he stopped up all passage with heapes of stones in manner of a Rampire; neere the foot whereof ran a River with a foord somewhat dangerous, and not easily found, where a troope of his best soldiery were set in order to recuse the Enemies.

The more to animate their mindes, the Leaders were about exhorting and encouraging the Souldiers, taking all occasions of feare from them, and putting them in hope, with all inducements of resolution: especially Caradac, who courting hither and thither, protested that day and that battle should bee the beginning either of a recovered libertie, or else a perpetuall seruitude and bondage: and ever hee called vpon the names of his valiant Ancestors, who formerly had chased Caesar the Dictator out of the Isle, by whose valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioied freely their wives and childrens bodies vndetiled. The Souldiers also themselves shewed as great forwardness, and as Rebels redoubled his words, swearing according to the Religion of their Country, power to yield for wounds or life, which they all were ready to sacrifice in the cause of their libertie. This their apparant resolution much appalled the Romans chiefeales and most of all the Captains and Leaders, who before their faces flew the River, on both sides of them had the hanging hills, and the Fort commodious for the enemy, but deadly vnto them: all which notwithstanding the common Souldiers despised, and demanded the battle. Ostorius, whose studie was chiefly to performe the parts of a General, passed the River with some little difficulty, and leading his Armie up to the Rampire, was met with such a shew of odds, that many therewith were wounded and slaine. Yet at length breaking downe those rude compacted stones, joined battle with the enemy, and afront came close to handy strokes, wherein the Brittains having better courage then armor (for they had neither headpiece nor coat of defense) were fore galled with their fauelling and two-handed swords, and so disordered, that they betooke themselves to flight.

(14) This victorie as it was almost vnexpected, so was it made famous by the taking of Caradac wife, daughter, and brethren, and himselfe flying for succor and protection to the Druides, was (as we haue before shewed) by Carismandus their Queen betrayed and deliuered into the hands of the Conquerours after his nine yeeres most generous resistance. Whereupon his fame being carried ouer the Islands, and spread abroad thorow the Prouinces, was also renowned in Italy, and they desired to see him that so many yeeres had contemned their forces. Neither was his name nearly effected of at Rome; for whilst Caesars worth and power was there commended, a more glorious conceit was held of the conquered Caradac: and against his coming to the Citie the people from all parts were assembled, as to behold some notable and most rare spectacle. The Emperors Guard in armes and good order were placed in the field before the Campe, thorow whom the Captiues and Trophies were carried, and presented after this manner: first the vassals of Caradac going foremost bowed their bodies to the people as they passed, and seemed by their ruefull countenances to discover the sense of their calamitie. The caparisons, his chaines, and other spoiles gotten in the warres, were carried after them. Then Caradac his brethren, wife, and daughter followed, and last of all himselfe, whose attire and stout behauiour filled the peoples eyes with wonder and delight. His body, for the most part, was naked, and painted with figures of diuers beasts. Hee wore a chaine of iron about his necke, and another about his middle: the haire of his head hanging downe in curled lockes, couered his backe and shoulders, and the haire of his upper lip parted on both sides, lay vpon his breast. Neither was his behauiour lesse noted then the strangeness of his habit: for he neither hung downe his head, as daunted with base feare; nor cringed mercie, as the rest; but with a confident spirit, and bold countenance, held on till he came before the Imperial Seat, where making his stand, and a while beholding Caesars Majesty, at last with great courage spake to this purpose.

(15) If my modestie in prosperitie had beene answerable to the greatness of my birth and estate, or the success of my late attempts to the resolution of my minde, I might haue come to this Citie rather as a friend to be entertained, then as a Captive to be gazed vpon; neither wouldst thou disdain to haue recieued me on termes of amitie and peace, being a man of roiall descent, and a Commander of many warlike Nations. But what cloud sooner hath darkened my present lot, yet haue the Heauens and Nature giuen mee that in birth and minde, which none can vanquish, or deprive mee of. I well see, that you make other men miseries the subiect and matter of your triumphs; and in this my calamitie, as in a mirror, you now contemplate your owne glory. Yet know that I am, and was a Rome furnished with strength of men and abilliments of warre; and what maruell is it if all bee lost, seeing experience teacheth that the events of warre are variable, and the success of policies guided by vn-certain fates? As it is with me, who thought that the deepe waters like a wall inclosing our Land, and it so situated by heauenly prouidence, as in another world, might haue beene a sufficient priuilege and defense for vs against foraine incursions: but I now perceiue that the desire of sovereignty admits no limitation; and if you Romans must command all, then all must obey. For mine owne part, while I was able I made resistance, and unwilling I was to submit my necke to a seruile yoke, so farre the law of Nature alloweth every man, that he may defend himselfe being assailed, and to withstand force by force. Had I at first yielded, thy glory and my ruine had not bene so renowned. Fortune hath now done her worst: wee haue nothing left vs but our liues, which if thou take from vs, our miseries end; and if thou spare vs, wee are but the objects of thy Clemencie.

umph over Carallatus, manifested matter of discourse and admiration through out all Rome, and the Lords of the Senate held it no less honourable, than that of P. Scipio, who triumphed over Syphax the Numbidian King, or that of Perfes, whom Paulus Aemilius vanquished, or then any other King that had been taken in warre, or exhibited to the view of the people. Then were also publicke Triumphall honours decreed for Offitius; whose fortunes untill then had beene very prosperous, but now began to be doubtfull, or rather to decline, either because Carallatus (the foile of his glory) was removed, and thereupon (as though all had beene subdued) a more circelsse service entertained, or else the courage of the Britains was more inflamed to revenge through the fierceest compaffion of the fall of so mighty a King.

(17) For immediately they enuironed the Camp-maister and the Legionary Cohorts, which were left to build fortresses in the Country of the Silures, whom with eight Centurians, and the forwardest Souldiers, they slew, and had put all the rest to the sword, if rescue had not speedily come from the villages and forts adjoining. The Ferragers also and troope of horse that were sent to aid them they put to flight. These affronts touched Offitius to the quick, and left their aids should grow to a greater head, he sent forth certaine light-armed companies, which with the Legionary Souldiers undertooke the battle, and with small oddes was it continued till the night came, and parted them: diuers other Sheriffes afterwards were made, though for the most part in woods and marshes, whence taking their advantage in fallying forth, they many times prevailed, sometimes by strength, sometimes by meere courage, and sometimes by chace; neither were they awaies commanded by their Captaines, but many times fought voluntary and without warrant.

(18) The principal motive that induced the rest to take Armes, was the example of the Silures, who were most resolutely bent, as being exasperated by certaine speeches that the Roman Emperour himselfe had uttered, which was, that as the name of the Sugambri was destroyed, and the people transported into Gallia, for the memorie of Silures yet vterly be extinguished: And in this hate as men desperat (whose destinies were read and lots cast already) they interpreted the scattered troopes of the Romans that vncircumspectly walked and spoiled the Country, taking of them many prisoners, and reconering rich booties, which they sent and distributed amongst their neighbours; whereby many other were drawne to revolt: These proceedings sore to neere Offitius his heart, who with long cares and trauchs had wearied his spirits, spent the strength of his bodie, and thereunto had now added the discontentment of his minde, that in these vexations hee gave vp the Ghost, the Silures reioicing that so worthy and victorious a Captaine was fallen in their warres.

(20) But Vennius a very expert man in Militarie affaires (truly to the Romans, and defended by their power so long as the marriage betwix him and Cartimandua continued) began a new rebellion: for Cartimandua (in speciall fauour with the Romans for the delivery of Carallatus) abounding in wealth, peace, &

pleasures (which commonly are the Nurles of licentious living) fell in loue (as before was touched) with Velleatus her bulbands seruant, and harnesse-bearer, & forgetting her owne honour, preferred him before Vennius, and laboured to make him King. The good-will of the Country notwithstanding went generally vpon the lawfull husband: who being deeply touched with this open iniurie, raised a power against her and her Parasite. At the first this quarrell was onely betwixt them, untill that Cartimandua by policie had taken her husbands brother, and some of his neere kindred, prisoners. Whereupon the next Inhabitants fearing her purposes, and dreading to be brought vnder the yoke of the Roman so defamed, declared themselves for Vennius, & with a choice band of youthful Souldiers invaded her Territories: whereof Didius hauing intelligence, sent certain Cohorts to second her, and encounter them. In which conflict, the Romans for Cartimandua did preuaile; yet the kingdomes remained to Vennius, and the warres still vnto them.

(21) For the Silures were not altogether quieted, & a Legion commanded by Cassius Nafiga, fought luckily against the Britains. In all which furies Didius in person was absent, as being stricken in yeares, and hauing recieued many honours, held it sufficient to execute his charge by the assistance of others. The State of Brittain thus standing, let vs so leane it, during this Emperours reign, which now began to draw towards his last period, by the working of Agrippina his wife, and by her vpon this occasion.

(22) It chanced, Claudius in his wine, to call forth a word of great suspition, in saying: That it was fitt all vnto him first to beare the leadeness of his wines, Gods then to punish them. She knowing her selfe gailtie in disinheriting Britannicus, who was Claudius his owne sonne, for the adoption of Nero who was hers, besides other infortunities, wherewith he might be taxed, sought therefore to clear her owne way by taking him out of the way: and with Laelia a woman skilfull in poisoning, and Zenophorus a Physician, as large of conscience, conferred for the manner of his death: who in fine, concluded that poison was the surest and the least in suspect, or at leastwise the most difficult to be proued against her.

(23) Thus then resolved, they temper poison in a Mulshrom, whereof he greedily did eate, and shortly after ended his life the thirteenth day of October, when hee had reigned thirteene yeares, eight moneths, and twentie daies, the yeare of Christ his incarnation fiftie fixe, and of his owne age sixtie foure. He was of stature tall, and of a pleasing Countenance, full of Maistie and comely gray haire, his Head continually shaking, somewhat hammering in his speech, very learned, but therewithall very forgetfull, and altogether ruled by his wifes, and domestick Seruants, the two ordinary bases of most men who are adduced to any eminent place of gouernement & command.

(24) This Emperour (saith Seneca) might make his boast that he was the first conqueror of the Britains, for Iulius Caesar did but shew their land vnto the Romans, whereas Claudius made their necks yield to the chains of their captiuitie. And Agrippinus saith thus of Claudius, His wifely is Britain, which lived without the world, but now by him reduced vnder the Roman Empire, and those whom the former ages knew not, neither themselves any seruitude, are now by him both made known and seruants to the Romans. And againe: As great a matter it was to passe these Seas, as to haue triumphed ouer those Britains, whereas (saith he) euens the elements haue done homage vnto Claudius. In loy whereof, and reuerence to the Gods in his triumph he mounted the Chaires of the Capitol vpon his aged knees, being supported and lifted vp by his sons in Law on either side, the glory of this Islands conquest had so possessed this old Emperours mind.

NERO.

CHAPTER VII.

His violent and unexpected death of Claudius, gave breath and life unto Nero's further hopes: for whilst the Consuls were assembled to make supplications for their Prince, (not knowing him already dead) Nero suddenly set open the Palace gates, and accompanied with shouts and acclamations, entered the Courts that kept the watch, where of them and the rest of the soldiers he was saluted Emperor, the Senate as men affrighted with amazement, not once contradicting the same.

(2) He was the sonne of Domitius Nero, and of Julia Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus brother to Claudius the precedent Emperor, vicious by nature, as sprang of those parents from whom (as his owne father Domitius said) no goodnesse could proceede: and the same vile disposition was perfected and augmented by his owne affected study and pursuit of all possible leaudnesse, as one who could well fit his wanton and lascivious humours to the vorapenesse of his yeeres, being not passing leueteene when he assumed the Empire. All religion he had in contempt, and all lawes violated, letting loose the reine to all vnauersall lusts, and licentiousnesse of life.

(4) The City Rome hee set on fire, charging the Christians with the fact, and inflicted such torments and death vpon them, that they were pined of their enemies, and his owne cruelties thereby made more notorious. Whole Religion, though Suetonius tearmed new, and a wicked superstition; and Tacitus (as it were in contempt) nameth the Author thereof to be Christ, who in Tiberius raigne (as he with the Euangelists agreeeth) was put to death vnder Pontius Pilate Procurator of Iudea, where that religion first began; yet by him it is confessed, that these men were innocent of the fact, and their doctrine to burst forth further into many other parts, inasmuch that Rome it selfe did affect the same. Yea and in Nero's Court also some embraced that faith, as by the words of the Apostle is manifest, who from the Saints in Cæsars house sent salutations to the Brethren. Phil. 4. 22.

(5) And lastly, to fill vp the measure of his bloodie crueltie, he crucified Peter vpon the Crosse, and beheaded Paul with the sword, two principall Apostles of Iesus Christ, and worthy instruments of the worlds saluation; and forgetting the Mailetie of his estate, fell into the sinke of contempt and all summes, guining his monde leuue to digest all vnchastenesse, and his bodye over to worke any base exercises, attending nothing besides his Harpes and Hurlets, whereby a carelesse (but yet a cruel) gouernment was intertained, and the Senate fashioning themselves to feed his loose humors, stroue each to outstrip other in their base flatteries.

(6) In this state the Provinces subiections began to stand doubtfull, and the greatnesse of the Empire to overcharge the foundation; for the Parthians vnder Vologeses gaue Patru the Romane a great overthrow, and that in such wise, that those which escaped were teamed the unfortunate Armenie. And in Britaine their affaires proceeded with no good successe; foraged Didius could doe no more then keepe that which he had already gotten: and Veranus his successe, only with small imbroades assailing the Silures, was in his first yeere cut off by death, inasmuch that Nero hauing neither will, motion, nor hope to propagate and enlarge the Empire, minded once to haue with-drawn the forces out of Britaine, had it not bene for very shame.

(7) But Paulinus Suetonius attaining the gouernment of that Province, in skill for seruice, and opinion of people comparable to any, sought to match his conseruent Caracalla, who with daily victories prospered in Armenia, himselfe wanting neither courage nor discretion to achieve the like, only matter and occasion the land afforded none. Therefore determining an expedition into further parts, he made preparation to invade the Ile of Mona, separated from the Continent by the River Mersey, and fronted vpon the midle of Ireland, both strong with inhabitants, and a receptacle of Fugitiues.

(8) Against his approach the Islanders had gathered their powers, which land thicke vpon the shore ready

readie armed to make resistance, their women running among in mourning weeds, their haire loose, and firebrands in their hands, like furies of hell, together with their Druides (men of religion) who with hands and eyes lifted up towards heaven, cried for vengeance, and powdered out curses as thicke, as hail. With the strangeness of which sight the Romans stood amazed, not offering one stroke, forming rather to protect themselves for a pray vpon their enemies weapons, then for the Conquest of their land or liues; which sudden and vnexpected discouragement, their Captaine soone redressed, by putting them in remembrance of their wonted valours, which now was farre outmatchable vnto a fearefull flocke of weakke women, or a company of frade and franckie men: whereupon their Druides were displaced, and the Romans presently dispersed and slaine, themselves becoming maistrs both of the field and whole Ile: which no sooner was thus obtained, but sudden armes came to recall their powers, the Princes being called to a present meete.

(9) For the Britaines in absence of the Generall, laid open their publike griouances growne now both common and intolerable by the oppressions of the Romans, who from the diseases of their Head, had sicked and dispersed their corruptions throughout the Provinces of the Empire: and Catus Decianus the Procurator here in Britaine, renewed the confiscation of their goods, which Claudius had formerly remitted. The Romanes Colonies at Camelodunum, thrust out the ancient Inhabitants, seating themselves in their possessions without any other recompence, sating reprochfull termes, calling them their drudges, slaves and vassalls: besides the Temple there erected in honour of Claudius, was now become an ensigne vnto them, as an Altar of their perpetuall fabrication, while the Angels Priests there attending, washed all their wealth vnder pretext of Religion. But the very spring or head, from whence the cause of this sudden Rebellion issued, was the pretence abuse offered to a Brude, Quene of the Islemon, late wife to Prasutagus, deceased vpon the insuing occasion.

(11) Whereas upon the Islemon began seriously to discourse of their present misery and bondage, made subiect not onely to a Luxuriant that sucked their blood, but likewise to a Procurator, that sought their subuance, while with a ferule fear they yielded to please the meane Souldiers: As though the Heauens had framed them onely for seruitude, and the Earth appointed to beare their inuents vntreuenged, whereas contrariwise, they saw both heauen & earth flexible to their deuilerance: For (whether by policie or chance) the Image of victorie at Camelodunum fell downe reuered without any apparant cause knowne: the women dilturbed with furie, ranne in the streets, singing, and prophesying disfranchises: strange noises were heard in the Court, and howlings in the Theatre, and strange apparitions, and Edifices scene in the Riuer Thames: the German selfe betwene Gallia and them, seemed all bloodie, and the prints of dead bodies left in the sand at the Elbe. Again, washing the present estate, they saw Suetonius absent, and bailed to enlarge the Confines, the mult but slenderly guarded, and by those who were readier for private game, then diligent to discharge the office of warre. The examples of other Provinces also whetted the edge of their encouragements: for Germany (they saw) had well shaken off the yoke of subuallion: The Parthians had reuol-

ted, and Armenia held play with Corbala, as famous as Paulinus: Their cause was as iust, their land as well defended: their armies as valiant in resisting the first King-leader Caesar, and themselves better experienced of their adversaries powers, and their owne abilities. So now hauing attained the hardest point, which was their assembled Confederations (a matter of as great danger to be taken with, as in assisting their intendments) in fine this was resolved, that liberty was to be preferred, though bought with their liues, and bondage to bee avoided, if not otherwise then by their deaths.

(12) These their often and sooted assemblies brought suspitions of some designements, and the prodiges daily happening as they were mooues of encouragements vnto the Britaines: So were they ominous signes to the Romans, of either part framed in their owne imaginings, and confirmed according to their hoped or feared conies.

(13) The Confederates in this businessse were not to lacke their Leader: their Queenes dissemblers so apparently knowne, (and for matter of government they made no difference of sex) her birth extracted from their Isle Island, her heartes affection appressed to her Countrey, her indignities recruited of the proud appetites, and her haughtie spirit threatening vengeance, assured them of her victorious rule: which accordingly she effected to her dying day, and so her poster dying fame.

(14) The Romans likewise prouided themselves, and in the absence of Suetonius, craved aide of Catus Decianus the Procurator, who sent them not above two hundred men, and those but badly armed. These joining with the rest made no great powerfull of them relying more to the franchise of the place, then securing themselves with Trenches or Battlements: And giuen ouer to pleasure, and play, as in the time of publike peace. Which aduantages by the Enemy were wisely girded, and by Badus coming on as nobly purposed, when with sword and fire he wasted all in her way, the Temple onely excepted, whereinso part of the Souldiers were fled, but after two daies siege it was battered and taken.

(16) For in this heat of blood and furie they set vpon, and sacked the free-towne Ferolacium, both strong for garrison, and rich in treasures: which Cities (as also Camelodunum) had felt the rage of their mercilesse hands, from whence great booties were carried, and no lesse then franchise they saued Citizens and Confederates flame. This commotion in Britaine by Suetonius Tranquillus is accounted one of the most unfortunate losses to the Empire happening vnder Nero, and the more inimiculous to the Romans (as Dion obserueth) in that it was performed under the command of a woman, neither experienced in the feates of warre, nor vnder the will according to the Law of Armes: for not any prisoner taken in regard of ranfome was liued, nor intercouise of exchange admitted, but kill, hang, burne, and crucifie, as though the measure of their vengeance could neuer be sufficiently heaped, or the wish of their Gods satisfied with the blood of their Enemies.

(17) By this time Suetonius the Lieutenant was returned, and taking muller of his forces in London (a City euen then famous for concourse of Merchants, and of great renouue for prouision of all things necessary) jury) stood yet doubtful whether hee should chuse that place for the seat of warre; or no. But better aduising, dislodged his Hog, and with the fourteenth Legion, the Standard-bearers of the twelfth, and other aids from places adjoining, incamped vpon a plaine, enclosed with woods, hauing a narrow entrance, and free from Ambush or enemie at his backe.

(18) The Brittaines likewise, inferior neither in number nor courage, triumphed abroad by such troupes and multitudes, as the like had not bene seen, yea and so force of courage, and with such assistance of hope, that they brought their wines to the place to be witnesses of their valours. Badus in her Chariot doing the parts of a most noble Generall, droue from troope to troope to see and commend their forwardness and dismounting attended with her two daughters, and two hundred and thirty (and so voluate Brittaines got her to a feat made of marishurfes, after the manner of the Romans, appareled in a loose gowne of changeable colours, wearing a kerle thero-under very thicke plated, the tresses of her yellow haire hanging down to the shirts. About her necke shee had a chaune of gold, and in her hand held a light flare, being of perionage tall, and of a comely, cheerful, and modest countenance, and so a while shee stood pawling, in viewing her Armie, and being regarded with a reuerend silence, at length to this effect the spake vnto them.

"(19) My Friends and Companions of equal fortunes, there needeth no exalt for this my prestat authoritie or place, in regard of my Sex, seeing it is not vnknown vnto you all, that the wonted manner of our Nation hath bene to warre vnder the conduct of a woman, and not only ours, but also of the greatest Monarches swaied vpon this vniuersall Globe: for the Empire of the Assyrians (the first and most famous that euer was) vnder the command of Sennacherib triumphed ouer the fierce Atthiopians; and the gold-veined Indus, Babylon for strength and beauty was both defended and enriched by Ninur; her sole Emperesse. The Syrians vnder Tamyr ouercame, and slew the great Conquerour Cyrus. Aegypt governed by Cleopatra: yea and Rome Monarches themselves ruled, if not ouer-ruled, by Messalina and Agrippina the monisters of our Sex. My blood and birth might challenge some preeminence, as spring from the roots of most royall seeds; but by my breath received from the same aire, my body sustained by the same soile, and my glorie clouded with impoiled ignominies. I disclaime all superiouritie, and as a fellow in bondage beare the yoke of oppression, with as heauie waighe and pressure, if not more. Had I with Cassius mother bene suspected of Treason, or with false Artimandus falsed my Bed, to the disturbance of their peace, my goods might haue gone vnder the title of Confiscation, and these prints of the whip vnder pretext of justice. But why name I Iulie in these grand Catalogues of oppressions, whose Alto respect neither person, age, sex, nor cause? For what shal I can be so vile, that we haue not suffered; or condemne so contemptible, that we haue not borne? My stripes, yet felt and scene against their owne lawes, and the violent rapes of these my barmlesse daughters, against the Lawes of God and Man, doe witness what wee government they intend: and your wealths consumed by their wastefull wantonnesse, your painfull travels upholding their idleness, doe scale the issues of our succeeding miseries, if not timely preuented by one ioint endeavour. You that haue knowne the freedom of life, will with me confesse (I am sure) that libertie (though in a poore estate) is better then bondage with fetters of gold: and yet this emparison hath no correspondence in vs: for we now enioy no estate at all, nothing now being ours but what they will leaue vs, and nothing left vs, that they can take away, hauing not so much as our very heads toll-free. Other ibidued Nations by death are quit from bondage; but wee after death

"must liue seruile, and pay tribute even in our graves. Hane the Heathens made vs the ends of the world, and hane not assigned the end of our wrongs? Or hath Nature among all her fierer workes created vs Brittaines only for bondage? Why, what are the Romans? Are they more then men, or immortal? Their flaine carcasses sacrificed by vs, and their perturbed blood corrupting our Aire, doth tell vs they are no Gods. Our perijurages are more tall, our bo-dies more strong, and our joints better knit: and (to say as it is) every part of vs framed more fit for the glorie then for the shade. But you will say they are our Conquerours. Indeed ouercome we are, but by our felices, our enue factious still guing way to their intensions: for bed not the Drutator & Mandabate? Caligula an Admirus? Claudius a Bericus, and Caligula Nero (that drumper, and our still-living shame) Carissimanda? Rome instruments, and Brittaines vipers: without which, you shall see Caligula in single fight, lose his sword, and after flee the Country (a dissoner indelible) Tiberius forgoe his Tribute, though extremely couetous, Claudius glad to make peace, and be quiet: and Nero might still haue followed his fillding trade at home, if our disorders had not made vp his Mischie heere abroad. Our disfines therefore haue bene their only rising, and our disfines still weakened by home-bred conspirators. Neither hath our noble resistance euer bene without our desert and note of honour: their publike triumphs being made more admirable by one Brittaines Conquest, then vntill hath bene foisted ouer whole Kingdomes. Caligula for beholding our cliffs only would haue diuine honours: and for getfull Claudius remembered vnto posterities (in his Britannicus) a glorious surname from vs. Our strength haue bene acknowledged the maine part of other States, and shall it not be supplied to maintain our owne? We haue as much to keepe as birth-right hath giuen vs, that is, our Island possessed by our Ancestors from ant antiquitie: ours by inheritance, theirs by intensions, claimes so different in the scale of justice, that the Gods themselves must needs redreffe, and set the ballance in their equal paye. We haue scene their peripitius beginnings, in making vs instruments of our leuenty thousand of our enemies; and yet in this reuenge our forces not diminished, but much increased in number and power: which thing, as it serues to our encouragements; so is it to their fears. For Catus hath let the Sea (a sure defence) betwixt him and vs; yet not a Brittaines pursuing for any had, he would haue hid himselfe in the waves. Petulus the field-mouse doth keepe his hole, and with the Made works the earth for his safest refuge: And Pastunus their Camp-mayster is too wise to venture all at a cast. Only Plautius belied by his late victorie ouer a company of vaarmed Priests, whose resistance consisted only in prayers, and a few weak women, whose weapons were only fire-brands, baides the hopes of his aspiring maide, as Caligula did his Trophy of Cockle-shells. For see we not him encamped rather to defend his owne, then to offend others? His Armie crouched together, as fowles flocked against a storme, or rather like to fearful Hares squatted in their bushes, who no sooner hail heare the crie of their pursiue, but their Muske or Fortrize will bee left: and for their last refuge, as Hares, truit to the swiftnesse of their speedy feet. Suddenly, as thee was thus speaking, there let lip a Hare which hee had secretly conched in her lappe, which with a great shout escaped thorow the Campe, and gave occasion to the Armie (who little suspected it was done by her of purpose) to construe it as an ominous and luckie signe of victory.

first order had spent all their darts, which with good success they had begunned; but then failing and wearied in their first coming on too hotly, the Romans fellied out vpon the plaine, the Auxiliaries and Haryones with long lances making their way and beating downe all that stood before them, The Britaines unable to endure or withstand such fierce assaults, were forced to giue backe, and at length sought to saue themselves by flight, but were hindered by their owne Waggon placed in the reer-ward of the Army, which gaue the more impediment to their retreat, in that they were then full of their women who in confidence of the victory came thither to behold the fight, which were among the rest all slaine, without regard of sexe or mercie. This day was famous and comparable in renowne for valour to any other of former times, for therein were slaine of the Brittaines to the number of eightie thousand men: And the Land brought vnder an vnrecoverable subiection.

(21) Bolus seeing the overthrow of her Army, was notwithstanding unconquered in her own Noble spirit, and coming to be a Spectacle in their Triumph, or a fall to their wiles, after the example of Cleopatra, she made an end of her miseries and life, by poison. And Pompey Posthumus, Camp-master of the second Legion, seeing the good success of the fourteenth and fourteenth: for that dissolving the Generals contrary to the discipline of warre) he had defended himselfe and followers of their parts of glorie in that service, for very griefe new himselfe: and for their good service there performed, new greatly honoured the eleventh, thirteenth and fourteenth Legions, reposing a most sure trust in their valour and fidelity, ever afterward.

(22) Sarcismus animated with this victorie gathered his Army, & encamped again, purposing to eat the residue of the warre, if any refractors should remaine: And at that present were sent him out of Germanie two thousand Legionarie Soldiers, eight Coborts of Auxiliaries, and a thousand Horse, whereby his strength was augmented, and the north Legion which had become much weakened by the rathnes of Petilius, fully supplied: So that bootlesse it was for the poore Britains to make any further resistance, and such as did, or stood desperately afield, were daily put to the sword. But nothing distressed them so much, as did famine, and want of Corn, being a people in all ages more given to waite then good by boundary, and rather relying vpon the prouisions of others, than by the plough to provide for themselves, fierce of nature, and flowie lending eare to peace, or their minde to such Arts as either nourish, or are nourished by peace.

(23.) In these stirres Julius Cæſar, ſent from Nero to ſucceede Catrin in his office of receipts, an enemy, & at variance with Suetonius, the more to cloud his reuerence, gaue it forth for certaine, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, who without either heſtyle rancour, or pride of a Conquerour, would treat the yeelders with all Clemence: And likewiſe by letters ſent to Rome, he ſignified that no end of warre was to be expected, ſo long as Suetonius remained General, attributing euery aduerſe lucke to his intolerable pride, and euery proſperous ſucceſſe onely to the good fortunes of Cæſar and State of Rome. Theſe Great mens diſſentions awaked Nero, fearing leſt the Britaines, thereby would be more forward to advantage, with whom experience had ſhewed there was no dabbling, and his former loſſes among them being againe reuerſed, he thought himſelfe diſcharged and quit from all ſmall Colanities, as Tranquillus doth affirme. Therefore he ſent Polyclerus, one of his freed ſeruitors, with Commiſſion to examine the differences, and to interpoſe his authoritie to worke a reconciliation: at whoſe greatnes it was alſo thought that the Britaine would haue quaked, and come in vnder feare. Which thing fell out otherwiſe: for howſoeuer the Captaine and Souldiers regarded him for his place, vnto whom he ſhewed himſelfe both arrogant and terrible, yet the Britains made him but their laughing stock, as being themselves borne free, and knew not what the power of freed-men was, much admired that such Commanders and Armies which had achieved so great exploits, could be brought to obey, and yield account of their actions to so base a bondage as they termed him.

(24) But Suetonius growne great by his fortunes in these warres, and as it should seeme both suspected and feared of Nero, was by him commanded (the warres yet continuing) to deliuer vp his Armie to Petronius Turpilianus, who had lately giuen ouer his Cassibelus to Rome, a man of a fobber, and more intreatable condition; and as a blagrato to the faults committed before, readier to receive to fauour and forgive: who having compassed the former troubles, not daring any further, neither egged, nor provoked the Enemies, but gaue himselfe to a quier, or rather idle life, which hee thought might passe vnder the title of an honourable peace. In which citate he gaue vp his charge to Tiberellus Maximus, and after flame by Galba, nothing objected against him, but his faithfulness to Nero, in that he would not betray him, as the rest had done. For Nero now growne odious to God and Man, Conspiracies were continually attempted, though not in act effected, vnill that Iulius Vindex Lieutenant of Galba opposed his proceeding, being the first firer, and the twofold floue that (as Tacitus termes it) troubled Nero out of his Seat.

(25) For hating proclaimed Galla Emperour, an old and weak man, at that time Gnaeus of Armenia, neither priuie to the conspiracie, nor assenting to the title, he set vp daily many bitter and biting Edicts against Her, whereby he was rowled from his lustrations regis, and began to feare the fatal end, whereunto his unhappy life and bloody raigne had now lately brought him, who destitute of all power of resistance, did now let his whole hope and refuge, vpon that meane, to which the compass of his time had euer pointed; for relying onely vpon his skill in Medicine, he intended his flight into Egypt, there to teach the instructions of that Art: into such sudden badness was his misde deiection, that formerly had lasted out beyond all measure in luxurie, pride, and prodigality. Vnto this conspiracie ioined Virginius Rufus Lieutenant of this Germanie, with Nymphidius, Sabinus, and Sophronius Tigellinus, Capaine of the Guard, who after Vindex his death, (which happened vpon an accident euen in his entrance to Armes) maintained the election of Gallus: and the Senate as forward to Neroes destruction, proclaimed him Enemie to the State and pronounced his punishment more mauorant, sending out each way to apprehend him aliue.

(26) In this faine Nero attended with foure seruants onely, had hid himfelfe in a Countrey Cottage, not paffing foure miles from Rome; whence hearing his decreed iudgement, and demanding what was meant by that ſentence, it was answered, that his necke ſhould be locked in the forke of a tree, and his body all naked, whipped to death: whereupon lamenting that to good a Manſervant ſhould be made away, he ran himſelfe through on his ſword, and ſo rid the world of a Monſter.

(27) Of feature he was indifferent, his body full of freckles, his hair somewhat yellow, his countenance rather faire then lovely, his eyes gray and dimme, his noſe faire, his belly bearing out, and his legges ſlender and ſmall; A moſt fullſome Maſtiffe he was, and in that Art fought he excell'd others, and to equalize Apule himſelfe, as alſo in his Chariot-riding to imitate the ſwiftnes of the ſunne. So prodigall in apparell, that he neuer wore one Garment twice, & ſo ſumptuous in building, as is vncredible. He reigned thirteen yeeres and eight daies, and died the eight of June, in the one and thirtieth of his age, and after the birth of our Sauour Chriſt the threeſcore and tenth: as Bayle ſhew'doth account.

CHAPTER VIII.

With the death of this Tyrant, ended the progeny of the Cæsars, and the Emperours succeeding were afterwards elected, either for the opinion of their owne worth, or els, (and that oftner) by the faction and voice of the Souldiers, whose violence the Senate ever feared to contradi-dict, and whose Colonus in euerie Province sought to raise their owne Generall to that high estate. In which time of Combustion, though little be recorded of the British affairs, yet because the March of this Island was then and long after insuited in the Imperiall dominie, we may not omit to speake somewhat of the ensuing Emperours, as the chiefe Gouernours of this kingdom. Vpon Neroes declining, diuers there were (as Vindex and Virginius, Nymphidius and Septhimus) set vp against him, but Galba for his reputed integritie got the Garland from them all: who little dreaming of the Imperiall Diademe, fortune set it vpon his head before his hand had toucht the same: for Vindex in Gallia hauing proclaimed him Emperour, and him selfe in Arragon not free from Neroes hatred, bee fought rather to hazard his life with the Glorie of a Crowne, then depend vpon his mercie, who had sent secretly the sentence of his death. And therefore mounting the Tribunall, the more to im presse a fresh remembrance of former cruelties, he placed before his throne, the Images of certaine Nobles executed by Nero, with some personages sent for out of exile, whose presence might provoke a deeper edge of hatred; and his Army about him ready for mutation, these, or the like words he spake.

(2) My fellow Souldiers and friends, wee at this time are assembled, to bestow that vpon others, which wee our selves have finally enioied, I meane, libertie from bondage, and freedom from feares of a Tyrant. The life that I haue hitherto lead, will sufficiently discharge me from any aspiring conceit, and my owne Conscience doth witness that I speake not vpon malice or priuate respects: It grieueth me to lye, but it booties not to hide, that which euery man seeth. Hath euer Romans vnder a cruell master passed a yeere of harder seruice, then we haue done fourteene vnder Nero? what kind of exaltation hath he not proued to supply with extortion, that which with shame hee hath spent? what kinde of crueltie hath hee not practised? If we would concale or seeke to suppress it, these dumb stones would declare them: For behold, he poisoned his Father and brother, abused and slew his owne mother, murdered his wife, his Tutor, and what els is euer valiant or vertuous in Senate, in Ci- tie, in Province, without any difference of Sex or Age. I neede not to speake of the sorrowfull sight, and bitter teares of so many yong gentlemen bereft of their fathers, so many wiues robbed of their haubands, so many great men deprived of their Country, all which cry vengeance vpon such a Prince: a Prince? nay an Incendiarie, a Singer, a Fidler, a Stage-plaier, a Cart-driver, a Crier, no Prince, nay no man; that hath a man to his husband, and a man to his wife, but a monster of mankind: And in truth a subiect, vpon whom, shee hath made her full experience, and raised her triumphs from the base of Cæsars throne. Against whom, what Vindex in France hath already intended, I am sure you doe know, and I, for my part, am most sorrie to heere. The whole course of my former life hath bene hitherto removed from Ambition in Court, or from aiming too high abroad, and this little that remains of my daies, I could hardly will were to be spent in more ease: But sith I know not by what my misfortune, some haue imposed vpon me a Part which I neuer meant to sustaine, and least of all at this age, I will not refuse, if you will also approve it, to discharge this old Caresse of mine for the wealth of my Country, not as Emperour or Augustus (which seuerd names I adore alar off, not daring to approach them) but as — — — And no further beard, was with great acclamations saluted Emperour.

(3). But such is the height of glory, which is raised by the blasts of the multitude, that it falls againe as the bubble burst in the swelling, which leaues neither circle nor signe of his former pride. And so is the state of Galba with one breath applauded, and placed vpon the Imperiall Throne; and that scarce cold, ere they dislike of their owne hastie election: for newes being brought that the Seate stood firme for Nero, and for certaine that Vindex in his quarrell was slaine, euen in his first enterprise of revolt; that Virginius was killed by his Germane Legions, and his name inscribed in their banners; that Nymphidius was the man whose desert could not be sufficiently honoured with lesse recompence then the princely Diademe: These distractions so much ouer-throw his aged and passionate heart, that he retired to Clonus in great deiection, repenting himselfe of that which hee had done, and wished againe his priuate estate.

(4) But the death of Nero commonly disouged, and Virginius his refusall of the Imperiall Tule, gaue strength and life to his former election, now further ratified by the full resolutions of the Arms: who the more to seeme both strong and valorous, though indeed a weak, sickly, and illly old man, Souldier-like in his coat of Armes shewed himselfe, and in that array passed the vast mountains for Rome. With whose entrance, entered the dislike of his person, as one vn-

fit to support the state of others, that by age and imbecillie was not able to sustaine his owne: to which were added the imperfections of his government, carried every way farre vnder expectation. And long bee late not before hee saw his owne defects: to redresse which hee elected Piso Lucianus, Caesar, joining him in power with himselfe, and declaring him his Successor, in a short and blunt Oration, in presence both of the Senate and Souldiers.

(5) Whereat howsoever others stood affected, yet Marcus Salinus Otho (one, who for commerce in leaudnes was very deare to Nero, and whose hope depended vpon the common disturbance, for that his excess in riot had now brought him to the brinke of beggary) much enuied therat, rather because himselfe had contentained a hope that Galba would haue adopted him, and therefore as his concurrent set his own aspiring mind for the Crown. And euen now this time beell fitted his attempts, as being the wane of Galba's authority, and before the full of Piso's power; his Astrucius and Sextus's sons forwarding him with their vaine predictions, a kinde of people euer to

The souldiers likewise euer dalking the present, and affecting the new, fell without respect to Otho's side: amongst whom Sulpitius Flarus, one of the Brutus's Captiues, slew Piso the elected Caesar: Galba himselfe being murdered and mangled by the Souldiers and band of Horsemen.

(6) He was of a good stature; his head bald, his eyes gray, and his nose hooked, his hands and feet crooked by reason of the gout, and a bunch of flesh or wen vpon his right side. A great feeder and Sadumite hee was, seuer in iustice, and ouer-ruled by his seruants. Hee died aged seueny three yeeres, hauing out-liued his Princes. THE FIRST PLANTING OF RELIGION IN BRITAINE.

CHAPTER IX.

Britains in quiet repose.
Tacit. lib. 1. c. 13.

His short time of Galba's gouernement, with the conspiracies against his Predecessour, admitteth small remembrance of our Brittain affairs: which Frontinus (saith Tacitus) among all other stirres against both Nero and Galba, held amity, and stood in quiet; whether it was the farre distance of place, secured by Sea from the seditions of the Reuelers; or that by continual seruice against the Enemies the malice of their humours were spent, it is vn certaine. Therefore a while to digresse from the Succession of our Brittain Monarques, and to fill vp the emptinesse of those Times with matters incident to our felices, let not seeme either tedious or superfluous, to speake of the planting of his Kingdome in this Island, whose Rule in short time extended to the Ends of the Earth, and whose Ambassadours (as some haue written) about the midle of Nero's Reigne, and in the yeere of Christ's Incarnation sixty three approached for the Inhabitants saluation, Arminius then swaying the Scepter of this Kingdome.

(1) At what time (say they) were sent certaine Disciples out of France into Brittain by Philip the Apostle, whereof Ieseph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Christ, was chiefe; who first laid the foundation of our faith in the West parts of this Island, at the place then called Auulin, (afterwards Insul Witin, now Glastenbury) where he with twelue Disciples his Assistants preached the Gospell of life vnto the Islanders, and there left their bodies so remaine for a most full Resurrection. This doth Gildas affirme, and Malmebury in his Booke of the Antiquitie of Glastenbury written to Henry de Blois, brother to King Stephen, and Abbot of the same place, report, and is consented vnto (for the matter, though all agree not touching the time) by the learned Antiquaries of later times, grounded on the Testimonies of the best approved Ancients writers: who account the most happy influence of Christians, to haue bene by those glorious conductors conuayed into these remote parts of the world: that by (according to the promise of God by Isaiah) The Isles a farre off which had not heard of his name, should be converted, and haue his glorie to them declared among the Gentiles.

(2) And if the credit of Dorseton Bishop of Tyre, (who liued to see the Apostolicke of Indus) weigh any thing with vs, in his tract of the Lives and Deaths of the Prophets, Apostles, and Disciples, he bringeth Simon Zelotes (an Apostle of Iesus Christ) to preach the word, and to suffer Martyrdom on the Crosse here in Brittain: with whom Nicophorus, and after him Iohn Capraue (in his Catalogue of English Saints) agree, saying that the same Simon spread the Gospell to the west Ocean, and brought the word of life into the Isles of Brittain: and, in the conuersion of Countreys wrought by the Apostles, the same Nicophorus, with Egypt and Lybia aliueth Brittain also to be one. And the forsaide Dorseton, as also Arminius, nameth Arminius one of the seueny Disciples (the same whom Saint Paul in his Epistle to the Corinthians among others others (salute) to have taught the doctrine of Salution, and to have executed the office of a Bishop here in Britain.

(4) To these first Planters and Sowers of this heavenly Seed, Cæsar Barinmus, that voluminous Historian, to which Mary Magdalen, Lucernus, and Martha, who (by his relation) being banished Jerusalem, in a masterless ship without tackling arrived in Gallia, and with them Isidore of Armenia, who afterward landed in Britaine (not tradens), as hee saith, out of an old Manuscript which he saw in the Vatican Library: yea and with them also Eurgain the sister of Isidore, who afterwards married a Britaine named Sarklus, if the authoritie whereon George Owen-Harry doth ground that report, be of any credit.

(5) But yet there are others, who vpon a very good ground from the words of Gildas (the most ancient of our British Historians) will haue the Summe of the Gospel long before to haue risen in this our West, and this Island of Britaine to haue enioied the very morning of his Afcent, the brightnesse thereof piercing thorow the mistic clouds of error, and shining here in Britaine even in the daies of Tiberius, towards whose end Christ suffered his death, and by whose indulgence towards Christians, their profession was propagated farre and neere. Which assertion the said Gildas doth not deliuer coldly or doubtingly, but with great confidence, & relying vpon good grounds, as he appeareth when he saith, Scimus, &c. We know for certainty, that this was in the latter times of Tiberius,
Which was immediately after our blessed Sauours Paschan.

To which uncontrovertible testimony some others
haue added (though not perhaps on so vndoubted warrant) that S. Peter the Apostle preached the word of life in this Island, as to other Gentiles he did, for whom God had chosen him, that from his mouth they might heare the Gospel and beleeue, (as himselfe allegeth)
and that hee here founded Churches, and ordained Priests and Deacons, which is reported by Simon Me-taphrastes out of the Greece Antiquities, and Gualterus Ejtingerius in the first of his Centurie, who saith that Peter was here in Nervus time, whereas Barinmus thinketh it was in the reign of Claudius, when the Iewes were banished Rome, and that therefore Paul in his Epistle to the Romans mentioneth him not. Indeed Barinmus and some others plead very hotly for S. Peters preaching here: but I see not well how it can stand either with Eusebius his account, which keeps him so long at Rome after he was Bishop there, or with Orosius, who denieth that he went west-ward (being expelled by Claudius) but to Jerusalem, and thence to Antioch, where he lived till the death of Claudius:
whence it must follow, that if Peter were here at all,
it was before ever he went to Rome, and that the Gospel was preached here before it was in Rome, if Peter were the first (as some hold) that preached there: both which may be the more probable if wee consider the huge multitudes of Christians (fiftene thousand, saith Barinmus) which dispersed themselves into all parts of the world vpon the martyring of S. Steuen at Jerusalem, (which was presently vpon the death of Christ) and that Isidore of Armenia was one of that number, Barinmus doth confesse. I am heere contented to step ouer that Monkish tale reported by Aludus Rhodensis (the writer of King Edward the Confes-sors life) that a holy man (forsooth) studious and carefull for a Governour to succeed, was in his sleepe told by S. Peter that the Kingdome of England was his, wherein himselfe had first preached, and would also provide him Successors. For seeing it was a drame, for a drame wee leaue it, and Peter among the other Elders to attend his Throne, that now li-teth in glorious Majesty, and who in this life minded no such earthly preeminence, no nor to diuide betwixt brethren, though the Kingdome and rule of all things was his alone.

(6) Certes Peter was principally the Apostle of the Conuerfion, and therefore more likely to haue spent his conuersors on them: but for Paul (the Doct of the Gentiles) his arrival here may seeme more warrantable, who doubtlesse (after his first releasement from Rome) confirmed the doctrine of Christ to their Western parts of the world, and among them, as may appeare, to this Island of Britaine, as both S. Epiphanius Patriarche of Jerusalem, and Theodoret an ancient Doctor of the Church, doe affirme and approoue, saying that Fishers, Publicans, and the Tax-maker (meaning S. Paul) which brought the Euangelicall light vnto all Nations, revealed the same vnto the Britaines. That Paul came into Byzantium, Gallia, and Spain, and filled all those parts with his doctrine, both Eusebius, Doro-them, and Epiphanius doe testifie: and of this generall Ambassage the Apostle himselfe saith, that the Sound of the Gospel went throughe the earth, and was heard vnto

the ends of the world: which his sayings cannot more fitly be applied to any other Nation then vnto vs of Britaine, whose Land by the Almightie is so placed in the terrestriall Globe, that thereby it is termed, of the ancient, The Ends of the Earth, and deemed to be situated in another world: so in an Oration that Agrippa made to the Iewes, and Agripola to his Romans, it is called: which made Salinus write, that the coast of Francia had becme the End of the Earth, had it not becne for Britaine, which was as another world. And in Dion
we read, that the old Souldiers of Gallia, whom Cleau-dus commanded for Britaine, complained that they must bee enforced to make warre out of the world.
And of this Land and latter Apostle (if credit may be giuen to a Poet) Venantius Fortunatus thus recordeth:

Transit Oceanum, & quæ facit Insula Perlim, Lusit. Britannus habet terras, quæq; vicinas Thule.

He cross the sea vnto the Land, and vtmost coasts of Thule, Arriving at the Ports and Isles where Britains haue the rule.

(7) Thus for Paul is well known in Rome by his long imprisonments, and (at that time) in reuerend regard for his doctrine with many there: among whom also there were some Britains that embraced the faith, whereof Claudius Rufinus (remembered by Martial another Poet) was one, whom he thus extol-eth

This Claudius is by the learned commended to haue becne most skilfull in the Greece and Latine tongues; of whom heere them (not me) speake. At the commandement of the Tyrant Nero (say they from Tastius) many Noble Britains were brought to Rome, who remaining there their Confederates, they held it an honour to haue their children named after the nobilitie of the Romans: and from Claudius Cæsar was this Ladie Claudius named, who according to her worth was matched in marriage to Rufus a gentleman of Rome, then a Coronel, after a Senator, a man of a milde disposition, naturally modest, a great Philosophy in the Sect of the Stoicks, for his sweetnesse of behaviour called Pudens, who by his grace perswasions cauled Martial (the witty but wanton Poet) to reforme many things in his writings, and by him is e-commended for his humane, pietie, learning, and elequence: as also his wife Claudius the Britaine, for her beautie, faith, fruitfulness, learning, and languages. In proofe whereof, Balauch mentioned three severall treaties, besides others by her compiled, both in the Greece and Latine tongues. Dorotheus nameth Pudens
to be one of the Seuente two, and Valerianus affirmeth them both Pauls disciples, from whom he sen-and Paulus, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren folate here. But some may object, that Martius Claudia could not be that Lady, who living in Nervus time gave hospitalities unto Peter and Paulus for their being in Rome, for that the could not retaine such beautes and perfection as the Poor to her dooth ascribe in the raigne of Domitian, the fourth in succession from Nerva, the time being too long (saith Ada, Bishop of Trevers, Fleurbaey and others) for beautes to be so freely preserved. Now these account her age then to be lxxij, but if we reckon according to Eusebius, we shall find that hee fees the last of Claudius in the year of grace ffive hundred, and the first of Domitian in eightie three, between which are but twentie foure years, and yet Paul came not to Rome till the tenth of Nerva, and in his thirteenth year, from the prison wrote his Epistle to Timothy, as the same Eusebius declareth: so that from hence unto Domitian, is left but fourteene years, a time no whit vppailable to retaine Beautes, though twentie years and many moe of her age had bene formerly spent; seeing that in those times Platarch praiseth Alcebiades to be paffingly faire when he was thre score yeares of age.

This Clasico then with Poets spirituall Manna, is said to send likewise the choicest and chafiest of the Poemes of Marshall (whose verses generally are no lessons befitting Ladies) for new-years gifts vnto her friends in Brittaine, both for to feede their Sauies with the bread of life, and to instruct their moules with lessons best fitting vnto ciuill behauiour; which thing moued the Poet himselfe with no small selfe-glorie in his verse thus to write :

Dicitur & nosſras cantare Britannia verſus.
And Britaine now (they ſay) our verſes learns to ſing.

(8) It hath also passed with allowance among the learned Senae of our Antiquaries, that when Claudian & Nero began to banish and pericute the Christians in Rome, (whose superstitions, as Tacitus pleaster to tearme them, from Judea had infected the Citizens Gelfe) many Romans and Britaines being converted to the Faith, fled thence unto these remote parts of the earth, where they might and did more freely enjoy the libertie of their Professions, vnell the search of Tyrants by the flame-light of Persecution, had found out all secret places for the societies and assemblies of Gods Saints: as after in the daies of disclosure we shall finde. And from this Sanctuarie of Saluation the laid lamenting Lady A Pompeia Gracious, the wife of Andrus Plautus (the first Lord Lieutenant of Brittain) brought that Religion, whereof she was accused and stood indicted vpon life and death, which was none other, then the Christian Profession, seeing the same both by Tacitus and Suetonius, is curiously there termed the strange superstitions and new kinde of Sect that the Christians embraced, and for which they were accounted unworthy to live.

(9) And much about these times (as Beatus Rhenanus in his Historie de Germanie, P. antea and others do report) one Saxonicus a Noble man sonne of Ursinus converted to the Faith by the first Planters of the Gospel in this Land, and after his Baptisme called Beatus, was sent by the Brethren from hence unto Rome, to be better instructed and further directed by Saint Peter himselfe; and returning thow Switzerland, found such willingesse and flocking of the people to heare and receive the Doctrine of Christ, that he there abided and built an Oratorie not farre from the lake Thusa, and neare the Towne called Vindelicorum, where in preaching and prayers he employed his time to the day of his death, which happened in the yeare of grace 1100.

And that there were Christians in Britain at these times I make no question, though some exceptions may be taken against the Memoir of Barton the reporter thereof, who saith in the 141 years and reign of Hadrian, many masters of Grammar were baptized themselves & preached to others the Gospel in Britain, howsoever falseth in the Emperours name, which year was the second of Anthonis Pim his successor, and ascribed to these men Schoole-degrees, altogether unknowne for nine hundred years after, yett he do not hinder the truth of the thing, though that Munk was one of the best Historians. It is reported also that Patrick the Irish Apollle, and Canonized Saint, long before the Emper of King Lucius preached the Gospel in many places of Wales; As also that Nonnus Bernarius of the race of the British Princes converted the Picts to the Religion of Christ. Vnto these aforesaid authorities and testimonies howsoever we stand affected: yet it is certaine by Clementius citing Sabellius, that the Brittaines were with the first Converts: And Jerusalem, who lived within two hundred years of *Christ*s Nativity, sheweth so little: Who the more to provoke the Iewes against whom he wrote, calleth to witness the fruitfull increase of the Gospel of Saluation, through many Countries and Nations, and among them nameth the Brittaines to haue received the Word of life, the power whereof (saith he) hath pierced into those parts whither the Romans could not come. Whence Petrus Clouicropius supposeth the Scythians to be the most ancient Christians, as not being in the like situation to the Romans: neither then were

(10) Origen, who flourished not much above two hundred years after Christ, in his Homilies upon Esau's sheep, that the first fruits of God's herd herald was gathered in the Island of Britaine; who confessed to the Christian faith by the doctrine of their Druids, that taught one only God; with whom Hellor Socius agreed, saying, that some of these Druids condemned the worship of God in Images, and allowed not the application of the God-head unto any visible form, which might be the cause why Claudius the Emperour forbade their Religion, as labouring in these things too much of Christianity, whom likewise he banished Rome, as some from Suetonius conjecture. Of these Druids we doubt before, that their offices were most imploied about holy things; and that their doctrine chiefly consisted in teaching the immortality of the soule, the motions of the heavens, the nature of things; and the power of the Gods; yea and Poetibus from others will inferre, that they prophesied likewise of a virgin's conception. Their were the helps, Guth Trenthall, that caused the Britons to be soone to embrace the Doctrine of Christ, and thereupon immediately after his death doth Cyclus fallen our conversion, where he writeth, That the Glorious Gospel of Iesus Christ, which first appeared in the world on the latter time of T. Thomas Cesar, did once then spread his bright beames upon this frozen Island of Britaine.

(11) Whereby were the waters of life, flowing from Jerusalem Temple, into their fane, let Coun-trians and utmost Sea, to be made both fruitful & wholesome, according to the sayings of the Prophet, that on that day the waters of life shall issue from Jerusalem, half of them toward the East Sea, and half of them toward the uttermost Sea, and shall promote fruitfulness both in Summer and winter: and even in the infancie of Christenheit, both the Apostles themselves, and also the Predestinate their Disciple to become fishers therein for the Soules of Men, as Christ in chafing of them said they should bee; whereby his Kingdom was done enlarged unto their Ends of the Earth, and his Throne established among those Heathen, whom God his Father had given to be his. So fruitful and famous was this spreading of the Gospel, that Augustin Mentanus, a Christian Poet, compares the Increase thereof with that of Noah, thus alluding unto it:

*Sicut aquae quaedam Nec sua missi in orbem
Figuera sedatis, ut Geni humana per annos
Debita Celitibus Patri daretur aequa terrae;
Sic sua cum vellet Deus alta in regna reuerti,

*The Lawes of God onto the World brought By Christ his Servants sent abroad to preach
The Word of Life, and Gospel to each Wight:
Naphes lay shadowed from that glorious Light:
The furthest Isles, and Earths remotest bounds,
Embrace'd their Faith, and said as their sweet sounds.*

(12) To which effect also the sayings of S. John Chrysostome, Bishop of Constantinople, enforce, who shewing the increase of Christianity, and the success of the Gospel preached, sheweth the power thereof to have extended, not only to the Countries farre incircled in the Continent, but also to the Islands situated in the Ocean itselfe, and amongst them expressly nameth this our Brittain; whose inhabitants (saith hee) have also consented to the word which is planted in every heart, in honour whereof they have erected their Temples and Altars. And againe: Those Brittaines (saith hee) which had formerly fed upon humane flesh, making no difference betwixt the blood of man and beast, now through the power of the word by them embraced, have learned the law of true piety, and give themselves to a religious abstinence, and holy fasts. Of which Barbarisme S. Jerome also complained, that some of those Nations vied to eat the buttocks of boies, and Paps of Virgins, in which their Feasts were served for the daintiest dishes. But elsewhere speaking of the Brittaines conversion, he saith, that they had turned themselves from their westerne Paganisme, and now had directed their faces towards Ierusalem in the East, whose beaustie shone them the word of God.

(13) And thus wee see by the planting of the Gospel in this Land, the saying of the Psalmist accomplished, that God would give his Iovest Christ the Heath in for his inheritance, and the Ends of the Earth (the proper attribute of this our Brittain) to be his possession. And the success in History most apparently sheweth these parts (by an especiall prerogative) to be Christ's Kingdom. For albeit that Ierusalem and Antioch may rightly claime the precedence of all other places, the one being as it were the chamber where Christians were first borne, and the other the fane where they were first Christened with that most sacred name: yet Brittain in some other graces hath outstript them all, having the glory to be graced with the first Christian King that ever reigned in the world, which was our renowned Lucius, the first fruits of all the Kings that ever laid their Crowne at the foot of our Saviours Crosse: as also for producing the first Christian Emperour that ever by publicke authoritie established the Gospel thorow the world, which was Constantine the Great, borne and brought up here in Brittain by Qyrene Helena, a most vertuous and religious Britishe Lady: vnto whose daies the succession of Christianity did here continue, as by the martyrdomes of many Saints vnder Discipline is apparant. Heerein also reigned the King that first concurred the head of the usurping Beasts, and triple-headed Serpents, and freed the Land from his decouring Lascivious: putting downe Idolatry with Hezkeiah that brake the Brazen Serpent: and with Sisaac new digged the Wells that those Phylistines had flapped. And lastly hath this Land produced that most valiant and Christian Monarch, whose learned pen hath first depainted Antichrist, and pierced the heart of all Papall Supremacie, as the sword of Gedeon did Zalmonna (* the Image of trouble) King of Madian. And as a Lion hath he met that crooked * Serpent in the way of his usurped authoritie; whereby in short time vnderpanted the * * All of his heart will be broken, if other Potentates likewise by his most godly example, cast off the yoke of vassalage, and in their severall Dominions gouerne (as free Princes ought) the people that God hath committed to their charge. So that in these and many other the like Princes of this happy Island, most properly is performed that propheticall promise made vnto the Church of Christ that Kings should become her nursing Fathers, and Queens should be her nursing Mothers: Of both which may be truly said to Brittain, in imitation of that of Solomon,

Many Kingdomes haue done gloriously, but thou hast surmounted them all.

(14) And of such power hath Christ bene in these His Possessions, that even the Heilige Kings and Conquerours thereof, were they neuer to fange and Idolatrous at their first entrance, yet when they here had tasted for a time they became milde and religious, and gladly submitted their hearts to the Religion of those, whose necks themselves held vnder the yoke of subjection.

(15) Such were the Romans in this Land, whose Deputies at the day-spring almost of Christianity were converted; as Trebellian, Pertinax, and others, which submitted themselves to that profession, and were mooued to King Lucius more publicly to maintain the same: as also Constantine the father of great Constantine that here in Brittain permitted the profession of the Gospel, with the erections of Churches for the true seruice of God, and prohibited the superfluous worship of the Gentiles.

(16) The Saxons after them (in time, but not in Idolatry) had neuer tasted the liuing waters of Ierish, till they were here fasted in Christs Possession, where they changed their Affections as farre from their wonted manners, as did the Messengers to Iohn, which turned after his Chariot to destroy the Altars of Baal: or as Saul and his seruants, who no sooner had entered Naath in Remah, but that their spirits were ioined to the Prophets, and the heat of their furie, with their garments, cast downe at Samuels feet.

(17) The Danes likewise, their Conquerours, and Successors in this Royal Throne, euer vntill then were both bloody and barbarous, and therefore of all our Writers commonly called the Pagan Danes; whose many delusions and ruines remaine as records of their cruelties in many places euen vnto this day: yet being a while in this Land, King Guthorn, with tharrie of his chiefe Princes and people, were drawn by the valour and vertue of King Alred, to receiue the Christian Faith, by whose bounty thereupon they enioyed the possession of a faire portion of this Kingdom. And afterward Canutus, their greatest King, no sooner almost had this Imperial Diademe set vpon his head, but that hee beld it his chiefe Maistrie to be the vassall of Christ, confessing him only to be King of Kings: and with such religious deuotion as then was taught, crowned the Crosse with the Crowne he wore: and neuer after, thorow all his raaigne, by any means would waue the same: and the Domes his Soldiers remaining in England, began by little and little to embrace Christianity, and in short time were all conuerted to the Faith. Thus then wee see the happie increase of these holy seeds springing from the furrows of this blessed ground: and the Tents of Sion to be spread vpon the Mountaintops of Brittain, wherein God (according to his promise) perswaded vs who are of Iephthah, to dwell.

(18) As hitherto wee haue searched the first foundation of our Faith, so neuer want wee testimonies concerning the continuance of the same in this Land vnto following Posterities; although the iniurie of Time and Warre haue consumed many Records. For the Brittaines that were daily strenghtned in their reformed faith, by the Doctrine of many learned and godly men, left neither their loue with the Church of Ephesus, but rather tooke hold of their skirts, as the Prophet speaketh, vntill the tortures of Martyrdom cut them off by death: And those Fathers euen from the Dyspenter themselves, held a succession in Doctrine, (notwithstanding some repugnance was made by the Pagans) and preached the Gospel with good success, euen till the same at length went forth with a bolder countenance, by the fauourable Edicts of Adrian, Antonius Pius, and Marcus Aurelius Emperours of Rome (as Eusebius hath noted:) and in Brittain was established by the authoritie of Lucius their King: whereby this was the first of all the Provinces (saith Marcus Sabellicus) that receiued the Faith by publicke ordinance: Of the teachers of those times Bala

parent the same. As also that of Arminius, in the year three hundred fiftie nine, and in the reigne of Constantine, who caused foure hundred western Bishops to be there summoned in favour of the Arians, whereof three were out of Brittain, (as Sulpicius Severus the good Bishop of Burges hath reported) that came thither suffrages against that Heresie. These doth Hilarie terme the Bishops of the Promises of Bri-taine, by whom they were somewhat derided, because being farr from their owne Countie they lived vpon the Emperours charge. And Zolastilius, that from Dioclesian time they both reedified their former Temples, and founded new also in memorie of their then fresh-bleeding Martyrs, and enjoyed a generall and ioufull peace in their religious profession, till that Arian Heresie having first filled the Contrement, sought and found passage over the Sea into our Island.

Gomarus in his Catalogue Illustrium Doctorum tells vs of another learned Bishop of Brittain, Iohannes, who in the time of Crispian Bishop of Rome, wrote vnto one Iohannes a booke de uita Christiana, and another de uoluntate seruandis, of much diuine learning and comfort. Crispianus likewise is recorded by Ni-cephorus, to be sonne of Bishop Martinus, who having become a Confessor Depoite in Italie vnder Theodosius, and made Lieutenant of Brittain, where with great praise he managed the common wealth, was againe his will afterward made Bishop at Constance of the Novatians, that called themselves Cathari, that a pure, making a schisme in the Church by their deniall of Sah-satian, to such as fell into relapse of sinne after Ba-ptisme once received. This is that Bishop of whom we read, that of all his Ecclesiasticall revenues he reuered only for himselfe two loaves of bread vpon the Lords day. And in the first Tome of Camerlens mention of Augustinus Bishop of London, whom (because that, as is most probable, Christian Religion had in those pri-mitiue times taken more firme footing in Brittain then in France) the French Bishops called their Nationall Councils the second at Arles, in Anno three hundred thirty sixe, that he might with his suffrage ap-peare their Decrees. About the yeere foure hundred fourty, was a Provinciall Council held in Brittain for the reformation of Religion, and repairing of the ruined Churches, which the Pagan rage of Vortiger had decayed, to the great griefe and discomfite of the people, a pregnant signe of the consuming zeale, which vnto those daies had left a glorious memorie.

(20) And the Enligne of Arctur, wherein the Virgin with her sonne in her armes (as is noted by Vi-centius) was portrayed, so often displayed for Christ, and his Countreys libertie, against the Pagan Saxons, is as a leale to confirme vs of their Professions, and doth shew the badge of that ages Christianity. But the famous Monastrie of Bancher, as a College of diuine Philosophers, and by Christianis truly acknowledged to be the Mother of all others in the world, and her Masters distributed into euen severall parts, every part numbering three hundred foules, and earning their bread by their daily labours, doth notably witness to all fucceeding ages, that Christian Religion was then both planted and preached in this Island. And in the Synod held at Anglus Oke were seuen old Brittain Bishops, besides other Doctors, who met with that Romane Legate, and not in points of doctrine, but rather in their severall rites and ceremonies did varie, by any thing that in that Assemblie appeared. For as it is most vndoubted, that (if we speake properly) Ierusalem is the Mother of us all, and of all Churches; and our former allegations doe euince, that the first Plantation of the Britisb Faith was altogether by Iewes and others of the Egiptian Church; so the very rites of this Religious College of Bancher doe evidently prove, that their first institution in Religion came from the East, Bede shewing that small of them they diffused from the Romane Church; yea, and that they neuer did, nor then would acknowledge any authoritie of the Bishop

CHAPTER X.

Ann. Do. 70.

Vt leaving, Christi proceedings to the dispose of himselfe, let vs returne to the subiect from whence wee haue wandered, and continue the successions of Great Brittaines Monarchs, vnto them that haue held it, whether by chance of warre, or voice of Electum: In which sort (as is said) Gallus got it, and hat short time kept it: And from him Otho tooke it, and a shorter time enioied it.

Otho his original. Tacit. Hist. a. cap. 17.

(2) Whole Originall (saith Tacitus) was from Ferretum, his Father a Consull, his mothers blood somewhat disparaged, but yet not base; his youth run ouer with voluptuous wantonness, and prodigall expences, more ready for disturbances, then depending vpon preferment or dignitie of State; and hauing gone thorough all his wealth, retained onely the heartie affections of the Souldiers, which Gallus had vnto vnto alienated. Neither did Otho himselfe bandy against Gallus, but Vitellius in Germanie was fauoured against both: Two persons so vile and ambitious, as was feared, would proue the scourge of the Empire, and the ruine of Rome.

Vitellius much incouraged.

(3) Vnto Vitellius sided the Brittaines, vnder the Conduct of Tribellus Maximus, (remembered before) a man vsite for warre, and vnexperienced of seruice, compounded altogether of crueltie, insensibility, and for his nigardly sparing, and vnnumerall pollings, exceedingly hated of his Armie: which was further aggravated by Rufius Calpurnius, Lieutenant of the fourteenth Legion, his ancient Enemie, betwixt whom the sparks of enue shortly burst forth into flames of reciprocal accusations. Tribellus being charged of insufficiency for command, with the begging of the Province, and Legions; and he againe accusing Calpurnius of factious behaviours, & dissolving of discipline through which dissensions a negligent regard was held of the Souldiers, who carried themselves arrogantly, euen against both; and as men that had rather be doing ill, then doing nothing, grew daily into mutinies. In these times Maximus finding himself vnable to withstand Rufius, (the common affection swaying on his side) with his friends and followers entered Germanie in the quarrell of Vitellius, and joined thoe British forces to maintain his cause, who now presuming vpon his owne strength, and others his Confederates, ambitiously plaid the Prince, growne to that height euen of nothing.

In chap. 9. lib. 24.

Rufius Calpurnius & Tribellus accuse each other.

The Souldiers thereby discorded.

(4) Otho his Concurrent (in this thing onely commendable) fought by all meanes to stay the effusion of more ciuill blood, and that already spent, to posselt his thoughts, that his minde was still distracted and nightly affrighted with the seeming appearance of Gallus's ghost: for which causes hee sent conditions of peace to Vitellius, offering him an equall part in the Empire; and to giue him also his daughter in marriage. But Vitellius disdainning any competition, refuseth all Capitulations, and prepares himselfe for the warre. Otho thus constrained, lets forth his forces, and in three severall skirmishes had the victorie, but in the fourth at Brictionem lost the daie; yet not so much weakened or vnrecoverable, (his Armie in number and courage farmaoning the other) as himselfe was vsuall to trie the chance of warre more; for being importuned by his Captains and Leaders, to reinforce the Battaille, with many reasons, and probabilities of an assured victorie, in a thankfull and short Oration, answered thus their Petitions.

Otho affrighted in the night.

Sextus de vita O. lib. 1. c. 7. His offer to Vitellius.

Hath the victory in these skirmishes. Lost the day in the fourth.

Importuned by his Souldiers to renew the battell vsuall.

(5) To hazard your vertues and valours for one Mans estate, I hold dangerous, and needlesse it is, that my life should be prized as so decre a rare; alredys desire and I haue had sufficient experience each of others, and not the least in this my short time of glorie, wherein I haue learned, it is harder to moderate afflictions in the excess of fortune, then either industrie or hazard for attaining the same. These ciuill warres Vitellius beganne; which I for my part purpose not to continue; and hereby let Posteritie eche me of Otho, that others haue kept the Empire longer, but neuer any that left it more valiantly. Let this minde therefore accompany me to the Grave, that you for your parts would haue died for my sake, and I to save your liues die voluntarie and vnacquainted. I blame not the Gods, nor enue your Emperors rising glorie: It is sufficient that my house hath touched the highest frame of Honour, and my life to be left in records, The foreign March of the World.

His Oration to his Souldiers.

He himselfe killed.

His age and rage.

His discontent and hatred.

(6) And therupon solemnely taking his leaue of the whole Army, went to his Tear, and with his dagger wounded himselfe vnder the left pappe, whereof immediately he died, in the year of his age thirty seven, and daies of his raigne ninetie five. He was of stature but lwe, feeble in his feet, and vnto so great a minde, his bodie not any waies proportionable; his face without haire and woman-like, his attire nice and delicate, and his life and death nothing at all consonant or agreeable.

VITELLIVS.

CHAPTER XL

Ann. Do. 70.

Then certaine newes of Octavius death was brought Vellius, he presently assumed the name of Caesar, and administered the affairs of the Empire, with no lesse authoritie then the absolute Commander of the World. And of such acceptance was the accident, that he dedicated the dagger wherewith it was done, vnto Mars in his Temple at Collegen, as the luckie instrument of his aduanced Estate.

(1) Naturally ambitious hee was, and now the fame the more inhauced by his strengths of the German Sooldiers, and the flatteries of the Senate, which euer bare faile with the fairest winde. His entrance into Rome was about measure magnificall, hauing the naked sword of Iulius Caesar borne before him, with foud of Trumpetts, Ensignes, Standards, Banners, and Flags, accompanied with an Armie worthe of a better Prince then Vellius was.

(1) His original is diuerly reported: either framed according to the affections of his flatterers, or blasted with the tongues of depraying back-biters; & both in extremes, extremely disagreeing. For Suetonius, as Suetonius writeth, deduceth his descent from Faustus King of Aborigines, and Lady Vellia his wife, worshipped in many places for a Goddess. But C. Iulius Severus assermeth him to bee sprung from no better roote then a Cobbler, and a common naughty-packer the daughter of a Baker. Howfooeer, true it is, that Lactius his father bare thrice the Consulship in Rome, was Praefect of Syria, and in such credit with the Emperour Claudius, that in his absence and expedition into Brittain, he had the whole charge of the Empire committed vnto him; himselfe in speciall fauour with Thierius, and in vife for his strumpets: with Caius, for his Chariot-running: with Claudius for his dice-playing: and with Nereus, for his flatterie: vnto whose Ghost in publike hee was sacrificed, and disposed the Emperors affaires at the discretion of best Stage-Players.

(4) His vamefurable gluttony was such, that the whole implotments of his Capaines were to provide him Carres, and therein such excefse, that two thousand dishes of Fish, and fouen thousand of fowle, were serued to him Table at one supper; and yet was he not ashamed to commend his owne Temperance, in a few Orations before the Senate and People, who well knew him to be guiltlesse of that vertue: in somuch that Tactius reporteth, in thuse few monthes wherein hee reigned, he had wasted more hundred millions of sesterces, which amounteth to fouen millions, thery one thousand, two hundred fiftie pounds sterling. And Iosephus thinketh if he had liued longer, the whole revenues of the Empire had not bene sufficient to maintaine his Glottomie. A Prince otherwise no way memorable, as being indeed without skill in profession of Armes, without counsell in matters of the greatest importance, commonly drowned in sauset, and farre vnnuete to weld weighty affaires.

(2) Thise defect's found ready vent to his opposites, and gave libertie of speech in the Assemblies of three Estates: amongst whom Vespasian was held the only Marston-Starre, worthy to ascend on the setting of this darkened Sonne, vnto whom Licinius Mationis, Gouernour of Syria, was no aucter, Marcus Caelius Rufus of Spain stood very well affected, and Thierius Alexander of Egypt for him the formost. Also with him sided the Kings Iabeneus, Abinichus, and Agrippa, with the beautiful Egeria Berenice: vnto whom Vespasian and his sonne Titus were well knownen, Gouernours together in the Provinces of Syria and Indoe.

(6) The first that did reuolt, were the Syrian Bands: to suppress which, Vellius sent vnto Vellius Bolanus Lieutenant of Brittain, for aid of that Praemour, hauing had good experience of their seruice in his warres before. As when Herodotus Flaccus brought eight thousand Brittaines to his quarrell against Orbs. As also when Trebellius Maximus (formerly mentioned) ioined them to the German forces. Which last man had now againe resumed his former place in Brittain, without either Makellie or Authoritie: but rather ruled by way of intreatie, and at the discretion of the Sooldiers.

(7) Vnto whom, this Vellius Bolanus succeeded for Departure: a man of no great parts in warre, but more temperance, and not odious for any crime. His answer vnto Vellius was, that the Countrey of Brittain stood not so quiet, that he might spare any number thence, the Sooldiers and Confederates hauing their hands full to hold all vpright. Neither (in truth) were they fitt to his side, but rather affected Vespasian, whose reputation in warlike affaires was first gotten amongst them in Brittain, in the might of Claudius: though we find in Tacitus, that the Vespasianes of three British Legions followed Vellius in his expedition against the Syrian Armie, wherein the flower and strength of all the Brittaines are reported to haue been, and that their fourteenth Legion came to his aide, in whom notwithstanding he had no good confidence: but hearing the daily reuolts of the Praemours, and the approach of Vespasian, was minded to resigne his dignitie vnto him, had not the ouer-cies of the people bene against it.

(8) Finally, when he had reigned only eight monthes, and fise daies, as Iosephus accounteth, he was slaine in most ymnominious manner: for his hinds were bound behinde his backe, a halter fast about his necke, his clothes rent and torne, a sword point set vnder his chaine, and head held backward by a bush

CHAPTER XII.

Vespasian.

Petilius.

Ann. Do. 72.

O acceptable was the fall of this Prince, and such hopes reuised at the entrance of his Successor, as that all mens mindes were raised to an expectation, that the glorie of the Empire, so much eclipsed through the ciuill broiles of Galba, Otho, and this last Vitellius, should now shine againe in the beaue of her former libertie, by the desired government of aged Vespasian; whose integrity, valour, and seruice, had become sufficiently approved by his many Expeditions in all the Provinces wherein he had to doe.

(2) His descent was from the Flavian family, and that but bare and obscure: his Father called Titus Flauus, his Mother Polla Vespasia, his Wife Domitilla, and his Sonnes Titus, and Domitian, both Emperours succeeding after him.

(1) In his yong yeares, hee serued as a Militarie Tribune in the Countrey of Thracia, and as Quæstor in the Provinces of Cyrene, and Cyrene: Vnder Claudius the Emperour, he went forth into Germanie, as Lieutenant of a Band, and from thence was sent into Brittaine, to be Leader of the second Legion, where the foundation of that greatnes whereunto after hee attained, was first laid: for as Suetonius hath written, therein with victorie hee fought thirty set Battails, and was also Conquerour of the Ile of Wight: whereby two mightie Nations were subdued to the Romans, and twentie Townes wonne from the Brittaines: for which exploits he had Triumphall ornaments, worthily assigned him by Claudius, whose owne Triumph (as Vespasian saith) was gotten without his paines, but by the only prowess of Vespasian. After this, he gouerned Africke with singular integrity and much honour, and was lastly sent by Nero for his Vice-roy into Syria vpon this occasion.

(4) There had bene spread thorow all the East, parts an old Prophecie and litle opinion clandestinely belerred, that it was appointed by the Destinies, there should come out of Isrie him that should be Lord of the whole world: which how it serued for the Iewes to reuolt, or for the Romanes to apply onely vnto Vespasian, the euent sheweth, which cannot agree to any other, then to the person and power of Christ Iesus, there borne, and throughout the whole world still reigning: Yet vpon the confidence of such an accomplishment, the Iewes reuolted from the Romanes obedience, and slew their President Salinius by name, putting to flight Gallus, Lieutenant General of Syria, that came to his aide, and got from him the maine Standard, or Ensigne of the Eagle. This Nation was so populous and strong, that none was thought fitter to stay their attempts, then was Vespasian, who with great hope and approbation, reduced that Province vnto their former subiection, and there remained the short time of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius their Raignes; of whose proceedings there Vespasian writeth at large, vnto whom I must referre the vnderstanding Reader.

(5) All which times, the ciuill strifes amongst the Romanes, gaue the Provinces occasion to attempt their former libertie; as did the Bataniens, Germanis and French, with whom the Brittaines also tooke hart to reuolt: But the first that sided with Vespasian, were two thousand expert Souldiers, drawne out of the Mesian Legions, and sent to aide Otho against Vitellius; who marching as farre as Aquileia, they heard there of the certaine death of Otho, and thereupon taking the aduantage of the offered opportunitie, with an uncontrolled libertie, committed many robberies and outrageous villaines: In so much, that fearing condigne punishment, they held it their best policie, to combine some speciall man by their fauours vnto them, whereby their faults might bee either quite smooched, or lightly reprehended: neither in their opinions was any so gracious for desert or power, as was Vespasian, and therefore with one assent they proclaimed him Emperour, and wrote his name in their banners, thinking themselves as worthy to make an Emperour, as were the Legions either of Spain, or Germany.

his valour, and their own sufficiency to be inferior to none : And therefore all on the sudden at Cæsarea, both Captains and Soldiers alike him Emperor; which title when he resolutely gained and refused, with drawn swords they threatened his death. Thus then being brought into danger every way, he sent his letters unto Tiberius Alexander, Lieutenant of Aegypt, who likewise at Alexandria, presently proclaimed him Emperor.

(7) At this time Vespasian sent by Petellus, was Lieutenant of Britain, there ruling in a gentler and milder manner than was fit for so fierce a Nation: for the Soldiers having gotten head, by the remiss Government of Trebellianus Maximus, continued the same looseness in discipline still: and Vespasian in stead of awe and Obedience, retained only their affections and goodwill. But most especially the short Reigns of these last Emperours (whose beginnings were altogether unpolished to satisfy their licentious pleasures, and later times spent for the defence of their Lives from violent Deaths) gave way to many imperfections of the Government, and misdeemeanors of the common Soldiers.

(8) But when Vespasian had assumed the Empire, great Captains and good Soldiers were sent into the Frontiers, and into Britain, Petellus Cerealis, that had formerly there made proof of his service under Nero, in the wars against Bodas, and afterwards in other parts, as against the Gades and Batavians, with prosperous victories. The fame of this man brooke great terror into the hearts of the wavering Britains, and amongst them of the Brigantes, the most populous State of the whole Province: against whom at his first approach he warred, and in many battles, and some of them bloody, the greater part of these people were waikd, and their Countrey came into the Roman subjection.

(9) Whereby the glory of Cerealis might well have dimmed the fame of his Successor, had not Julius Frontinus a great Soldier also, sustained the charge with reputation and credit, in subduing the strong and Warlike nation the Salures: where he had, beside the force of the enemy to struggle with, the straits, and difficult places of rocks and mountains, for access.

(10) After whose government (no further Acts being mentioned) Julius Agriola, who in Rome had been Quæstor, Tribune, and Prætor, and Lieutenant in Aquitania, was sent General into Britain by Vespasian the Emperour, the year before his death. This man formerly had there served under the command of Petellus Cerealis, whereby hee had gained experience both of the People and Province; and at his first approach gathered the Legions of the Legions, and other aids of the Auxiliaries, (who for that yeere attended an end of their travels, because the Summer was almost spent) left by procrastinating time, the violence of the Ordnance should further burst forth, who a little before his entrance, had utterly almost cut off a way which lay on their Borders, the rest of the Countrey, as men desirous of Warre, allowing their example.

Against these Agriola addressed, who kept themselves in places of advantage, and durst not defend into indifferent ground. Hee therefore being himselfe foremost, lead up his Army to their encounter, and seconded with the courage of his trained Soldiers, put them all to sword and flight, whereby the whole Nation was almost quite destroyed.

(11) And now that his fame began to ascend, and as the first affairs had issue, the rest would succede, he therefore deliberated to conquer the Island Mona, from the possession whereof Paulinus Suetonius was revoked, by the general Rebellion under Bodas. But in a purpose not purposed before, and thus wanting, the policie of the Captaine devised a passage; for hee commanded the most choice of the Aids, to whom the shallows were well known (and without whom the Romans did almost attempt nothing) to pass out at once, and suddenly to invade them. These Britains, after the vie of their Countrey manner, were most skilfull swimmers, and in swimming armed, able to govern themselves and horres. The Monast thinking themselves secure, for that no Ships were sent in their River, now thus suddenly surprized, as men amazed, firmly thought that nothing could bee invincible to them, who came with such resolutions to Warre, and therefore they humbly desired Peace, and yielded the Island unto Agriola's devotion.

(12) Who now in these prosperous proceedings of his fortunes, fought not with any glorious relations or letters of aduancements, to improve and augment the greatness of his honour, but rather in seeking to suppress his fame, made it shine more bright; and addressing himselfe for civil government, reformed many abuses in his House, his Camp, and in the whole Province, and those especially that most touched the poorer sort, as by moderating the increase of Tribute and Corne, wherewith the Britains were daily burdened: by the suppressing of which enomities (and the like) an honourable opinion of him was cury where entertained, and a general inclination unto Peace, which partly by the negligence, partly by the avarice of former Gouverneurs, had beene no less feared then Warre it selfe.

(13) And whereas the Britains hitherto still harried with Oppression and Warres, had little leisure or will to apply themselves to things which accompany Peace, and are the ornament of Civil and settled Societies, and therefore were prone upon every occasion to tumult and flire: to induce them by pleasures to quietness and rest, he exhorted them in private, and helped them in publicke, to build Temples, Houses, and Places of Assembly, and common resort; and likewise provided that the Summes of their Nobles should be instructed in the liberal Arts and Sciences, commending the industrie, and preferring the wits of the Britains before the Students of France, as being now grown curious to attaine the Eloquence of the Roman Court, (yea even the German, the habit of peace and peaceable Arts) and to delight in gorgeous Traddings, Banquets, and Feasts.

(14) And thus farre had Agriola proceeded before the death of Vespasian, whose managing of the Imperiall dignity was cury way answerable to so high a place, and whose death was as much lamented, as his Vertues did surmount his Predecessours. But as touching his marvellous cures of the Blind and the Lame, as they serve not either to be veyed or inferred in this our present History; so yet may they convince the indurance of Athyris, whose confidence is scared with the faine of incredulitie of the Miracles wrought by our blessed Saviour Iesus Christ. For if the wisest Historians of those times have beleevued themselves, and left Records upon their credit to following posterities, that by his touch onely hee cured a Lame man, and with his spittle opened the eyes of the Blinde, being a mortal and sinfull man; shall it then be doubted, that hee which knew no faine, neither received the gifts by measure, either in power could not, or in act did not worke such Miracles as were the witnesses of his Godhead, and for such are recorded to confirme our faith? But to our purpose.

(15) When Vespasian had lived three score and nine yeeres, seven months, and seven daies, and had reigned ten yeeres, as Eusebius saith, he died peaceably in his Bed, which no Emperour since Augustus ever did, having beene a great Scourge and Instrument of God against the miserable Jewes, whose kingly race from Davids line he fought by all means to extirpate, that so all their hopes and expectations might for ever be cut off.

(16) Hee was of a middle stature, well set, and strongly compact: his countenance not altogether amiable, neither any waies deformed: a great favourer of Learning, very Liberal, a just, wise, and most Valiant Prince.

His looks.

His repentance
at his death.

Recently upon the death of this Emperor, Titus his eldest sonne, surnamed Flavius Vespasian, without all contradiction was received and obeyed for his rightfull successor, as well for that his Father in his lifetime had made him his Partner in the Empire, and at his death by Testament declared him his Heir, as also for the generall opinion conceived of him, for his inbred goodness and noble conditions; called & esteemed the lively darling and delight of mankind. Indeed of a most comely presence he was, & fitted thereunto with all heroical virtues, a great Souldier, learned in the Arts, a good Orator, a skillfull Astronomer, and could by artificiall characters write both very swift and very faire.

(2) His youth he spent in Militarie qualities, and served in Germanie and Britaine with exceeding commendations, and in Laric warred with the like glorie, which is nothing impaired by the learned stile of his Recorder Josephus, unto whom againe for these affaires I must referre the curious Reader.

(3) Jerusalem, with the slaughter of eleven thousand Teues, even on the birth day of his daughter, with such honour he wonne, that thereupon presently he was surnamed Emperor, even in the life time of Vespasian his Father: and from that day carried himselfe as his Associate in the Empire; for with him hee Triumphed, and with him hee iointly administrated the Consulship, his Colleague hee was in the Tribunes authority, and his Companion also in seven Consulships: In all which, though the Edilits went forth in his fathers name, yet were they pennied by himselfe. Of this his victorie over the Teues, hee left the remembrance to posteritie by stamping upon the reverse of his coines IVD. CAP. with pictures expressing his Triumph and the Teues overthrow, which in the front of this Chapter we have also placed.

(4) Somewhat hee was blemished with the loue of Berenice, the beautifull Queene of Iudrie, and much more with the murder of Anna Coma, only through jealousy conceived of her: and whether that was the sinne whereof at his death hee repented, is vncertain, when lifting vp his eyes to Heaven, hee complained why his Life should be taken from him, that excepting one offence deserved not to die. As himselfe in glorie wielded the Emperiall Scepter, so did his Substitutes governe the Provinces, at which time in Britaine, Agricola was President, and therein had spent almost two yeares vnder the raigne of Vespasian, in such manner as wee haue declared.

(5) In his third yeare, hee discovered new Countries, and parts of this Iland yet vntouched, or at leastwise not thoroughly subdued, as altogether vnusitate of that which was gotten, & fought to draw the confines of the Empire with a larger compass: therefore marching Northward to the Erub of Tam, waisted all as he went, and without any resistance fortified the places with Castles and Bastowkes, which hee stored with sufficient provision, where euerie Garrison wintering, garded it selfe; and with the Summers service, euer repaired the Winters euents, whereby euermore the Enemie went to the worke, and his designs prospered as himselfe wished.

(6) The fourth Summer was spent in perusing and ordering that which hee had ouer-runn. And if the glory of the Romane name could haue permitted, or fo beene finished, it needed not to haue sought other limits of Britaine: for Glota and Bodetris, two armies of two opposite Seas, shooting farre into the Land, and onely diuided asunder by a narrow partition of ground, the same was both garded and fortified with Castles and Garrisons: so that the Romans were absolute Lords of all the South-side, and had cast the Enemie as it were into another Iland.

(7) In this state stood this Province of Britaine at the death of Titus, whose short raign hath left no long matters of discourse, and his All: greater vnder other Emperours, then when hee was Emperor himselfe; yet that little time wherein hee gouerned, was with Iustice, Liberaltie and Loue of all. A great Enemie hee was to Procurers, Peisijagers, and Extortours of penall Inues, which Canker-wormes of Common-wealths and Catterpillers to Courts of Iustice, hee caused to bee whipped and banished out of Rome. Louing and familiar hee was to all his Subiects, and so delirous to giue them satisfaction, that his vniuersall saying was, No man ought to be sad from the speech of a Prince. Mercifull hee was to the poore, and so readie to do them good, that one day being spent by him without any notable action, in borrow hee said: I haue quite lost a day. Hee died the thirteenth of September, the yeare from Christi Nativity eightie three, when hee had reigned two yeares and two moethes, and in the two and fortieth yeare of his age, being poisoned by Domitian his Brother and Successor.

FLAVIUS DOMITIAN.

CHAPTER XIV.

Domitian Emp.

Agricola Lieut.

Ann. Do. 83.

Domitian attaining the Empire by the death of Titus, (wrought by himself) as fate differed from him in various conditions, as he was linked neere him in consanguinitie of blood: His youth not spent in Armes, with his Father and Brother, but inercially consumed in lasciuiousness and penurie.

(2) At Rome hee was in the Mithellan troubles, where, with Sabinus his Vncle, he had bene murdered, had not the Sexton of the Capitoll hid him in his house, and in the habit of a Minister unknown, thence elapcd : which place afterwards, when hee came to be Emperour, he gorgeously built for a Temple to Iupiter his supposed Prefectur, and consecrated himselfe in the lap of that heathenish Idoll. Hee very speedily apprehended the hope of an Emperre, for no sooner was his Father made Emperour, but that hee assumed the name of Caesar, and in Rome caried himselfe with such prodigallitie, and so liberally made promises of the Imperiall Officers, that his father hearing thereof, said, he marvelled why his sonne sent not one to succeed him in his place. But to dissimble and cloake his idle conceits, he gaue himselfe to the study of Poësie, (although with little affection, as the end produced) for which notwithstanding both Pliny and Marshall doe highly commend him, as it is the manner of men to admire the very shadow of a good quality in Princes and great ones : and so doth Isaenall and Suetonius praise his braue minde, for his shewes in the Amphitheater, wherein not only men, but women also were brought, and forced to fight for their lues with wilde beasts: a cruell spectacle neuertheless and vnbecoming to humanity.

(4) Who now in the fifth yeere of his gouernment tooke the seas, and with many prosperous combats subdued some adiacent places and people, before that time unknown, and furnished with forces

those parts of Britaine, which lay coasted against Ireland : to which Countrey also hee had a minde, and would often say, that if the Romans were therein planted, the Libertie of the Britaines would soone be banished quite out of fight, and out of hope.

(5) Now in the sixth yeere of his Prefecture, because a general rising of all the farther Nations beyond Baduria was feared, and passages were all beset with power of the Enemies, he manned a Fleet to search the creeks and harbours of the ample Region beyond it, and with his Arme marched farther North. The Britaines heereat, especially at sight of their ships, much amazed and troubled, knowing now that the secret of their Seas were all discovered, and no refuge left if they were overcome, armed themselves with great preparation; and the Caledonians (a most puissant and strong Nation in those parts) the foremost; who, as challengers, braced the Romans so boldly, and in such manner, that some counselled the Generall to retire his forces on this side Baduria, and rather of his owne accord to depart, then to be repelled with shame.

in several places, should induce a greater and more uncertain terror, followed himself with his Armie by Land: having drawn to his partie some of the valiantest Britanni, whom by long experience in Peace, he had found most faithful for his Warres: and so arrived at the Mount "Grampius, where the Britanni had lodged themselves before, and as men nothing dejected by the unfortunate chance of the former battaile, had now prepared themselves attending only for Revenge or Servitude. And being taught, that common danger must be repelled with mutual Concord, by Leagues and Embassages they assembled the power of all their Cities together, about thirte thousand armed men, as by view was taken, besides an endless number of youth which daily flocked vnto them, and many laiffe Old men renowned in the former warres, and bearing the Badges due to their honour: at what time, Galgarn, for vertue and birth, of all the Leaders the Principall man, feeling the multitude body demaund the Battell, in lead to haue vied this, or the like speech.

"(8) When I behold this present Assemblie, and consider the cause of this instant necessity, I haue reason to presume, that this day, and this our agreement in consent, will giue a happy beginning to our freedom, and an end of troubles vnto our Land. For, wee which inhabit these farthest Pro-montories, know no Land beyond vs wherunto we may flie, nor no Seas left vs now for safetie, the Roman Naine thus (as you see) surueying our Coasts: So that combat and armes, which men of valour desire for honour, the very dastard of force must now vie for his securitie. Wee that are the flower of the British Militarie, and are seated here in the vntermost part of the Isle, law neuer yet the borders of those Countries which serued in slaue-rie, our eyes being vnpolluted and free from all contagion of Tyrannie. Our former Battailles fought with the Romans had their euenes, yet so, that refuge and hope rested still in our hands; wee haue hitherto liued in libertie, whereas none beside vs are free; vs hitherto this Corner and secret recess hath defended, now the Vntermost point of our Land is laid open: and things the lesse they haue bene within knowledge, the greater the glorie is to achieve them. But what Nation is there now beyond vs? what else see we but Water and Rocks, and the Romans within, Land-lords of all, nay rather Rulers of all, both in Land and Sea? whose intolerable pride by humble subiection in vaine shall wee seek to auoid. If the Country be rich, they seeke to winne wealth; if poore, to gaine glorie: but neither Earth nor wey, can satisfie their greedy affection, much lesse this cold North can let an end to their desires. To kill, to spoile, and take away by force, that falsly they terme Empire and Government: and when all is made a waste wilderness, that they call Peace. Most deare vnto man are his Children and blood; but those are pressed for their warres, and serue as their slaves, we know not where our Goods are their tributes, our Come their prosellian; our Wives, Silvers and Daughters, in Warre violently forced, in Peace vnder title of friends and guests, shamefully abused, and our own Bodies worne & consumed in paying of Bogs and other seruile drudgeries, with thousands of stripes, and many indignities more. Slaves which are borne to bondage are sold but once, and after are fed at their Owners expences; but Britannic daily buyed, daily feeded, and is at charges with her owne Bondage. We are the last to be conquered, and therefore is our destruction most fought, as being the most vile in account: No Fields we haue to manure, no Mines to be digged, no Ports to trade in, and to what purpose then should they refuse vs alie? Besides, the Manhood and fierce courage of the subject, plentiful not much the zealous Sauaigine; and this Corner being so secret, and out of the way, the more securitie it yieldeth vs, in them

"it workes the greater suspicion. Then, seeing all hope of fauour is past, let vs take courage to defend and maintaine our owne libertie as well as our honour. The Servant by a Woman, fired the Colours, forced the Cassies; and if that lucke beginning had not bene ended in a carelesse securitie, the Southerne Britanni might with ease haue shaken off the yoke. We as yet neuer touched, neuer subdued, and borne to bee free, not slaves to the Romans; wee (Livy) now are to make proofe of our valour, and to shew in this encounter, what men Caesar hath referred forher selfe. And do you thinke, that the Romans are as valiant in Warre as they are wanton in Peace? I assure you, nothing lesse: for not by their Vertues, but by our larringes, they are growne into fame: and of the enemies faults they make vie to the glory of their owne Armes, composed (we know) most of diuers Nations; and therefore as in prosperitie they hold not alwaies together, so doubtlesse, if fortune turne aside, their seruices will appeare: vnlesse you suppose the Gauls and Germanes, and (to our shame be it spoken) many of our owne Nations, (which now lend their liues to establish a foraine Vijour) bee lead with heares affection; whereas contrariwise it is apparant, that Terror and Distrust, (weake workers to conferre loue) are the onely causes which once remoued, then those that haue made an end to feare, will soone begin to hate. All things that may incite vnto victorie are for vs: the Romans haue no Wines to batten them on, if they faint; no Paras to vbrayd them, if they flie; most of them haue no Countrie at all, or if they haue, it is by intrusion taken from others: A few fearefull persons stand here before vs, trembling and gazing at the strangeness of the heauen it selfe, at the Sea, and at the Woods, whom the Gods haue deliuered, mewed vp and fettered into our hands. Let not their braue shewes of glittering Gold or Siluer, any way dismay you, which of themselves neither offend nor defend. And be you well assured, amongst our enemies wee shall finde many on our side; The Britanni will agnize their owne Cause; The Gauls will remember their wonted libertie and former estate; And the rest of the Germanes will leaue and forsake them, as of late the Pyssini did. What then shall wee feare? The Cassies are empty; the Colours are peopled with aged and impotent persons; the free Cities discontent, and in factions, whilst those which are vnder, obey with ill will, and they which doe gouerne, rule against right. Here you see before vs is the General and the Armie, on each side Tributes, Servitudes and other miseries inseparable, which whether we shall continue for euer, or cast off subiection as free-borne Britanni, is lyeth thus day in the Field and your approoued manhoods. Wherefore I beseech you in ioyning Battell, beare in your Minds your worthy Ancestors, your Selues, and following Posterities, which if you fail, shall for euer lye in subiection and slaue-rie.

"(9) This speech was so vehemently deliuered, and so cheerfully of them all received, that with songs and confused acclamations (after their accustomed fashion) they clustered together on heaps, and some of the boldest advanced forward, whilst Agricola likewise was encouraging his men, who straightwaies ranne to their weapons, and rushed on furiously toward the Enemy.

"(10) The Britanni were marshalled in the higher ground, sly both to the shew, and to terrifie: the first Battalion standing on the plaine, the rest on the ascent of the hill, knit and rising as it were one ower another; the middle of the field was filled with clattering and running of Chariots and horsemens. Agricola seeing their number to excede his, drew his battaile in length, and leuning his horse, advanced himselfe before the Engines on foote.

"(11) In the first assault before the ioyning, both sides encountered with discharge of their darts, wherein the

the Britains, employing both art and valour, with their great fwords and little Targets, avoided the volue of the Romans, throwing down withall great force of theirs vpon them, whereas they were both galled and sore wounded. Agricola seeing his men thus stoutly refused,ooke another course: for, spying the advantage, he commanded three Batavian Cohorts, and two of the Tungrian, to press forward, and bring the matter to bloody strokes and din of sword, at which (in respect of their long seruice) they were very expert in, but contrariwise to the Britains very preiudiciall, by reason of their little Bucklers, and huge fwords, being blunt pointed, and no waies fit for the close in fight. This command advantaged the Romans much: for these with the pikes of their Bucklers, when they came to deale blowes, so mangled the faces of the Britains, that they were not able to stand before them; and the rest, gathering courage vpon emulation of these, ascended the hill, bearing downe all that was in their way, so that many halfe dead, and some wholly vnwatched, were ouer-passed, and left for halfe of winning the field. In the meane while the Chariots mingled themselves with the battle of footmen, and the troopes of horsemen began for to flie: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now distressed themselves, by the vacuennesse of the ground, and thicke ranks of the enemy, and were forced to fight standing still, and by the maine weight of hories to beare downe one another. The wandering Wagons alio, and mallerlike hories, as chance or feare did guide them, ouer-bare many times their friends, and thwarted their way that met them.

(13) Of the Romans side were slaine (if wee must credit their owne figures) onely three hundred and foure persons, and of them, one of extraordinary note and account, Aulus Atricus, Captaine of a Cohort, who vpon a youthfull heat, and fiercenesse of his hore, was carried amidst his enemies. Of the Britains fell ten thousand, and their delignes so defeated and broken, that as desperate men, they forsake their houses, and in despite for fire on them themselves: the hurt persons they carrie and draw with them, and call them that are wharnt, hoping to be releued by them. One while they chuse out holes to lurke in, for their liues safetie; sometimes in great haile forsake them, as doubting therein their owne securitie. Dispersed asunder, they lament, and attend death: assembled together, exspoliuate of their meanes and life: one while conceiuing a glimmering of some small hope, another while dejected with vter despair: Sometimes at the sight of their dearest beloued, moued to pittie; but much oftner stirred to rage, for reuenge, and many of them, each by way of compassion, slew their dearest Wives and Children, to rid them from their future miseries.

(14) Agricola hauing made euery where a desolation and silence, withdrew his Armie towards the Horreflens, where taking hostages for their fidelitie, sent the Admirall of his Navy to liue about the North Coast of Brittain, who with strength and store tooke the Seas, their terror gone already before, himselfe with ealie and gentle iourneys disposed his foot and horsemen in their Winning places, and planted Garri- sons vpon the Borders betweene Gloia and Bodo-

tria. And his Naue with prosperous winde and felicitee arrived at the Port of Tranucis.

(15) Thus, after many conflicts, about the space of one hundred thirty six yeeres from Julius Cæsar first entrance, the vtmost limies of Brittain, and the Iles of the Orades lying on the North side of it, were by the valour and industrie of Julius Agricola first discovered, and made knowne vnto the Romans; and the South part of the Ile, in the fourth yeere of the reigne of Dominian, (being the yeere of our Sauour eightie six) reduced into a full Province, the government whereof was euer annexed and appropriate to the Roman Emperours themselves, and not at the disposition of the Senate, as other Provinces were.

(16) This state of affaires in Brittain, Agricola signified by letter, without any amplifying termes to Dominian the Emperour, who (after his manner) with a cheerefull countenance and great desire, received the Newes, being inwardly prickted with feare and disdain, that his late counterfeited Triumph of Germanie (wherein certaine slaues bought for money, were attired, and their haire dressed as Captiues of that Countrey) was had in derision, and idly scorned abroad; whereas now a true and imperiall victorie of so many thousand enemies subdued and slaine, was current and famous in euery mans mouth: as being indeed a thing dangerous, that a priuate mans name should be exalted about his Prince. In vaine then had hee superstitious the studie of Oratorie, and other worthy polite Arts, thereby to keepe downe other mens reputation, if he should in Military glory be disfigured by another. And to be a good Commander of an Armie, was to be a more priuate estate, that being a Vertue peculiar for a Prince, and therefore not lightly to be passed ouer. With these and the like incentives his minde was tormented; yet thought he it best to dissemble his malice, vntill the heat of his glory, and lone of his soldiers were somewhat abated. And forthwith he commanded for Agricola, Triumphall ornaments, stare, honours, and what else vntually conferred in lieu of Triumph; hee yet remaining in charge, from whence, with the like police alio, hee was shortly displaced. For Syria, by the death of Attilius Rufus, lay destitute of a Lieutenant; and that place referred for Men of great qualitie, Dominian gaue forth was purposed for Agricola, and sent him both his Patent and Successor into Brittain; who thereupon deliuered vp the Province in a peaceable estate vnto Salsustius Lucullus, and returned to Rome.

(17) Where the life of Dominian was now grown vnreuerable vaine. The surname Germanicus he assumed to himselfe, for some small seruice therein done. The Moneths September and October hee changed into the names of Germanicus and Dominianus, because that in the one hee entered his Empire, and in the other was borne. He caused his Senate to be made in gold, and commanded, himselfe to be called G.O.D. His cruelty euery way matchable to his pride. The Senators and Nobles vpon small fauours hee murdered: many new tortures hee inuented: Consecrations and Banishments, were fauours, not punishments. Amongst all which, the Christians bare a part, whose Second Persecution this Tyrant raised and began. The great Euangelist Iohn hee banished into the Ile of Patmos, where hee reeched his Revelations from Iesus Christ, appearing vnto him in no lesse Maiestie then Daniel before time had seen him in his Visions, and both (after a sort) in one and the same manner: their Visions alike, and almost to the like end: For as Daniel saw a Lion, Beare, Leopard, and Man with Ten horns, persecute the Iewes Gods people, and to fall before the Stone cut without hands, which brake into powder the Image of their Tyrannicall Government, to giue place to the peaceable Birth and Kingdome of Christ; so Iohn saw one Beast compated of these foure, moucht like a Lion, footed like a Beare, spotted as the Leopard, and horned for number and power with the Man, reigning their Tyrannie in raising Persecutions in the Church of Christ, and clouding with Military

(18) Among many others ſlaine by Domitian, Saluſtius Lucullus whom he had made Lieutenant General of Brittain was one, and the onely cauſe is reported to bee, that hee had deuſed and made certaine Spies or Launces for ſeruice, which hee cauſed to be called Lucullians after his owne name; which was a matter held very ſuſpicious by Domitian, who thought euerie memorable act done by another, did plucke a feather from his plume. And in theſe courſes continued ſo long, that laſtly hee grew odious to all, even to his neareſt friends and followers which himſelfe had raiſed, who, together with his Wife, conſpired his death.

But after the death of Domitian died many Records, and the Preſenters proceedings (eſpecially thoſe that moſt concerne Brittain) left vn certaine; and therefore are neither with the like largeneſſe profecuted, nor with the like authoritie anouchd. And were it not that theſe Roman Emperours ſucceeding, did onely continue the ſucceſſion of our Britiſh Monarchs, many of them might be quite omitted, as neither themſelves, nor deputies, allies, or enemies once ſpoken of concerning our affaires, and the Government of this Preſent, during thoſe times ſo maimed and defective (in reſpect of any warrantable relations) that hardly a method can bee offered to the fitting of a continuall Hiſtorie. Yet as we finde it, let vs haue libertie to deliuer it, and rather to expoſe Truth in the meane aſſure that Time hath left her, then by diſguizing her in richer robes to abuſe the World, and make her ſeeme nought elle but a counterfeit, as Plutarch in the life of Pericles hath complained.

Nero Nerva succeeded Flavius Traian in the Roman Empire; borne neere unto Scull in the Territories of Spain: of a noble familie, but was much more enabled in himselfe for his princely endowments, which moved Nerva in his life time to adopt him into so high a calling, and the whole Senate after his death joyfull to confirme his Election, and so often to honour him with the title of the Most Excellent Prince, in publicke dedications, as on the Coin above.

(2) Hee raised the Roman Empire unto the very highest pitch of glory, and spread the power of their Command into the largest circuit that ever before or since hath bene possibled. For the Kingdom of Dacia hee subdued; Armenia, Parthia, and Mesopotamia made subiect; Affrica, Perfia, and Babylon conquered; passed Tigris, and stretched the confines of the Roman Empire unto the remotest dominions of the Indies, which never before that time had heard of the Roman Name. And indeed, if we looke upon his policie managing of the government, he may seeme (in comparison of others) a right worthy, memorable and lovely Prince, of much affluence, and familiaritie even with his inferiours, and of such carriage towards his Subjects, as he himselfe would wish his Prince (he faid) to vie towards him, if he were a Subject. A great obstructor also of Justice, inasmuch that when hee travelled any Prætor, in giving him the Sword, he commanded him to vie the same even against his owne person, if he violated Law or Equitie. But yet against the good

Christians hee ved neither of both: may hee stirred up their Third Persecution, wherein Ignatius and many other worthy Saints of God, received the Crowne of Martyrdome, in such cruel manner, as that his other vertues are much clouded by that taxation: for mollification whereof, he was compassionately intreated by Plinius Secundus his Tutor, whose Epistles to that purpose are yet extant.

(3) The sewers in his time rose up in armes against the Gentiles, and in Cyrene, Aegypt, and Cyprus, slew a great number: against whom Traian sent his Captaines with forces sufficient, and in divers parts of the Empire put the sewers to death, in such infinite numbers, as that Masurius is accounted the greatest Executioner that ever had bene in the world, God suffering this their punishment to light upon them for their infidelity and obdinance against his Christ.

(4) Finally, after his Conquest in the East, returning towards Rome at Sclavonia in Asia the selfe himselfe was conquered by the stroke of death, by a fluxe the seventh day of August, after hee had reigned ninetene yeeres, six months, and sixtine daies, the yeere of our Redemption one hundred and eightene, and of his age fixtie foure: whose ashes brought to Rome, were inclosed within the Crowne of a goodly Pillar, wrought of one intire stone, containing one hundred forty foot in height.

(5) Of stature hee was bigger, of complexion swarthy, thinn of haire both head and beard, a hooked nose, brode shoulders, long hands, and a pleasant eye, whole lively image was borne in Triumph after his death, and that in most glorious and pompous manner, in celebration of his great renowne and fame attained in his life.

(6) How silent sower writers have been for this Emperours affairs in this our Iland, yet it is to be thought that vnto this, as well as vnto other Provinces, both Properetors, Lieutenants, Presidents, Pretors, and Proconsuls were sent, and every Citie to haue their municipall Magistrates. The Pretor that yearly proclaimed solemne Seditions, wherein himselfe sat aloft vpon a high tribunall seate, and guarded with his liectors about him in great estate, did execute his authoritie throughout his owne iurisdiction, and determined all causes brought before him, where rods and axes were prepared for the common people, that were enforced to receiue a new Ruler euery year. And surely as this yoke of bondage was grievously borne of euery Province, vpon whose necke, it was imposed & laid: So the Britaines vnderwent the weight of that subiection with such vnwillingnes, that in the time of this Traian, they revolted and rebelled, though presently suppressed, as it is euidēt out of Spartianus.

remainē, especially in pastures, or by-grounds out of the rode way, with bankes so high, that euidently they shew themselves. Of these Causies Galen writeth as followeth: The waies (saith he) Traian repaired, by passing with stone, or raising with bankes call'd up such peeces of them as were moist and mory: by flocking up and riding such as were rough and overgrown with bushes and briars: by making bridges ouer Rivers that could not be waded thorow: where the way seemed longer then needed, by cutting out another shorter: if any where by reason of some steepe hill, the passage were hard and uneasy, by turning it aside thorow easier places: now in case it was haunted with wilde beasts, or lie waste and desert, by drawing it thence thorow places inhabited, and withall laying lesse all vnto men and ragged grounds.

Along these Causies the Emperour caused to bee set little pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters cut in the, to signifie how many miles was from place to place. Of these Sulmus Apollinaris writeth thus:

*Antiquum tibi nec terreat agger, Cuius per spatium satis vetusq;
Nomen Casertum viuet columnis.*

*Breaks not the ancient Causies strong,

tain to suppress rebellion.

fter the decaie of Traian, his Nephew Elm Hadrianus, by the consent of the Armie, who swore to him obedience, was proclaimed Emperour, the Senate likewise confirming their choice, as beeing a man indued with gifts both of Art and Nature, answerable to the fortunes of his Estate. His birth was of Spane, in the Citie Italia, neere vnto Civil, where Traian was born, his Father Noble, and his Mother in Calce descended of an honourable stocke.

(1) A great Mathematician he was, skillfull in Arithmetick, Geometrie, Astronomie, and Iudicious Astrologie; learned in the Greeke, and Latine Tongues; in which languages he wrote both Poetic and Prose: well scene in Physicks, and knew the Vertues of Herbes, Rootes, and Stems: A singular Musitian both for Theorie and Practise, and could both limme & carue with approbation of the skillfull: but above all, is the admirable report of his Memorie, who neuer forgot any thing that he either read or heard.

(2) His first businesse for the Empire, was rather a care to hold securely what was gotten, then by enlarging the bounds to endanger the Best and therefore lessening the Compassse, and bettering the strength, he planted his forces along the River Euphrates, and assigned that for the Easterne limits, leauing out India, Armenia, Media, Assyria, Persia, and Mesopotamia, as Countreies too remote for the Romans to hold to their profit. By which his doings other Provinces tooke occasion to reuolt, thirsting after Libertie, and among others the Britaines (as euer most impatient of Strutode) attempted alterations, whose Lieutenant Cneus Trebellius (Successour to Julius Agrippa) could not so gouerne his Souldiers which were growne out of discipline, and by long rest farre out of Order, but that they fell at variance among themselves, and disquieted the most peaceable of the Britains by their licentious manners.

(3) The Northerne Inhabitants, that were more at libertie, set themselves to withstand their wrōgs, to whom also many others joined their affections and forces, whereupon some bickering infused with losse and blood, to represse which Julius Severus was sent by Hadrian: but ere hie could settle the Commotion, was againe recalled and imploied in Syria, to suppress the Iewish rebellion.

(4) These Surres here still continuing, the Emperour tooke it to be of such importance, that he retired in Person to adresse for Britaine, which he performed in his third Consulship, the yeare of Christ

One hundred twentie foure, attended on by three Legions; of which, his Army for this exploit was then composed, as appeareth by his money in the entrance of his life, fixed in memorie of this undertaking: With these hee encountered the Northern Riders, recovered such holds as they had taken, and forced them into the Wodes and Mountaines, whither the Romanes Hayesmen without danger could not pursue them. But perceiving the Aire too sharpe for the Romanes constitution, and the Soile rough and offesse profit then the rest, hee made a Fortification or strong Wall of Earth, which (as Lampridius saith) did continue on the Wey from Tinns, (that is, the River Eben in Cumberland neere Carlisle) vnto the River Tine, or Tine at Newcastle in Northumberland in the East, and was no less then Eightie miles in length. This Wall (saith he) was made of stakes driuen deepe into the ground, and bound together in the manner of an hedge, and with Turfe and Earth intermured as a Rampire or Bulwark to defend the Incurions of the wilder Britaines and ill Neighbours that daily molested the peace of the Romanes. Hadrian his worke finished, and the Province reduced to the obedience of the farst Gouverneile Rome, at whose feet he had laid againe the name of Britaine, as appeareth in the first Reverse of his Coine, placed in the fronture of this Chapter) triumphantly returned to Rome, and for his honourable aduventure and Expedition had his name inscribed vpon his Coine with this addition: THE RESTORER OF BRITANNIE.

(6) Neither after this seemed the Southerne Britains greatly to contend, but patiently bore the yoke of subiection, which Time and Custom had made lesse painfull, the rather, for that they saw themselves to stand in neede of the Romanes helpe against the inroades of their owne Countreymen, whose crueltie was now as much feared, as in former times the Inuasion of Strangers: whereupon they conformed themselves more willingly to the Romanes Lawes, both in Martiall and Ciuill affaires: which were then principallie directed by Licinius Priscus, who had bene not long before employed by Hadrian in the seruice of Ierunn, and was at this present Lieutenant of Britannie.

(7) This seuill warre happened in the eighteenth yeere of the Reigne of Hadrian, who suddenly assailed and flew where they came, both Romanes and Christians: for reuenge whereof, besides an infinite number of them slaine and tortured, their Citie Ierusalem was also rased euen to the ground, and another built, but not altogether in the same place, and the name thereof changed to ARISTIA: the Iewes vterly banished thence; and (as Aristides Pelaeus writeth) noe lawfall for them to looke towards that Citie nor Sail, no nor; through the Chinke or Crenell of a dore: And vpon the Gate that leadeth towards Beth-lehem, hee caused a Sunnet to be engrauen, a Beast by the Law accounted most vncleane, and by them abhorrible.

(8) But as this Emperour was exasperated against the Iewes, so was hee gracious and fauourable to the Christians, and the rather at the request of Quadratus, a Disciple (as is supposed) of the Apostles, who wrote vnto him concerning them; and of Aristides a learned Philosopher of Athens, who made an Apologie for their defence; so that the Persecution then in practise was forbidden by Hadrian in a publicke Edict; who (as Lampridius writeth) was mandated to haue built a Temple to the seruice of Christ, had not some disuaded him therewith. In extremitie of sickness hee designed Cesar, Lucius Aelius, whose Coyne wee haue hereunder expressed. A mandate to this Emperour, if we consider at how great a rate hee bought for him the acceptance of the Commons and Militarie men: And how short a time the blaze of that Honour continued: for hee died so soone, that Hadrian himselfe had want to say,

(9) When hee had reigned in great honour and loue the space of one and twentie yeeres, five moneths, and fifteene daies, hee died, the eighth or tenth of Iulie, of a dropsie, which maladie so tormented him, that willingly he refused all fastenance, and languished away through faintnesse. Hee was of personage tall, and very strong, of a good complexion, and amiable countenance, wearing the haire of his head and beard long, and died aged sixty two, the yeere of our Lord God, One hundred thirtie vnie.

CHAPTER XVIII.

*Antonin. Pius
Emp.*

Lollius Urbi-cus Lieut.

An. Do. 139.

Ext vnto whom succeeded Antoninus, (for his many vertues) furnamed the Pious: and by the Senate, Father of his Country. This man did not onely equal his Adopter and Predecessors, in wisdom and other princely qualities, but was also compared, for his peace and policie, vnto Numa Pompilius the second King of Rome, who for his renowned gouernment, is so famously in their Histories recorded. His birth was in Lombardy, the son of Aurelius Fulvius, and Nephew to Titus Aurelius Fulvius, that had bene Consul, and held other Offices of dignity and State. The whole time of whose Reigne was so spent in peace, that small remembrances remaine of any martiall affaires: yet such as we finde in Britannie we will deliuer.

(2) At his first entrance into the Empire, about the yeere of Christ, One hundred thirtie nine (as appeareth by the money minted in memorie of the reduction of Britannie) the Northerne Brittaines in that part of this Ile began to stirre, and made incursions into the Provincie, notwithstanding the Rampire or Wall that Adrian had made. Against whom Lollius Urbicus Lieutenant here vnder Antoninus, brought his power, and with some skirmishes put them backe: taking from the Brittaines part of their Land, as a Mall, for the walke they had done to the Gemonians, a Province adjoining vnto the Brittaines, whose people had put themselves vnder the Emperours protection. Which done, he repaired the Wall with stronger Fortifications; or (which is more probable) raised vp another not farre from the same, to double the defense: for (saith Julius Capitolinus) Lollius the Legate to Antoninus encompassing the Brittaines, build another turfe Wall to divide the Provincie, and to impeach the incursions of the barbarous. Notwithstanding the honour of this seruice (as is testified by the ancient Panegyricke) was (by one Frontinus) attributed wholly to Antoninus the Emperour himselfe: who, although absent and in his Palace at Rome, yet sitting as it were at the Helme of a Ship, did command and direct the enterprise, and therefore had right to the glory thereof. This Wall also (as M. Claudius Ptolemeus cometh forth, hauing scene it so trauced in an ancient Chorographical Chart) was drawen from the Riuer Tine vnto Carlisle: but Time and Warre haue worn it now away.

(1) In the meane while a new insurrection was kindled among the Brittaines, that annoyed some of the Romanes Confederates. But by the discretion of the Generall, it was quenched before it came to flame: for vpon the first rumour of the Reuolt, Lollius marched thither with part of his Armie, commanding Seius

Saturius, Admirall of the British Fleet, to waffe vpon the North of the Island, both to defend the Coast from danger, and also vpon occasions to further the Land-seruice, if need were: by which meanes, the Brittaines were easily reduced to obedience, even by the presence onely of the Lieutenant, who for his good seruice done in Brittain, during the short time of his imploiment there, obtained the surname Britannicus. This may by the first figure in the face of this Chapter (being in the third Constallship of this Emperour) be coniectured to haue hapned in the yeere of Christ one hundred forty one; and by inscription of the last Coine in that ranke it is manifest that there was some other expedition against Brittain the yeere following.

"(1) The Emperour Cæsar Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, fiftene times Tribune, thrice Consul, vnto the Commons of Asia sendeth greeting. I doubt nocht that Gods themselves haue a care that wicked persons shall bee brought to light: for it much more doth appertaine vnto them, then it doth vnto you, to punish such as refuse to yeeld them worship. But this course which you take doth confirme them whom you persecute, in this their opinion of you, that you are impious men, and meere Atheists: whereby it cometh to passe, that they desire in the quarrell of their God rather to die, then to yeeld to the will of such as you are, and to embrace your forme of Religion. Let it not seeme vnreasonable to call to your remembrance the Earth-quakes, which lately happened, and which yet are to your great terror and griefe; because I vnderstand that in such like accidents you cast the enuy of such common misfortunes vpon their shoulders, whereby their confidence and trust in their God is much the more increased: whereas you being still ignorant of the true causes of such things, doe both neglect the worship of the other Gods, and also banish and persecute the seruice of the Immortal God, whom the Christians doe worship, and you persecute to the death all the embracers of that Profession. In the behalfe of these men many of our Provinciall Prefects haue written before vnto our Father of famous memory to whom he answered, that they should not bee molested, vnlesse they were proved to haue practised Treason against the Emperiall State: and touching the same matter some haue giuen notice

And by this our Edict doe we ordaine, that if any hereafter bee found thus buse in mocking their kinde of men without any their offence, we command that hee that is accused vpon this point, be absolved, albeit he be proued to be such a man as he is charged to bee, that is, a Christian; and he that is his Accuser shall suffer the same punishment, which he sought to procure vpon the other.

This Edict was promulgated at Ephesus in the General Council of all Asia: so favourable was this good Emperour to the true Professors, and (indeed) to all sorts of men, hauing that Apathisme of Scipio Africanus rise in his mouth: That he had rather save one Subject liue, then kill a thousand Enemies.

(6) He was of Stature tall, of a stately presence, in countenance Maiesticall, in manners milde, of a singular wit, verie learned and eloquent, a great louer of Husbandrie, peaceable, mercifull and honourous; in the last of which vertues, he so much exceeded, that thereby he let going whollie his owne private estate & demaines, wherewith when his Emperour much repined, he told her, that when he undertooke the Title and State of an Emperour, he then did forgoe the interest and proprieties of a private Person: meaning that a Prince is not much to respect his private wealth, so as the publike wealth and welfare of the State may be advanced. In fine, this large Reule and praise is fastened on him, that neither in his youth he did any thing rashly, nor in his age any thing negligently: In which honourable course, hauing reigned twentie and two years, (some say twentie three) seven months, and twentie six daies, he died of a Canker at Larinum the seventh of March the yeare of his life seuentie sixe, and of Christ one hundred sixtie two.

CHAPTER XIX.

Marcus Aurelius Emp.

Calpurnius Agric. Lieut.

An. Do. 162.

From the vertuous examples of the good Emperour Pius, proceeded a branch of no lesse towardlinesse and fruitfulness, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Verus, Philosophus (for by so many honourable names is he remembered) and although hee sprung not from Pius, as from his naturall roote, yet was he adopted Same, and grafted into his Stocke and alliance by the Marriage of his daughter Favstina: Hee was the Sonne of Elius Verus who died Frater, and whose Pedigree is brought from Natus Pompeius, the second King of Rome; and his Mother was Domitilla Camilla, daughter of Claudius Tullus.

(2) This man chose to him for his Associate in the Empire, Lucius Verus, the sonne of Lucius Ceionius Commodus, whom Pius had adopted (but died before him) and therefore this Verus was respectiue commended vnto Aurelius; between whose natures and conditions was as much oddes, as betwixt Day and Night: The one very moderate, louing, and industrious, the other proud, carelesse and cruell: the fruits whereof, the poore Christians felt, whose chiefest pillars, Papirius, Bishop of Smirna, and Justinus Martyr, an excellent Philosopher, with infinite more, were put to most cruell deaths; and by him the fourth persecution of Gods Saints was begun: whose licentious and bloodie life, lasting in Authoritie the space of nine yeares, was cut off by an Apooplexie in the presence of Aurilius being then in expedition towards Germanie, whose Coine wee haue here expressed as wee finde it minted with his face and reuerie.

(1) Aurelius the Emperour following the warres against those who there revolted, was inclosed about with his Enemies, called the Quadi, and suffered great mortalitie both by Pestilence, and much more by want of water, whereby himselfe and Host were almost confounded: At which time many Christian Souldiers being in his Campe, and commanded (as Isaia was) to call vpon their God, they fell prostrate on the ground in prayers, and obtained of him to pleturous a shower of raine, as therewith after five daies extreamest drowth and thirst, the whole Army was refreshed, and the Quadi contrariwise by Thunder & Lightning were quite dispersed and overthrowne.

(4) This wonder (saith Eusebius) is reported even by those Historians, who fauoured not Christianitie: and the prudent Epistle of the Emperour himselfe, (which hee wrote to the Senate for confirmation of this miracle, yet extant) doth warrant the same: whereupon he both mitigated the rage against Christi Professors, and (by testimony of Apollinaris) named that Legion the Christianus, for a certaiuing remembrance, The lightning Legion.

services was attributed to the Emperours themselves, and the pains in attempting, and perils in obtaining did commonly breed nothing but disgrace and eny after victorie, to those by whom it was achieved. So also Lucius Verus, (whom this excellent Emperour had in the yeere 162. as appeareth by his Coine of Concord, set in the entrance of his life, elected his College in the Empire) to supply the defect of merit in himselfe, tooke from the Conquest of Audius Castus, and other his Capaines in Armenia, Parthia and Media, the Trophies of their victories, with which he filled up his Title, and adorned his Monney, expressed in the beginning of this Chapter.

(5) About these times, albeit other things went not so happily with Britaine as might have been wished, yet one felicitie then befell her, which had both countervailing her owne calamities, and overpoize the good fortunes of all other Nations: and that was the blessed rest of the Gosfell of peace in this warring and unpeacable Kingdome, a great part thereof being governed at that time by King Lucius, furnished Lower-Mann. Forthat was the policie and ancient custome of the Romans (as Tacitus saith) to viceren King themselves for their instruments, to bring the people into bondage. And Antoninus Pius ending warre, permitted Kingdomes to be governed by their owne Kings, and Provinces by their owne Cemites (as saith Capitoline.) This King disliking the Paganisme and Idolatry of his people, (though, as wee have shewed, among many of them the truth of Christis Doctrine was both taught and embraced, even from the first planting thereof) and being incited both by the exemplary life and pity of the Christians, and also by the manifest miracles wrought amongst them, and encouraged moreover by the favourable Edicts of the Emperours in their behalfe, and by the good affections and forwardnesse of their Deputies here, Trobellian and Pertinax; he gave leave to their Religion by publike warrant, and was the first Christian King in the world, and Britaine the first Province that embraced the Gosfell by publike authority, as Sabbellian saith.

(7) This Lucius (as before wee have touched) to be better furnished with Christian Lawes for himselfe and Subjects, missis legatione ad Imperatorem Romanorum, & a Papa Romanus Eleutherius, (as Armenius saith) for in this purgation the Church was so humble, to vaile (as farr as might be) her actions in the Imperiall licence, sent two learned Clerkes, whose names were Elacius and Medaunus, skilfull in the Scriptures, to Eleutherius Bishop of Rome: whose Reply to his most godly Demand (because the fauourers of the Papall Authority either doe doubt it, or altogether deny it) I have thought good here verbatim to insert, as I my selfe have found it, in a most ancient Manuscript amongst the authentick Records and Constitutions of the Cite of LONDON.

Pope Eleutherius thus wrote to Lucius King of Britannia, for the reformation of the King and the Nobles of the Kingdome of Brittain: Thou desiredst us to send unto you the Roman and Imperiall Lawes, which you would use in your Kingdome of Brittain. The Roman Lawes and the Emperours were way at all times iustice, but the Law of God by no means. By the Divine Clemencie you have of late received in your Kingdome of Brittain the Law and Faith of Christ: You have written us in your Kingdome

Kingdome both the Old and New Testament: out of them (as Gods name) by the Counsell of your State, take you a Law, and thereunto by Gods permission, govern your Kingdome of Britannie: For you are Gods Vicar in your Kingdome, as the kings Prophet saith, The earth is the Lords and the plenty thereof, the whole world and they that dwell therein. And againe in the same Prophetical King, Thou shalt loosed righteousness and hated iniquity, wherefore, God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oyle of gladness above thy fellows. And againe: Lord give thy judgements vnto the king, and thy iustice vnto the Kings iudges. He saith not, The iudgement or iustice of the Emperor. And the Kings iudges are the Christian Nations, and People of the kingdome, such as line and abide together in your Kingdome, under your Protection and peace, according to that in the Gospel: As the Hen gathereth her Chickens vnder her wings. The Nations of the Kingdome of Britannie are your People, who being now secured, you ought to gather them vnto Unity, Concord and Peace, and reassemble them to the Faith and Law of Christ, and to the holy Church, to foster them, cherish them, protect, and rule them, and alwayes to defend them from all inuasions, maleuolence, and hostile attempts. For, Voe be to the Kingdome, whose King is a child, and whose Prince riseth early to banquetting: Neither doe I call a King a child, for the tenderness of his Age, but for the folly and wickedness and madnesse of his disposition: As that reuall Prophet saith: Wicked and blood-chaffy attaine not to halfe their Age. And by how much I meane gluttony, by gluttony, luxury, by luxury all dissoluteness, peruersity, and lewdnesse: according to that of King Solomon: Wickednesse shall not enter into the wicked soule, nor shall it dwell in a Body enthrald to Sinne. A King hath his name from Ruling, and not from his Kingdome: and so long shall you be called a King, while you rule with iustice: if you doe not the name of a King will not continue with you, but you shall lose that reuall title, which God forbid. Almighty God grant you sit to rule your Kingdome of Britannie, that with him, whose Vicar you are in your said Kingdome, you may reigne eternally. To whom with the Father, &c.

(9.) The date of this Epistle (as by some other Copies it appeareth) being the yeare of the second Consulship of Commodus and Vespasianus, may give great light and satisfaction to such as are curious to know the truth, and to reconcile the differences of our Historians, touching the time: That Consulship being about the yeare of Christ one hundred and eighty: which was at the beginning (if not a little before) of Commodus his reigne; and therefore whereas some refer it to the one hundred sixty ninth year after Christ's Passion, it is apparant to be the only error of transcribers, who so write in stead of one hundred threescore nine after his birth; which was, one hundred, the very time of Commodus being Consul the second time: and on this yeere agreed, both forraign and domestick writers of this matter. And albeit the very treasure of this Epistle, careth with it the true Character of Antiquity, yet because our worthy writers, mentioning this Epistle, are charged of flat forgery (by such who challenge to be Masters in all ancient knowledge) we will adde somewhat, to waite off those false aspersions, both from the Record, and from the mentions thereof.

Their first exception is, that the Latin Copy would doubtlesse have been produced by them, if it had not bene counterfeited. Whereto what need we answer, sith now we haue produced it, and can produce as many, as there are Copies of King William the Conquerors Lawes, wherein it is expressly repeated? The next is, that the Epistle is an imitation of it differ each from other. A reason more childish than the former, sith euery man hath a severall conceit of that he translateth, and sometimes the very Originals, (by transcribers ignorance or omission) cause variety of translation, as may appeare in the verse letters of this Copy prefixed. The last, but most duncy and ignorant exception is, that the places of Scriptures mentioned in the letter, are so feintly and feignly applied, as is vnworthy to be fasthered on the learned Calpurnius. Let vs therefore in a word, bring the mainy of this Grand confesse to the touchstone: For Eleutherius proneth first, that Kings are Gods Vicars in their kingdome, because the whole Earth is properly Gods; and therefore Kings haue it not as their owne, but as his Lieutenants: Next, that as David typically, and Christ implicitly, was by God anointed King, for the execution of Righteousnesse and Justice, so euery godly King ought to make: that the only end of his high honor, that being by God aduanced, he might likewise aduance Righteousnesse, Justice, and the seruice of God, whose vassall he is: and that therefore Gods judgements and Lawes, are to be preferred by them, before all humane Lawes: with which they should rule and cherish their godly subjects in their children; and protect them and gather them under one faith as Christ (their master) doth, who therefore comprehend himselfe, to God gathering her Chickens vnder her wings.

The defects of which Princely duties, Eleutherius most largely expresseth afterward, in so proper applications, as if the learned fathers on these places be duly examined, they will be found to hit to exceed the apprehensions of this godly Bishop. But if Robert Combauch, would haue call his eye on the moderne Popes, and their Cardinals applications of Scriptures, what would he then say? God made a greater light and a lesse: therefore the Pope is as much greater then the Emperor, as the Sonne is bigger then the Moone. Christ said to Peter, Kill and cut: therefore the Pope may excommunicate and depose Kings (yea and kill them too for a need.) Peter said, Behold two swords; therefore the Pope hath both Temporal and Spiritual Iurisdiction ouer the world. So God said to Jeremy, he should plant and transplant: therefore the Pope may dispose and transpire all Kingdomes at his pleasure. Christ to Peter, thou art Cephas, and Cephas is a head; therefore the Pope is head of the Church. Dominus sunt Cardines Terra. The earth is the Lords: therefore the Cardinals are the Lords of the Earth. On such pillars and applications of Scriptures, is the whole Papall preuention founded, and yet these late Scribes can so innocently caule it the godly applications of ancient Eleutherius. But to our purpose.

(10.) This Epistle with two other Preachers, Paganus and Damianus, sent vnto King Lucius, did not a little encourage him in his godly purpose, in so much that reuening Baptisme, the Temples of the Heathenish Flamines and Arch-Flamines euen thirtie one in number, were conuerted into so many Christian Temples: See, whereof London, York, and Carlew, now Saint Davids, were made the Metropolitans of the Province.

(11.) A table remaining in the Parish Church of Saint Peter in Cornhill London, recordeth that the foundation thereof was by this King Lucius, and that Church to haue been the Cathedral to thine Archbishopps See. There be that scribe the foundation of Saint Peters Church at Westminster vnto hunc velleth the places are mistaken. Others affirme that this King Lucius likewise built a Church within Dour-stable, to the seruice of Christ, endowing it with the 700000 customers of that House. Differences there are about the time of his Reigne, but none at all for his conuersion and establishing of the Christian Faith. As for those who would haue this Lucius after his Baptisme to haue into Galles and other forraign parts, where subduing many Pagans, he became the Apostole to the Barbarians, and that his sister Emerita threene yeeres after was martyred in the City Augusla: I find thereof no warrant in any sufficient writer; but in this all others agree, that he reigned twelue yeeres, and lieth buried in Gloucester.

(12.) This good Emperor possessed the Sente of Marcellus, ninetene yeeres and eleuen daies; where in he alwayes approoued himselfe in wit excellent, in life vertuous, verie learned and eloquent, full of Clemency, Justice, and Temperance, nothing inferior to

CHAPTER XX.

Entropius.

HE prudent life, and love concerned of so good a Father, gaue hopefull signes and iustfall entrance vnto the Reigne of yong Commodus, his soone degenerating Sonne; who had nothing from him but Nature, and that also much suspected: The knowne

Adulteries of Fanfina, his Mother strongly confirming the opinion of Salustius.

(2) At nineteen yeeres of age, he was inuested Emperour, his raigne not long, but life as loose and impious as the world in fottish pride equalizing Caligula, for intemperance another Vitellius, and in cruelties a second Domitian. Three hundred Concubines continually he kept, and vpon one of them, named Martia, so doted, that he wore her painted Pallare vpon the outside of his Garment; and infusing his money Herculi Commodiano or Romano, which was stamped about the yeere 193. Sometimes Hercules-like would shew him selfe robed in a Lions skinn, bearing a Club in his hand in stead of a Scepter. Other whiles wanronly clad in the habit of an Amazon woman; alwaies costly, but seldom cinnall.

(3) The Month August, he named Commodus, September, Herculeus, and December, Amazonus, according to his owne or his Concubines names. Commendable in nothing but for his skill in darsing, and for some small breathing of the persecuted Christians, which came not of humilitie, but (as Epiphanius writeth) by the mediation of Martia his beloued Concubine, who was found very fauourable to their doctrine: But the outrageous wickednesse of his life made him so hateful to all as that his death was often plotted; and once by some of the Noblest, with whom Lucilla his owne Sister conspired; for which fact he put her, with the rest of the conspirators, to death. The Empire and all things els he wielded at the discretion of others, attending only his voluptuous pleasures, howlocuer the State or Provinces fared vnder him.

(4) In Britainy the Northern Borderers brake thorow the Wall, and finding the Frontiers but weakly guarded entred the Province, where suddenly they surprized the Roman Generall, and killing many of the Souldiers, ranged the Countrey, wassing (without resistance) all where they went. Commodus at Rome, bering these stirres in Britaine rouzed vp his spiries, and sent on Vlpus Marcellus to stay their fury, who with great difficulty forced them back beyond the Wall: and seeing the carelesse seruice of the Souldiers, requied againe the ancient discipline of Warre, that by long ease had been left off by the Romans. The repressing of this incursion, as it seemeth by some reuolt of the province, was about the yeere of Christ one hundred eighty six, as appeareth by the monies of this Emperour set in the entrance of his life, at which time in memory of some worthy expedition and victory against the Britains he stamped them.

(5) This Lieutenant Marcellus is reported to be of a marvellous great temperance and strange diet; for all the time of his abode here hee would eat no Bread, but such as was baked in Rome, neither sleepe he more then would maintaine nature, whereby both his private businesses and proiects for publike seruices were commonly dispatched by night. Seuerer he was in the execution of his place, not led by fauour of the person, nor laid from inflicte by corrupted Bribes; esteeming Money only for necessity, and riches no further then made for publike good: But those his vertues though now with vs they get him honour, yet then did purchase him Enuie with the Emperour, who loath (saith Lampridius) for his Subiects mischiefe and his owne shame: For Commodus hearing Marcellus daily commended, construed his Praise to be his owne Reproach; and donking left he should grow too high, thought good to crop him off betimes, and so sent him Letters of discharge.

(6) The Armiethen feeling the raines loose that ere-whiles had bene borne with a stiffer hand, fell straight to a disordered mutinie, and therein proceeded with such boldnesse as they openly refused any longer to acknowledge Commodus for their Soueraigne: At which time Perennis was a chiefe Agent and so ruled all in Rome for the Emperour, as that he entertained a hope to be himselfe (in time) an absolute and sole-ruling Emperour, and having now fit occasion offered to spread his power farther, he tooke vpon him to redresse these disorders (which Commodus wallowed in his lasciuious idleness) and displacing some wortheie Captaines at his owne pleasure, sent other persons of meane respect or parts, to command those Legions in Britaine, that formerly had been led by Noble Senators and men of Consular dignity, whereby greater mischiefe began to accrew and euill diffusions daily to burst forth, the Armiethen scorning the vpharist Commanders, and the Captains insulting over the Souldiers, (of all sides) the Aides so disquieted, that had the Britains followed the advantage, the whole Province at that time had been in hazard to be lost: upon which distractions no lesse then fifteen hundred Souldiers at once went out of the Land to Rome to complain their wrongs unto Commodus: where charging Perennis to be the stirrer of these troubles, with an intent thereby to raise himselfe or his sonne to the Emperiall Maiesty (a thing thus cannot be touched without found in a Soueraignes ear) they were so farre heard and beleued that Perennis was to them deliuered to be put to death, which accordingly they accomplished with all extremity.

(7) Then was sent for Lieutenant into Brittain Helvius Pertinax, a man of low birth, but high Fortunes, being risen from the state of a common Souldier, to the dignity of a Cnnsull, and had been Commander before that time over many Provinces. Him had Perennis discharged from Brittain, and with disgrace sent and confined into Liguria where hee was borne, whose credit Commodus again with such favours repaired, that he gave him the Surname Britannicus, which glorious title also himselfe had taken about the yeere 184. At his first entrance and usage, he assayed by rough hand to suppress the rebellions of the Army, and adventured his person so farre in some tumults that he was stricken downe and left for dead: but afterwards proceeding with better advice he composed those troubles with most severe punishments of the principall offenders: whereby notwithstanding he presently grew odious to all, and thereupon so far feared his own safety, that he made suit to the Emperour to be discharged of his Lieutenantship.

(8) Vnto him succeeded Clodius Albinus in the Government of Brittain, a man of great birth, forward enough, and fortunate for which the Emperour Com-

modus either vpon favour or feare, did honour him with the title of Cesar, though Albinus seemed vnwilling to accept of the same, and afterwards discovered his disposition more openly in approuing the Ancient and free state of the Romans. For vpon a false report of the death of Commodus, he made an Oration to the Legions in Brittain in fauour of the Senate, whose kind of Government he much commended and perfected before the role of the Emperours: Of which his affection when Commodus understood, he sent Julius Severus in all hast, to take charge of the Armie: and Albinus retired himselfe from all publike affaires, vntill the death of Commodus, which not long after followed, and was wrought vpon this occasion: He hauing assigned many to die, and to charge had introlled their names in a scroll, it chanced Martia his Concubine to light on the same, wherein the law her selfe allotted for one: And revealing this his purpose to others, that stood in the same list, and in the like danger; they together thought best to secure their owne liues by his death: and with poison, stabs and strangling made him away, when he had liued one and thirty yeeres, foure moneths, and viciously reigned thirteen yeeres eight moneths and fifteen daies, the yeere of Christs nativity one hundred ninety and three: the night before the Kalends of January.

CHAPTER. XXI.

PON the person of this Helvius Pertinax (of whom we are now to speake) Fortune (as it seemeth) meant to make the full experience of her power, and from a very slender foundation to raise the building of her owne Pride:

His birth was but poore, and parents as meane, whose Father from a sterile condition got to be free, and traded in Mercury wares for his living: himselfe educated according to his birth rose by degrees to mount the Chaire of all worldly glory, and to be the Monarch of the whole world.

(2) At first a Schoole-master, and taught the Grammar: next a Civil-Lawyer, and pleaded causes in Courts: and lastly, a Martial-man, and served in Campe: where Fortune attended him with such fauourable success, that within five daies, out of the rank of a common Souldier he was preferred to be Captaine of a Cohort, in the Syrian wares against the Parthians, which ended, he was imploied into Brittain, Attilia, and Germany, and also had charge in chiefe of a Fleet vpon the Humbold Seas: he served likewise in Dacia, with such honourable proofe of his valour, as that wife Emperour Marcus Aurelius held him in highest esteeme, and afterward made him Senator of Rome. Then was hee assigned Gouernour of all Syria and Asia, the greatest place of Credit and reputation that might be; and from thence sent againe in-into Britain, chosen out as the principal man, of note for to stay the Commotions there raised against Commodus, where in the Field he was left for dead : but thence also returning after hee had governed foure severall Cæsular Praesides, was created Præconsul of Africa, and immediately after Præfekt of Rome. Neither yet made he his stand there, (though the greatest of any subordinate degree) till hee had mounted the Throne of Majesty, and had obtained the command over All : which fell to his lot by the death of Commodus ; and by the means of Martin, Ælius Laetius, and other Conspirers of his cnd.

(3) For the Murder being done in the dead of the night, Laetius in great haste repaired to Pertinax his lodging ; at whose sight the Old man is bed, expecting nothing but Death, as supposing him sent from Commodus to no other end. But Laetius salutes him by the unexpected name of Emperour, carrying him with acclamations vnto the Army, and in the morning to the Senate, where, of them all with great joy, he was confirmed Augustus.

(4) His first business was to bridle the Licentiousness of the Fraterian Cohorts ; & injuries done by them vnto the Roman Citizens, which gained him such hatred, that it was cause of his death : For these men growne disordered and lawlesse in the reign of Commodus, held themselves wronged, to be now locked vnder the constraint of Laetius civil Government : and there only envied the peace & prosperity of Pertinax, whereas all the Praesides abroad at the very hearing of his Election, and fame of his Imperiall virtues, laid aside their weapons, and desired to embrace peace with a Prince so nobly qualified.

(6) Souldiers and Companions, if you come to kill me, (as I thinke you doe) you shall therein performe an act neither valorous, nor otherwise very commendable for you, no, nor any way grievous vnto my selfe, for every mans life hath his limit, and to mine, by Natures course, the last period cannot be farre. Or thinke you that I feare death, who now am so ripened for it, and have already gotten the very height of all renowne vnto my Name? Surely

“ and short time of Government, which I had devoted “ to the good of all, should seem so disgustfull vnto
“ to any, as to deserve a violent and halsted death, especially “ by you, who are by office, the Guardians of “ my Person : you (I say) whose charge and Oath is,
“ to secure your Soveraigne from perill, and now seek “ to sheath your Swords in his breast, shall either “ leave a Testimony of my bad life deferring it, or “ brand your places with such stains of Treason, as “ Time shall never wear away. And what I pray is “ mine offence? for maintaining your Laws? why it “ was the charge your selfes imposed vpon me. Are “ Laws too strait? surely, not to the vertuous, who “ are even a Law vnto themselves : are they need“ lesse? why then were they made? and being made, “ why should they not be executed? If the death of “ Commodus grieve you, was I the cause? If he were “ made away by Trajan, your selves are conscious of “ my innocency. And thus I assure you, in the word
“ of a Prince, that his death shall deprive you of no“ thing, which you require, if you require nothing
“ but that which is honest and iust. My life, whilst I “ was a Subiect, was spent with you in Warre, now (be“ lieving your Soveraigne) is consumed with cares for “ your Peace : which if you free me of, by taking it a“ way, my troubles shall thereby end, but your con“ science shall begin to grove vnder the guilt of blood
“ and perdition bee touched with too late Repen“ tance.

(7) His words were spoken with such a moving gravity, and unmoved resolution, that the foremost in the attempt gave back, and were ashamed of their audacious enterprise, but the rest furiously driving forward, one Trajan with a Leucon hurled into the Breast, whereupon Pertinax covering his Head with his robe, quietly yielded his body to the traitorous strokes of them all, and so died that poore, old, and innocent Emperour. The yeeres of his life, saith Iulius Capitolinus, were sixty, seven moneths, and twenty five daies: But Dio, Spartianus, and Herodian accounteth them to extend to sixty eight : Eusebius to above seventy : The like disagreement there is for the short time of his Government : for Eusebius saith that he reigned not fully six Moneths : Entreprius saith but three : Iulius Capitolinus and Aurelius Victor, eighty five daies : Dio, Herodian, and Spartianus, two Moneths and twenty eight daies : how long so ever, thus he lived, and thus bedied, the first Calends of April.

(8) He was of an honorable and Maiestical presence, strong of body, large and full breasted, long bearded, eagle-headed, smooth of Speech, and indifferently eloquent.

CHAPTER XXII.

An. Do. 194.

HE state of mao continually attended with vncertaine chance, apparently doth shew, the weak condition that nature enuioeth, and with what unforeseen the seat of maicly is posselt, as is scene by the precedent Emperour, who sitting at peace in his Palace at Rome, renowned, beloved, and guarded with the strengths of Europe, Asia, Africa, Aegypt and Greece, was notwithstanding surpris'd and slaine at noone day, by a Band of Souldiers, not much exceeding the number of three hundred, and all escaping unpunished, the deed was so suddaine and mens minds so distracted, that it could not be fully beleueed, though witnessed by sight.

(2) The Senators mistrusting each others, abandoned the Citie, and the Citizens in secret secured them-themselves, all in an uprore, but none for revenge of the treason: The murderers in as great feare as any, fortified their Campe, and with weapons in hand stood vpon their guard: But seeing all in a masse, and nothing against them attempted, as further boldnesse (the like before never heard of) ensued: for by a Common Crier they made Proclamation for the sale of the Empire, to any man that would give them most: which offer was readily accepted by Didius Iulianus (a man of much more wealth then honesty of life, and a Lawyer, saith Eusebius) who with larger promises then euer were performed, obtained the Emperiall Diadem.

(11) His birth was in Milue, the sonne of Petrinus in Didius Severus, his mother Clara Emilia, and himselfe brought vp in seruice vnder Domitia Lucilla the mother of Marcus Aurelius by whose fauour, he was first made Questor, next Edile, & then Prætor in Rome. In Germany as a Capitaine hee serued vnder Aurelius, then was he appointed Gouernour of Dalmatia, Æthiopia, and of the Lower Germany, and was Consul with Pertinax, and afterwards Proconsul in Africa. There were his risings and meanes to that Maistie, which noe long he kept: for hated in Rome and not approoued abroad, Syria chose for Emperor their owne General, Pescennius Niger, Germanie, Septimius Severus. By whole consents Clodius Albinus leader of the Brittain Army was first elected Cæsar, and then his fellow in the Empire, whereby the Angles, the fairest of Birds became monstrous, and in one Day bore three Heads.

(4) For Albinus at that time having gotten againe the gouernment of Brittain, where erecting his owne Statues and stamping his picture in his Coinets, gaue great insipition that he intended to be a Competitor, and with his Army a foot meant to haue gain'd the Emperiall seat it selfe, by advantage of Septimius forces, abience in supporting of Pescennius which to dider inforced Seuerus vntill better opportunity, to declare Albinus his companion, for he much more feared him then either of the former: Because Didius in Rome, and Pescennius in Antioch consumed their times in banquetting, and vnmartiall disputes, while Albinus managed his office most soldierlike, and was highly esteemed and honored of them.

(5) Seuerus halting towards Rome, was met in Italy by Ambassadors from Didius, with faire offers of peace, and possession of halfe the Empire: but refusing composition and making still forward, the Senate that solately declared him a traitor, now proclaimed him an Emperor. And the Souldiers vnstified of the coovenanted promises, and in hope to purchase fauour with Seuerus, slew their Chapman Didius in his Palace the Calends of Ides, being but five daies after he had done himselfe as much for Pertinax, when he had reigned, as Eusebius saith, seven months: Septimius first but two, and Didius sixt fix daies: the yeere of his age fifty seven, and of our Souldiers appearing in our fields, one hundred ninety and foure.

CHAPTER. XXIII.

Sepr. Seuerus.

Clodius Albinus.

An. Do. 194.

Seuerus hauing by this bloody accident of the giddie multitude gained with more facility then he expected, the fatal seat of gouernment, it was his next in place to suppress Pescennius by force, and Albinus by fallhood: whose Actions & liues since they hapned with this Emperor, and ended with his sword, I will record together, beginning with Caius Pescennius first, since first he fell vnder the fortune of this man.

This wilde man in the yeere of Christ one hundred ninety foure, was elected Emperor by Acclamation of the Syrian Armie, of which (though begun but by a handfull in respect of all the other Emperiall forces) he had good hope, since to the honor of that Gode, he dedicated the first marke of his Soueraintie, the minting of his monny.

A person he was of seemly stature, lonely feature and faire skinned, except his Neck, which differing so farre from the rest gaue him the surname of Niger; his complexion was ruddy, his Body fat, his voice fo piercing, that it would be heard a mile off: and his haire for more ornament long heere were interlarded curled vpon his shoulders. A commendable souldier and well bearing himselfe in the military offices hee vnderwent. In his Lieutenancy abroad he was seuerer, and at home he so well acted his part when hee was Consul, as in his Clemency and Iustice hee seemed emulous of Pertinax. Thus all his life he enioied the goodnesse of his merit and fortune, and had not his ambition begun, where his yeeres were ending, had so parted: For no sooner had hee put on the Robe Emperiall, but Seuerus defeated his Armie at Criacum, put him to Antioch, and tooke him at Euphrates, sending to Bisantium his head a Trophie of the Conquest, and to his wife, children, and followers (vnto whom at first this Victor granted banishment) in the end denied life.

(1) Now as soone as Seuerus made his approach neer Rome, he gaue command that the Prætorian Cohorts should attend him disarmed, which done, he vehemently checkt them for their prodigious treachery against Pertinax, and pronouncing sentence, depriued them both of name, honor, and armes of Souldiers, and banished them from Rome, and the circle therof for one hundred miles distance: which act of his wonne him such reputation, that in Rome the whole Story of Perennis his ruine, and Seuerus his aspiring to his Throne, was at large portrayed in an excellent peece of worke, of solide molten brasse, as Heraclian telleth, though he ascribeth the occasion of it, to a dreame of Seuerus.

(2) Thole twochiefs Didius and Niger, who gaue some hindrance to Seuerus his beginning, being thus defeated of their high hopes; the third, which was Albinus, seemed now a more dangerous cloud, which would altogether over-cast his brightnesse & glory, if it were not dispersed or blown back in time: and therefore to make faire weather with him, hee creuted him Cesar and his Sweetest in the Empire, but afterwards his good fortunes that swelling in the East, and himselfe still courted by Ambassadors from all parts, with their tender of subsistence, he began to grow proud, and to disdain any Copartner in State: and thereupon first secretly sought the destruction of his Cesar, which failing, he then proclaimed him Traitor and Enemy to Rome.

(3) Gladius Albinus brought into these vnexpected dangers, prepared his strengths, and with the choice of all Britaine entered France, and neere vnto Lions tooke the field against the Emperour; but with no better successe, then Perseus had done in Asia the lesse, in the same place (as Heraclian, Entropius and Spartianus affirme) where Darius was first overthrowne by Alexander. The Armes joining, a bloody Battle was fought, which through the great prowesse of the Britains went at first so sore against Seuerus, that being beaten off his Horse, despairing of Victorie, and almost of Life, cast off his Imperiall Robe, and flying, ignobly hid himselfe. Latius one of Seuerus his Captaines, kept aloofe all this while, of purpose as was thought, to bring the Emperour to ruine; and now upon report that hee was slaine, came on most furiously with his forces, in hope of winning both the day, and the Empire to himselfe: whereupon the Emperour drawne againe into the field, the day was his by the means, but not the meaning, of Latius: whom on attender of his Treason he afterward put to the sword. That day a great part of the flower of Britaine was slaine, together with their valiant Leader Albinus, a Captaine of exemplary Severity and Martiall discipline, a great admirer of Hannibal and Marius; for the Scipio's he thought them rather fortunate then valiant, and in the time of his seruice in this Island, there was no coile which hee commanded his souldiers, but himselfe would beare therein a part, even in carrying of hardens on his Backe; and yet so farre from vaunting of his valour, that when an Historian would haue recorded his noble Acts, he willed him to write of theirs who were already dead, whom hee woud not to flatter, holding it a foppery to write of those, of whose fauour or wrath the Indiers stood in hope or feare: Being such a one, no marvaile if Seuerus so feared him, as he did, which he shewed even after hee was slaine, by putting incredible numbers of great Personages both in the City and Prouinces to death, with this one Pretence, for all, that they wished well to Albinus.

After this overthrow Seuerus forthwith sent Heraclianus thither, to keepe the rest of the Britains in quiet, and to be Lieutenants in Albinus his roome, as Spartianus writ: Of whose affaires therein little remembrance is left, onely it seemeth by a Coine of Seuerus minted in his second Consallship, which fell in the yeere of our Saviour one hundred ninety eight, and about the period of this his last Competitor, that the Britains gaue not at first their seruice and seruitude to this man, vntill he had made the purchase of it by his sword; the brand of which he hath left to posteritie in figuring the Goddesse Victory seated vpon spoiles, and writing in a shield, Victoria Britan.

Vnto this Lieutenant Virtus Lupus succeeded President of Britaine, as Vipsian the Lawyer termes him, and was about the yeere of Christ one hundred ninety seven, as appeareth by this Inscription erected at Olma amongst the Brigantes, in memory of the reedifying of that place by this Emperour and his eldest Sonne, the first designed Cesar, by which the time is discovered, and in this stone inferred.

(4) This man strengthened the Prouince especially in the North, with many strong Castles, repairing many places ruined either by fire or fury of the bordering fowls: Of which Laetia, where the first Cohort of the Trajanians lay, was one, as appeareth by this Altar there erected to the Goddesse Fortune, and since removed to Conington the house of Sir Robert Cotton in Huntingdonshire.

He warded against the Maeles and North Britains with such bad successe, that he was forced to redeeme his peace with money, and was so much weakened by losse of his men, that he sent to Rome for present supply, with relation of his great danger, and the Enemies strength: which newes touched Seuerus to the quick; and notwithstanding his yeeres (sixty at the least) and gotte wherewith hee was continually grieved, yet would hee vndergoe that journey in person himselfe, as well to fauour his owne vaine glorious humours, as to traine his Sonne Basianus from his licentious life, wherein hee wallowed idly in Rome, who together with his brother Geta, accompanied their Father into Britaine.

(5) The Britains then hearing of the Emperours approach, sent him their Embassage for intreaty of peace

peace, whereby the Iland might have been settled and secured without blood, but the old man (saith Sabelicus) had so vniuatable a desire to beare the glorious Surname of Britannicus, that he preferred warre, and accepted not their proffered subiection.

(6) Scuerus thus entred, Geta was appointed to remaine in the South of the Prouince, and also gouerne those parts that stood in quiet, assisted by Amelius Papinianus the famous Lawyer, whole Tribunall seat was held in York himselfe and Rufinus marching farther into the North against the Maata and Caledonians their neighbours, both which bare themselves boldly vpon the aduantage of their Countries, their waters brackish, and vnsuifome drinke for their Enemies, the aire sharpe and contagious to their constitutions, and the soile it selfe so pelted with Loughs, Bogs, Meares, and Mountaines, that the Romans were forced to make way by continuall Labour, in cutting downe Woods, in building of Bridges, and in drying of Meares, so that by diffemperature of diet, continuall labour, contagionnesse of Aire, and afflictions by sicknesse, fifty thousand of them perished, and that without Battail, saith Dio: many Souldiers also, whole spirits were spent, and through feeblenesse could not keepe ranke in their March, were for meere pitty flaine by their fellows, lest they should fall into the hands of their Enemies.

(7) These miseries, notwithstanding old Scuerus endured and fought many Battailles, but (as Sabelicus confesseth) warre with more difficulties to the Romans then to the Britaines, and yet in some small skirmishes he went away Victor, and continued his courtes with such resolution, that lastly the Caledonians thought good to intreate their peace, which vpon these conditions was granted: first, that they should forthwith lay aside all hostile Armes, without any further resistance: next, that they should deliuer into the Romans Possession, those Countries that were next abutting on their Prouince: and lastly, that thenceforth they should liue in quiet, attempting nothing against the publicke Peace.

(8) The State thus settled, Scuerus bethought himselfe of some further means to secure the Prouince, by building many In-land strengths anew, and repairing those with Stone and Cement which formerly were but of Turfe and earth, as appeareth by this Inscription found in the Ruines of one of his workes nere vnto the River Wax, in the County of Richmond erected.

Septimius,

Aug. 10. 1.
B. A. 1. 1. 1.

And neglecting the uttermost and vast Northerne parts of this Iland, drew a Wall or Fortification, which might serue as a Rampire and diuision betwixt the In-land and more ciuill people, stretching it selfe thorow the whole Iland, euen from Sea to Sea; that is, from the Bay of Iton (otherwise Salisbury) in Seotland, to the doore of Tyne or Tinmouth, containing in length One hundred thirty and two Miles, as Severus Aurelius V. H. E. Eutropius, and others account them, and by some more. This Wall he built of Turfe and Timber brought in from Bainwicks and Turris, nere vnto (if not vpon) the foundation of Adrianus Wall, the tract whereof thorow the Countries of Weymerland and Northumberland, is more pleasing to bee seen, then calie in word to be expelled. For which his Acts thus heere are recorded about the yeere of grace two hundred and eleuen, he assumed to himselfe his much desired Surname Britannicus Maximus, causing in his owne and his sonnes Coines that inscription to bee stamped.

(9) And according to posterities glory of his first achievement heere, vpon the reuerse of those his monies, wheron he sometimes formed a Trophy erected vpon spoiles with two Captiues, vnderfetting the word VICT. BRIT. sometimes a winged victorie: graving a Shield, hung on that tree which is the meede of Conquerours, VICTORIAE BRITANNICAE: and sometimes in such a forme and phraisis expressed in the entrance of this his life. And now retired to Turris, he left his eldest Sonne to finish this worke of warre by him begun, as being rather allured then altogether ended.

(10) Rufinus thus set in the one part of the Iland, as Geta was in the other, sought rather to gaine the affections of his Army, by a loose libertie to doe what they list, then to manage the trust reposed on him, by the restraint of Martiall Discipline, and exactiō of Military duties: hoping by such his plausiblenesse and indulgence, to purchase to himselfe their best concurrence for the obtaining of the Empire, which hee so thirsted after, as that hee often tampered with them to raise him, by the fall of his father.

(11) The Caledonians vnderstanding the dilatorinesse of his Campe, and the want of a better Captaine, suddenly assailed the Romans, putting many to the sword, and taking great booties, (which they distributed amongst their neighbours) without any regard of the obligation of their former Covenants: whereat the triffling man was so much disquieted, and so farre enraged to reuenge, that hee gaue an expresse charge to make a generall Massacre, without exception of any; vnto in his speech to his Souldiers, these verses borrowed out of Homer:

Nemo manus fugiat vestras, caedemq; cruentam:
Nem fatus, grandis Mater quonq; gestat in alae, Horrendum effugiat cadem.

Let none escape your bloody rage; with terror let all die:
Spare not the mother, nor the child that in her womb doth lie.

(12) This (which seemeth to have bene the worke of Seuerus second yeere in Britannia, Anno two hundred and twelue for so it is expressed vpon the monies of himselfe and sonnes) may (and with a fit and calie inference from the same authoritie) seeme to haue bene heere the fortune and effect of two encounters and Conquests that same yeere: for whether we obserue the two severall comes of victorie then minted, on one of which is the Statue of that armed and winged Goddess, at whose feet are two Captiues prostrate bound; or the other bearing on it a double figure of that Lady, graving the sculpture of the former, VICT. BRIT. vpon a Shield, it can conclude no lesse in probability.

(13) Seuerus remaining in Turris, where the sixth Legion called Pactrix kept, (which place afterwards grew to be one of the chiefest for account among the Britaines, as commonly the Statius of the Romans Colonies were the freed-plots of all our Cities, and principally Tewkesbury grew feeble and sicke, being weakened with age, and wearied with trauell, his maladic more increasing by the disturbances of the Emire, and the daily dissolution of Basilius his Sonne, inſomuch that deſpairing of life, hee called his Counſell and Captaine before him, and vnderlaid with pillowes, he thus addreſſed his ſpeech.

(14) Egheteene yeeres almoſt haue I wielded the affaires of the Empire, and borne on my ſhoulders the burden of her encombred eſtate, both at home and abroad; at my firſt entrance, troubled euery where, now at length quiet, euen here in Britaine, the moſt vniquiet and moleſtious Province of all: The proſperity which trauels I muſt now leave for others to enjoy, and with eaſe in peace to keepe that which I with care and warre haue gotten. If therefore amity and mutuall concord, be embraced (the only ſhewes of a Commonwealth) the glory of the Empire ſhall yet ſhine more bright, ſuch by concord we ſee that ſmall things grow to greatneſſe, whereas contrariwiſe, diſcord is the ruine of all. I die and muſt leave the ſucceſſe of all to my Succelſſors and Sonnes by Nature, though the Elder vnuſually: I meane Basilius new made Antoninus and your Emperour, who often ere this hath fought to gaine that title by his ſword and my death; but knoweth not the dangers that attend a Duſdem, neither remembreth that high places are continually garded with Enuie and Feares. But ſo blind is Ambition, as it ſeeth not that a Soueraignes greatneſſe is ſuch vnto others, but leaſt in himſelfe, and that the things poſſeſſed are not the very things they ſeemed: It is not theſe Titles therefore can make man happy, the line of his life being drawne forth with ſo many vncertainties, and the bright of his power laid vpon ſo weake foundations. My ſelfe at this inſtant may ſerue for example, of whom this may be ſaid, I was all things, yet nothing, ſeeing I muſt pay my debt to Nature, and leaue my exploits in East and Weſt to be requited (either at your diſpoſall) for matters of moment, and good of the Empire, or blotted to the reproch of my gouernement, with the ſhadowing pencile of Obluſion. That therefore my care for the welfare of this Seate may ſuruiue my ſelfe, and bring forth the happie fruits thereof when I am withered, this ſhall be my laſt and onely requeſt, that you will euer aſſiſt my ſonnes both with your counſell and aide, whereby they may rule according to Lawe, and you obey according to Right, that lo in you both, the good of the Empire be aboue all things reſpected. With which words hee ended both his ſpeech and his life.

(15) This Emperour by Hiſtorians is ranked with the beſt, both for his warres, wherein hee was verie fortunate, and for his wiſedome in gouerning the Empire; and yet hee taxed very ſharply both by Sabellian for ſundry vices, and by Eufebius for ſtirring vp the fiſt Perſecution of the Chriſtians in the tenth yeere of his Reigne. In which troubles the learned writer of among many others, ſuſſied Martyrdome: howbeit, towards his end, hee became more milde to them, as ſaith Saint Ierome: as alſo that hee was a diligent reader of the excellent works of Tertullian, whom vſually hee termed his Maſter.

(17) Of ſtature hee was tall, and of a comely perſonage, his countenance ſeuere and repreſenting Maieſty, his beard white and long, and the haire of his head hee wore vſually curled. Hee was very leaſured in the Mathematicks, a good Philoſopher, an eloquent Orator, and of a deep ſounding voice. Hee reigned egheteene yeeres (ſaith Eufebius) by Dion Caſſius, Herodian, and Eutropius, ſeuenteen yeeres, eight months, and odder daies. Hee died in Turke, the fourth day of April, in the yeere of Chriſt two hundred and twelue, not ſo much of ſickneſſe, as of diſcontent and greefe, or (if our Eniſhy writers may be credited) of a deadly wound giuen by Fulgur, Captaine of the Polls, who as the Monke of Cheſter ſaith, was brother to Martin, the firſt wife of Seuerus and mother of Laffianus. His ſecond wife was Julia Domna the mother of Geta, (though ſome thinke that ſhe was mother to both) a woman of a ſurpaſſing beauty, and an earneſt inſtigatour of the two Bretherens reconciliation, had thee not beene blemiſhed with other vices, as after we ſhall here.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Basilius Caracalla.

Septimus
Geta.

An. Do. 212.

Basilius Caracalla, and his Brother Septimus Geta, together were declared Emperours by old Severus in his life time, and both of them by their father surname Antoninus, a name very gracious in the esteem of the Romans, the elder so fluted about the yeere of Salvation two hundred and five, and the younger four yeeres after, (as it appeareth by the mintage of their monies,) were approued and applauded by people and Senate, and of all men saluted and acknowledged for Emperours. Basilius the Elder, stilling himselfe Brutannicus Maximus, as it should seem, was admitted his Fathers fellow Emperour at York at his residing there, so quiet the Northern Britains; wherein also hee gave him the name Antoninus, for so importeth that famous Law, bearing kinthle the names of Severus and Antoninus, enacted by them at York, touching the interest and right that masters haue to the goods and possessions of their seruants. His mother, the first wife of Severus, was Marcia a Brioth Lady (say our British Historians, though Sabellius doth indge her to be an African) and himselfe better beloued of the Britains for her sake, then for his owne.

Geta was the sonne of the Emperesse Julia, a second wife, a woman of passing beauty and surpassing lust, who being perswaded (by some Oracle or dream) that her husbands successour should be an Antoninus, lest her Sonne should lose his hope of the Empire, he importuned Severus to bestow the name of Antoninus also on Geta; who with it gave him likewise the title of Caesar, about the yeere two hundred and two.

And to vnite the affections of his two sons, aswell as to eternise their memories, he minted their features vpon one Medall, inscribing the one side ANTONINVS PIVS AVG. PON. TR. P. IIII. the other, P. SEPT. GETA. CAES. PONT. hauing the yeere before matched the together vpon the reuerse of his owne money, and incirculing their heads with this word, AETERNITAS IMPERI. as if the separation of their affections were the dissolution of his and the worlds Empire.

(2) Vpon Severus his death, Antoninus Caracalla, halting for Rome, profered good conditions of peace to the Britains, who long tired with warres accepted thereof, and hostages were given for constituting the same. Whereupon the Emperesse Julia accompanied with both the Caesars, departed hence, carrying with them the funerall ashes of the deceased Emperour in a golde Urne to Rome, where they solemnly consecrated him a God: the ceremony wherof (because it concerneth so great an Emperour and Monarch of this kingdome) is not vnworthy the inserting.

In the Porch of his Palace was a bedstead all of Iuorie, dressed with richest bedding and furniture of gold, wherein was laid his image portrayed to the life, but yet in manner of a sicke man. On the left side sat all the Senators and Princes in blacke mourning weeds; on the right, all the great Ladies, cladde in white (which then was the mourning colour of that Sexe.) The Physicians diligently coming to visite him, and feeling his pulse, as if he were alieue, doe signifie that his disease did still increase vpon him. This they all did seuen daies together: at last, as if then he were dead, all the prime of the Nobility carrie him in his Iuorie Bed to the Forum, where all the Patrician youth, & Noble Virgins, accompanied him with most dolefull Hymnes and ruefull ditties. Thence againe he was removed to Mars his field, where was erected a four-square frame of Timber, of a huge height and compasse, the stories still mounting to the toppe with sundry ascents, and richly branched with strange varieties of gold and purple ornaments, and images of great Art and price: On the second of which alcous, was placed the Emperours said Bed and Scaire, with infinite store of sweetest odours, brought thither from all parts of the Cities: which done, the young Nobles beautily mounted on Horsebacke, did round about in a kinde of dance or measure, and another sort likewise (who represented great Princes) in their Coaches, wherupon his successe in the Empire, first sitting fire to the frame, forthwith all the people did the like on all sides: and when the whole began to be on flame, an Eagle secretly enclosed within, was let fly out of the toppe, which soaring a great height, and out of sight, the people followed it with shouts and prayers, supposing that therewith the Emperours soule was carried vnto heauen. And thus Seuerus, which was before a man of Gods making, was now become a God of mans making: and the more to preserve the memory of his fathers glory, Caracalla erected a magnificent Edifice, which he intitled Seuerus his Porch, wherein with most exquisite Art, and admired workmanship, were portrayed all his Fathers warres and triumphs, achieued here in Britaine or else where.

(3) But presently after, these two vngodly founes of this new supposed God, so much emulated each others glory, that the deadly sparkes of enuy, blowne a long time with the bellows of their amitious desires, brake out into the flames of murder and blood, being brethren by one Father, but not by the same mother (as it is said) & in this only like, that they were both like naughty, though both in conerane kinds of Pride. And albeit the Emperresse Julia had fought by all means to make peace betwixt them, both formerly here in Britaine, and now, after their returne to Rome: yet the desire of a sole Souerainty, had bene a long time so rooted in Julians his heart (for which he had twice attempted his Fathers life, and so much halted his death, that hee slew his Physician, because they had dispatched him no sooner) could not indure an equal (much lesse a confronter) in authority, and therefore in the Court and in the armes of the Emperresse, he slew her sonne Geta, in a time least suspected, when he had sate with him in state and disdaine, the terme of one yeare and twenty two daies.

(4) And to cloake this fratricide with shew of constraints, first to the Souldiers, and then in the Senate, he accuseth his Brother to haue sought his death, and that in defence of his owne life, he was forced to slay the other, and flying to the Prætorian Cohorts for the safetie of his life, as though further conspiracies had bene intended against him in the City, & at his returne commanded Papinianus the famous Civilian, to excuse the murder in his Placat at the Barre: which when he refused, hee caused him to be slain, as also all those, that had bene acquainted with Geta, whereby so many of the Nobilitie perished, that he was thereby accounted another Nero in Rome: and by his favourites the name of Geta was raced out of all monuments & imperiall inscriptions, as we haue seene some of the defaced vpon some Alear stones found here in Brit.

(5) Of nature he was subtle, and could well dissemble with them whom hee feared, and make shew of loue where hee deadly hated; alwaies fitting himselfe to the humours of flatteries: Among the Germans, counterfeiting their gaze and garments; In Greece, be like Alexander, bearing his necke somewhat awry; In Troy, would resemble Achilles, by waies to Ca-

milus-like, as the Romans (his followers) were therewith inflamed. In a word, Caracalla (saith Dio) neuer thought of doing good, because (as himselfe confessed) he neuer knew any goodnes.

(6) And to fill vp the measure of all iniquitie, his oneregardlesse of humanity or shame, he married Julia his mother in law, late wife to his owne Father (a sinne (saith S. Paul) not to be named among the Gentils) and by Scit. Aur. Entrep. and Spar reported vpon this occasion. It fortuned that Julia in presence of Caracalla, either by chance, or of purpose rather, let fall the vail which the worse, discountenuring her naked breasts and beauty, which was there; wherat the Emperour calling her lasciuious etc and bewraying his affection, presently said, Were it not lawfull, I should not be unwilling: to whom she replied (without respect of modesty) that all things were lawfull to him that made lawes for others, but was himselfe to none: forgetting at once both the murder committed vpon Geta her sonne, and the scandals that accompanied so foule a sinne, the pleasure wherof they did not long enioy, both their deaths (by God vengeance) soon after ensuing.

(7) For Caracalla remaining in Mesopotamia, and carrying (as it seemeth) a gaily confcience, and supposition of his life, sent to Materus, whom hee had left Governour of Rome, to assemble all the Astrologers & Mathematicians (vnto which learned impolites he alwaies gave especial credit) and of them to enquire how long he should liue, and by what death he should die. Materus hauing so done, wrote for answer, that Marcus his Prefect of the Prætorium (then with him in his expeditiō) went about to murder him. Which is thought rather in enuy of Materus to haue bene fained, then by any Astrological directions so giuen forth. This leuer and others coming to Caracalla his hand, at such time as hee was busied about his disport, he deliuered them to Marcianus to, read, and giue him the report at his returne. In perusal wherof finding himselfe to be accused of Treason, and fearing lest by the sequell hee might bee brought into greater danger, he incensed one Martial a Centurion (whose brother the Emperour had lately slaine) to murder him; which was soone performed, and occasion in the fields offered: for Caracalla stepping aside from his traine to ease nature, Martial, as though he had bene called, ran halhly in without hindrance or suspect, and with his dagger stabbed him to death; but being too late perceiued, was yet so halhly pursued, that he was hewed to peeces before his tongue could reueale the principall Traitor. Julia his incestuous wife hearing of his death, with poison slew her kinsie at Antioch, leaving her flame to pursue her life.

(8) Antonius Caracalla, saith Eusebius, reigned Emperour seven yeeres and sixe moneths, but Herodian, Spartianus, and Dio allow him fixe yeeres and two moneths: he died the eight of Aprill, and yeere of Christ two hundred eighteene. The testimonies of these many writers notwithstanding, together with the place and circumstances of his death, and the person by whom it was committed, the British Historians do contradict, reporting him to bee slain in Britaine in Batavia against the Picts, by one Caracurus a man of a lowe and obscure birth. But by this it may seeme some wounds received by him in those British warres, gave occasion to that error. He left a sonne not by his incestuous mother, nor by Glauilla his wife, who hee exiled into Sicily, but by a mistress, whose name was Iulia Seianura his cōlen German, and indeed no better then a common strumpet: which corrupt rootes brought forth as bitter fruits, euen Hellogabalus, of whom hereafter we shall haue occasion to write.

OPILIVS MACRINVS.

CHAPTER XXV.

Opilius Macrinus.

Diadamenus.

An. Do. 218.

N prosecuting our intended course, for setting downe the Acts and Lines of sundry Emperours, becafter succeeding, I know I shall hardly satisfie my Readers, being no way able to give content to my selfe, in that, on the one side, finding very few remembrances concerning the state of this our Island, till the reign of Diuscleian, the Historie of that Intervall may seeme impertinent to our purpose; and yet on the other side, considering how vaine it is, that the Succession of all our British Monarchs should be interrupted (that Royall Title being likewise annexed to those other Emperours) I suppose it will bee expected, that somewhat also be said of them, though managing their affaires in places farre remote. It seemeth that the continuall stirring for the Imperiall Diademe, and their neerer hazards at home, made them contented to give Brittain some peaceable breathing, and so deprive vs of the Romane Records of those times: which want if I should supply out of our home-bred British Writers, I might be thought, not so much to reparaire the ruines of our Monuments, as to heape more rubbish vpon them. And therefore (necessitie so enforcing) I must craue patience, if I proceed to the rest of our Countries Monarchs, though I cannot to the residue of our Countries Exploits and Affaires in those daies.

An. Do. 218.

(2) Opilius Macrinus from obscure and base parentage, by fauours of the Emperour, without any notable desert in himselfe, first aspired to the Office of a Prefect, and at last by the election of the Souldiers, to the Dignitie Imperiall. So farre from suspitious of Caracalla's death, by the outward appearance of a seeming sorrow, that hee was held of all most free from the Treason, and the second person worthy of their voice. For first, the Title was conferred vpon aged Audentius, a man of good fort, much experience, and an excellent Captaine; whose wisdom could not bee drawne to aduocate his life vnder the weight of so vnicaine and dangerous a Crowne, but exulting himselfe by the priuilege of his age, as farre vsuit to wield the troubles (much lesse to increase the glorie) of the Empire, refused their offers, but with returne of as many thanks as they had giuen him hands or voices. Whereupon they againe consulted and determined for Macrinus, which as willingly receined, as Audentius refused; vnto whom they swore fealtie, but not long after failed in performance.

(1) He made for his Cesar, Diadamenus his sonne, changing his name (a vsuall custome at their election) into Antoninus, because that name was gracious among the Romans. The Senate at home confirmed all that the Armie had done abroad; vnto whom it seemed their right, as it were by prescription, to haue the election of the Emperours.

Diadamenus appeared for Cesar. Called Antoninus.

(4) His first expedition was against Artabanus King of the Parthians, that hadst against the Romans, for wrongs receiued by Caracalla deceased: but after three great and dangerous Battles, came to an accomment, and a peace betwixt them concluded. After this, as free from further troubles, he returned to Antioch in Syria, and there spent his time in Banquets, and other sensuall pleasures, being drenched so farre therein, that the Armie began to dislike his Government, and to fauour young Rafianus the sonne of Caracalla, then present at Emesa a Citie in Phoenicia, with Mesa his Grandmother by his Mothers side, who there had built a Temple consecrated to the Sonne, and therein ordained him a Priest; for which cause he was called Heliogabalus, that is to say in the Phenician Language, The Priest of the Sonne.

Antoninus sonne of Caracalla.

Antoninus called Heliogabalus that is, a Priest of the Sonne.

(1) To this Temple in their vaine deuotions resorted many of the Romane Souldiers; and seeing the beautie of the youth, allured Mesa to bring him to their Campe: where knowne to be the sonne of Caracalla, the Souldiers proclaimed him Emperour, and maintained his right against Macrinus who after this revolt, met young Heliogabalus in the Countie betwixt Phoenicia and Syria, where was fought a bloody Battle, and Macrinus forsaken of all, and driuen to flee; who with his sonne halting thorow Alex and Bithonia, came lastly to Chalcedon, where he fell sicke, and was there, together with Diadamenus, put to death the seventh day of June, the yeere of Christis Incarnation two hundred and nineteene, when hee had reigned one yeere, one moneth, & twenty eight daies.

ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Antoninus
Helioabalus
Emp.

An. Do. 219.

Owing Bassianus, surnamed Helioabalus, the Sonne of Caracalla before mentioned, thus elected, and prospering at his entrance, gaue hopes to his railers, of many princely parts, and signes of thole things that in sequence by better prooffe appeared to be onlie signes indeed: for nature had plentifully adorned him with the complements of her gifts, had his mind bene answerably furnished with vertue. But as the one was ouer-prodigall and laith in his outward forme, so was the other as sparing and defectiue in bestowing of her inward gifts: insomuch that both in mind and garment, he seemed to bee that which in truth he was not. This Emperour, as appeareth by the reuerse of his money, took it no meane addition of honour to his Imperiall Dignitie, to be stiled, The Priest of the Sonne; which in the Assyrian Tongue is called El, from whom he tooke the surname Elagabal.

(2) As soon as hee had seited the Empire surne vpon himselfe by the death of Maximus, he began to discouer his owne dispositions, and in wantonnesse, apparill, lightnesse, and diet, to exceed any that had gone before him in Rome; and so farre distanced from the manners of men, that modestie will not suffer vs to record his greatest vices.

(3) His apparrell was rich, and most extreme costlie, and yet would he neuer weare one garment twice: his Shoes embellished with Pearles and Luxurys; his Seats throwed with Muske and Amber; his Bed covered with Gold and Purple, and beset with most costly Iewels; his Way strewed with the Powder of Gold and Silver; his Feeds (cuen of basell vñ) all Gold; his Lumps burning with no other Oile then the Balmes of India and Arabia; his Fish-Ponds filled with no other water then of distilled Rofes; his Shops (in his Newmachies or Shy-fights) floored in a River of Wine; his Bathes most stately built, and againe after they were once vñd, prettily plucked downe; his Plate of finest Gold, but neuer struck downe to his Table; his Rings and Iewels most rich, yet neuer worne twice; his Cowenches many and changeable, but not one laine with twice; his Diet so profuse, that at every supper in his Court, was usually spent a Thousand Pound Sterling: in entering the chiefe Citizens to a Feast, hee strewed all the Roames with Saffron, as it were with Bushes, saying, That such a stile were worthy of such costly Letter. Neere the Sea, with him no Fish was eaten: in the Land, no Fleete: whole Meales made of the Tongues of singing Birds and Peacocks, or of the Breines of most costly creatures, alwaies laying, That meat was not sauourie, whose flauer was not costly. And indeed so costly it was, that the reuenues of Germany, France, Britaine, Spain, Italy, Sicily, Gracia, Asia, Africa, Egypt, Arabia, and all the Islands, were not sufficient to defray the charges.

(4) In his Progresses, six hundred Chariots followed him, laden with Sirumpets, Eyes, and Raudes, for whom he built a Stewes in his Court, wherein himselfe in the attire of an Idolat, made to them solemnne and set Orations, terming them therein his Fellow-Souldiers, and Companions in Armes, with Institutions for them how to practise with most varietie their fishy Luxuries. In regard of which kinde of actions, one doth make thus doubt, whether were greater his boundlesse Prodigalitie, his spendious Lecherie, or his foppish Foolerie: the last of which his Imperiall Portraies, he gaue prooffe of, when he gathered in the City ten thousand weight of Spiders, professing that thereby he vnderstood how great a City Rome was: at another time, ten thousand Mice, and a thousand Wizels, which hee brought forth in a publike shew to the people, for some wise State-purposes, like the former.

(5) In Rome hee built a Temple consecrated to the Sonne, (like to that in Phoenicia, whereof himselfe was Priest) commanding the Christians therein to worship: as also a Chatter-house for women to meet and determine of their Attires; and brought into the Senate house his mother Sensuaria, allowing her a Voise among the Senators. In modestie I forbore to write the particulars of his vnmanly libidinous sithnesse, adding only that which a iudicious Author speaks of him: Kings (saith he) as they haue greater power to sinne then other men, so haue they lesse safety in sinning then any man; for being let above others in the eye of the World, they are as Markes that are aimed at, and lie open to the State of Reuenge. And so was the state of this Superlative Manner, whose owne Conscience still stung him, even in the midst of his sweetest sinnes, and therefore euer expecting some violent end, hee prepared alters Halters richly wrought to hang himselfe, if need were; and Golden Knives to stab himselfe, or cut his throat; and built a goodly Tower of exceeding height, adorned with Gemmes and Gold of inualluable cost, that thence he might call himselfe headlong, hauing these words oft in his mouth, That haueuer hee died, his death should be precious in the eyes of all men. But he failed of his hope, though not of his desire; for against him the Pratorian Souldiers suddenly arose, a wrong offered them, more then a vnto others, but out of a Justice in God, who repaeth sinne with sinne, and suffreth not such outrageous wicked ones to escape vengued.

great stones, left the carcases call vp with the waies, should either find buriall, or infect the aire. The Senate approving all that was done, decreed that his name should be obliterated out of all monuments in Rome, and neuer any Antoninus (a name before very glorious) should rule againe their Empire: so odious was the remembrance of this Image of Ignominy.

(7) He was aged but foureteene yeeres when hee became Emperor, by Herodians computation, he reigned fixe yeeres, and died at twenty: By Aurelius Victor he died at fouenteene, & reigned not fully three yeeres: Eusebius saith, that he reigned fully foure: Orosius would haue him to liue eighteen yeeres, & to dy the 3 day of March, Anno two hundred twenty three.

ALEXANDER SEVERVS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Alexander
Seuerus Emp.

An. Do. 223.

Efore the death of Helio- gabalus, his Cousin German Alexander, by the working of his mother Atamma, was made his Caesar, whose vertues daily increasing, with his age, gave hopes to the better sort of some happier times by his meanes: but so farre exceeded Helio gabalus (who had nothing more then vertue), and so dimmed his fame, that he often assayed to take away his life by treachery: But suruiving him, whom no man wished to liue, he was with publick hieffings, and vnspcakable joy elected Emperor, & his name they changed from Alexianus to Alexander, and his surname giuen of old Seuerus.

Emperours said, he was borne on the day that Alexander the great died, and had therefore his name.

* Lampadius the small relation of this Emperours life, but Strabo on Epiphanius (scilicet) hath, he was borne all about his Palace, and sometimes commanded by voice of a publick Crier. Lampadius, Subletus.

(2) He was the Sonne of one Parus, a Syrian borne, and of Atamma, sister to Summama, though there are who say that both the sisters attending on their Aunt Julia the Emperress, were gotten with child by young Caracalla, and so he father of Alexianus: howeuer, he was brought vp in learning from his childhood, hauing a naturall propension to all humane vertues, and diuine pieties: He was very skilfull in the Mathematicks, Geometrie, Astricks, Cosmick, and Painting, & composed some Bookes also of Poetrie, so great a lover of the liberal Arts, that he allowed the professors thereof annuall stipends for their further encouragement: and that which most is, hee much favoured the Christians, from whom he tooke to himselfe examples of life, and vrged their Precepts vnto others, and this one especially. NOT TO DO TO OTHERS WHAT WEE WOULD NOT HAVE DONE TO VS. Their Christ he honoured (though as a Heathen man) and would haue had him consecrated among the Roman Gods: vnto whom he also was minded to haue built a Temple, had not his Idol-Priests hindered the same, but a place of their holy assemblies he allowed them by his Imperiall warrant: for when certaine Pantonnors or Pillwallers laid claime to the place whereunto the Christians resorted to pray, he thus decided it, That it was much fitter that God therein should be worshipped, then heely gods should be pampred to forget there. (A good document of a Heathen for some Christians, who turne places consecrate to Gods diuine seruice into Sheep-Coats, orto the like prophane vices) This good inclination of Alexander the sonne, was vndoubtedly stirred vp by the insligations of Mamma his mother, who, as Eusebius witnesseth, had sent for Origen (the Christian Doctour) from Alexandria to Antioch: by whom the was so wel instructed, that Seuerus giues her the honourable Title of a most holy Woman.

Alexander was reuerenced on Christianity by his mother Mamma which hee is called by the Christians.

Subletus.

(3) Himselfe, though young, ruled the Empire with great Wisdomme and Iustice: admitting onely such for his Counsellors, as were men vncorrupt, sage and learned, skilfull in the Ciuill Law, and experienced in Antiquities of elder times, and preferring none to any office or charge by fauour, but onely by the commendation of each mans worth and fitness for the place: In regard whereof, he called Turcius (one of his Courtiers who tooke money of diuers, with promise to procure the Emperours fauour in their suits) to be put to death by smother, the Crier proclaiming, That hee had sold fauours, and therefore with fauours he should die. And likewise to cut off, in Lawyers their continuall selling of Iustices (the bane of all Common wealths) for a fee, hee granted a publick & sereward to such as should plead gratis. By which courtes, his ciuill affaires were nobly managed, and his warres likewise proued as prosperous: for hee triumphed with great glory ouer the Parthians: The Germanes also, who in furious manner had passed the Riuer Danubius, and the Rhine, in many skirmishes he put backe, and forced them to their former obedience.

Bountifull and liberal he was both to the people & Soldiers, as by the reuerse of his Coines before prefixed is seene, wherein is expressed the fourth Donationis and Constitutionis, bestowed by the bounty of this Emperour vpon the Souldiers and common people, of which Lampridius maketh mention in his life.

(4) But as Emper ever attends persons of Estate, and a desire of change, breeds a dislike of the present, so the Roman Legions growne farr out of order by the prodigious Government of the last Emperour, protested now vnanimall to their dread Soueraigne: in wile warres drawing him into Germanie, and thence hither into Britaine, hee found some of his Souldiers here so tumultuous, that he thought fit to vse exemplary severity towards them, whereupon they, being secretly backt, (as is suppos'd) by Maximinus (a potent man in the Armie, raised only by the Emperours favour) they traitorously assailed him, and together with his mother Mamma; murdered him in a village then called Sicila, though others say he was slain in Germany, in the Citie Mogunze, and some in France, no other cause moving them, but only his vertue, the eighth day of March, when he had reigned (by Lamprianus) thirteene yeeres and nine daies, aged by Herodian, and Talies Capitulinus, twenty nine yeeres, three moneths and seven daies, the yeere of our Sauiour, two hundred thirtie sixe.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

CAIVS. IVLIVS. VERVS. MAXI. CAES.

Maximinus

Maximus
Caesar.

Maximinus, a man barbarous by birth, and disposition, (himself a Thracian, his father named Nicea, borne in Gallia, very obscure, his mother Abula of little better race) spent his youth in keep of Cattel, the poverty of his parents admitting no better maintenance: yet afterwards his fortunes brought him vnto great advancement, and that by working vpon the outward object of his person, being for shape and strength (if the reporter deserve credit) rather to be thought a vast Giant, then described for a goodly man: For Talies Capitulinus affirms his height to be eight foot: and an halfe by Geometrical measure, and his Body answerable in euer proportion, inasmuch, as he did weare as a Ring on his thumb, the Bracelet which his wife vs'd to weare on her arme, a stature thought incredible; and yet Iosephus, an Author of great credit, doth confidently record, that one Eleazar a Jewe accompanied Darius the Kings sonne of Perseus vnto Rome, (sent by Pitellus to Tiberius for an hostage) whose height, as he saith, was fully seven cubits, a measure far exceeding this.

(3) The ignoble Vipers thus borne from the droughill, vpon the wings of Fortune, vnto the seat of Maicste, thought the increase of his pride was an increase of State; and knowing hee had nothing for which he might deserve to be loved, he studied in the whole managing of his citize, how by all means hee might be feared. Hee therefore displaced Senators, Captaines, Souldiers, and whom not with murders, banishments, and confiscations of their goods: all such especially he did cut off, whom hee supposed to haue knowledge of his base beginnings. The Christians likewise vnder him were martyred, (whereof Origens wrote a Booke, not now extant) and he is by Writers accounted the sixth Persecutor of Gods Saines: so that, whereas his flatterers at first called him Mile, Antaw, and Heracles, for his strength; now they all teamed him, Buifer, Phalaris, and Cyclops, for his savage cruelty.

(4) But his life being odious to God and Man, was often attempted to be taken away; first, by Maximus, a man of Consular dignitie; then by Quintinus (whom Capitolinus calleth Titus) set on by the old Souldiers of Septimus Severus, that had bene disgraced by Maximinus; and lastly by the Army in Africa, who elected Gordianus (their Proconsul, a very worthy and learned man of fourescore yeeres old) Emperour, and his sonne (of the same name and Princely qualities) his Caesar: the Senate likewise confirming all that they had done. He tooke to himselfe the surname Africanus either in respect of his Proconsulship which hee exercised in that Province, or else as descended from Scipio his family who bore that surname: His sonne Gordianus likewise was stiled Augustus, as appeareth by his Coines, whereon hee writeth himselfe A V G. and vpon the Reuerse, Liberalis A V G. two Emperours sitting.

(6) In the meane while, aged Gordianus with the Enigmes and glory of an Emperour, entred Carthage, with blessings and acclamations of ioy: wherat his old enemy Capellanus, Governour of Numidia and Mauritania (Provinces in Africa) much enuied, and gathering forces in Maximianus his name, made head against him, and shortly gave him Battle, wherein Gordianus the younger was slaine before the walles of the Citie. The father seeing his Casars disaistre, and himselfe an Emperour onely nominall, and his new risen Sonne to have passed the circle of his height, and now to approach to the setting and fall, wished againe his private estate; and in despair, griefe, and disdain of his enemies successe, with the Gravie which he wore, strangled himselfe to death, when hee had bene titled Emperour only twenty six daies: wherat Maximianus was not a little ioyfull, and the Senate no lesse perplexed, seeing themselves deprived of their hopes, and now laid open to the Triants will, who like a Lion came raging on, the earning newe age in all their bloods.

(7) Hee was, as is said, exceedingly tall, his body great, and ioints proportionable, faire of face, full eyes, and of such strength as is vncredible: and according to his limmes, so was his diet; for hee daily deuoured forty pound weight of flesh, and thiereto dranke six Gallons of wine. Hee died aged sixty yeeres and odder, when hee had reigned three yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirty and eight.

An. Do. 238.

Papienus Maximus and Clodius Balbinus thus elected together for Emperours, the one in action, and the other resident, a great sedition chanced betwixt the Senate and Souldiers, which grew to a bloodie issue among the Citizens, and Rome it selfe was set on fire in sundrie places; the Emperours presence and au-thoritie little preuailling: which strucke such feare into their hearts, that they accounted these times most vnfortunate, and themselves present estate to be most desperate. But the death of Maximianus (and his head happily brought them at the instant) gave present life to their dying hearts. And Papienus comming to Aquileia as much quieted the Armie, sent backe the Legionaries to their places of charge, and with great pompe and praise returned to his Fellow-Emperour.

(2) The parentage of Balbinus is reported to bee both both noble and ancient, made Citizens of Rome by great Pompey, and himselfe borne at Cales in Spain. Papianus Ancestors were much later, yet had hee borne many Offices of Magistracie, and euer discharged them with wisdom and valour: both of them highly accounted of in Rome.

(3) Peace thus established beyond all expectation, with shoutes and applauses the Emperours enter the Senate-house, where (according to the custome and their desires) they were killed, The Fathers of the Senat, with thanks as to the onely preservers of their liues and estates: and some extolling the Senate highly for their provident foresight, in electing such sapient and worthy Emperours, contrarie to the rash and indiscreet practice of such as chose their Governours to fit their owne fancies, rather then the charge to which they aduance them; and whose bad liues brought commonly their vintime, but deferred death. The Pretorian Souldiers tooke themselves to bee taxed with those aspersions, and the rather, because the German Strangers were brought in to be of the Guard, as if themselves were not to bee trusted: so turning their spleene against the present Emperours, sought to set up a new, which shortly after they found opportunitie to effect.

(4) For these Emperours, though aged and wife, were not so linked together in affection, as they were neere joined in authoritie: and therefore the wind of emulation had the easier passage betwixt the chinkes of their owne conceits; the one prizing his wisdom and government to be more iudicious; the other, his birth and Nobilitie to be more honorable: and each of them having his owne Guard, stood vpon his owne Guard, though one Palace contained them both: and both their endeavours euer well consofing for the businesse of the Empire.

(5) At this time the Provinces of Parthia and Germanie grew vniquiet, and by eail discords, endangered their subiections: to repress which, the Emperours agreed to goe in person, the one into the East, the other into Germanie. Now whilst these great preparations were in making, the Capitoline Games were celebrated in Rome, wherunto all (almost) resorted, but especially the new-come Guards of the Emperours. The Pretorians finding the aduantageous time, which they had long waited for, suddenly in armour assailed the Court; which Papianus perceiving, sent in all haste for Balbinus, and both their Guards for defense. But his Fellow-Emperour, vpon a vaine suspicion detracted time him selfe, and hindered the forwardnesse of the Guards, so that these Traitors had easie access into both the Emperours Chambers, where in their rage they dispoiled them of their Imperiall Robes, and haled thie poore aged and innocent Emperours, like two Theeues throw the middelt of the Kie: Lastly, they slew them, and left their bodies to despittefull ignominie.

(6) These Emperours reigned together one yeere, and somewhat more, and died the yeere of Christ two hundred thirty nine: in which yeere happened so great an Eclipse of the San, that the noon-day thereby became as darke as the mid-night.

M. ANTONINVS GORDIANVS.

CHAPTER XXX.

Gordianus (for Antoninus he might not be recalled, a law formerly acted inhibiting the same) was the sonne of a daughter to old Gordianus (that had made away himselfe in Carthage, as is declared) at the age of eleuen yeeres was created Cesar by the Senate, with Papianus and Balbinus; and at their deaths by the Pretorian Souldiers, elected Emperour, not yet fully fourteen yeeres of age. Greatly was he strengthened by the Alliance and Counsell of one Mithridates, his Prefect and Instructor, whom for his great learning he so honored and loved, that he tooke his daughter for his wife; and by whose onely direction, he profitously administered his State affaires.

(2) Touching the affaires of our Provinces proceedings, or what Lieutenants were imploied in Britaine since Virius Lupus there placed by Suetonius (since whose death our Storie hath spent twenty seven yeeres) we finde not recorded. Yet now in the reign of young Gordianus, some glimmering light for her Governour appeareth by an Altar-Stone found in Cumberland at a place then called * Castra Exploratorum, with an inscription for the happy health of the Emperour Gordian the third, his wife Furia Sabina Tranquilla, and their whole Familie: which vntime Altar was erected by the Troupe of Horfemen surnamed Auguste Gordians, when Aemilius Christianus a native of Africa governed the same vnder Numerius Philippus Lieutenant Generall of Britaine, in the yeere of Christ, two hundred forty three, as appeareth by the Consuls therein specified: whose forme and inscription wee haue followed by the Stone it selfe, now remaining at Conington among many others, in the custodie of Sir Robert Calton Knight.

* On Cuckoo.

In his first yeere, the Parthians vnder the Leading of Sapor their King, had passed into the confines of the Romane Prouinces, as late as Antioch in Syria, which Cirie they had taken, with spoile of the Countries adjoining: against whom, the yong Emperour in warlike maner addrested himselfe, and in person prepared to vndergoe the warres.

(1) In Ionus the Temple of Ianus that long had stood shut, he caused to be opened, a sure token that warres were in hand: and departing the City, passed the straits of Hellepont, and rooke his way thorow Asya, to lay the Gathes that were come downe to inhabit Thracia. Thence marching to Antioch, recovered the Cune, forcing Sapor to forsake the Prouince, and to content himselfe with his owne demaines.

(4) But long this Summe went not without a Cloud, nor his fawourable fortunes without a checke, for Mistheus, his Nephew, paying Natures debt before it was due (being poisoned by Philip, as Eutropius affirmeth) was wanting in counsell, & misst for trust: to supply which, Philip (an Arabian, and of ignoble parentage) was made his Prefect; wife (I must needs say) had hee beene moderate; and valiant in Armes, had hee bene true. But the glory of a Diademe beheld with the full light of ambition, so dimmed the eye of his dutifull affection, and blinded the senses of his aspiring mind, that he, who from nothing was risen to be something, thought that also nothing worth, whilst it was shadowed with the name of a subiect. First therefore he sought to winne credit with the Souldiers, to whom he was facible; to regard the poore, to whom hee was liberall, and in all things to outstrippe his Soueraigne, to whom he was treacherous. Yong Gordianus vnable to endure his Prefectors deliquies, or his owne dilgraces, and perceiving the marke wherewith hee aimed, complained his wrongs in open assembly, and to the Souldiers after this tenor.

"(1) I got not this state from my Parents by birth, nor yet by any deserts (I must confesse) in my selfe, being the least of many that did deserue it better: but it was you, my fellow Souldiers (vpon what sure I know not) that haue made me what I am. If then I haue defrauded your hopes, by carrying my selfe vnder your expectations, I wish to bee set in the place where I first was; or rather (if I so deserue) my life, and state, may at one instant be ended by your vncerring hands: For Noble minde cannot brooke to be curbed with the bite of base indignities, nor suffer their vassals to bee Corrupts of their Maieitie. It is a ialous object (I must needs confesse) and many times calls great suspicion where is small occasion, but I, for my part, haue alwaies thought of that humour, that men causlessly ialous, doe most iustly deserue what they vniustly feare; and both your selues will bee my witnesses, how faire I am from the touch of that itaine, and also the daile occurrences of my Casus, (if so low I may terme him) doth make more then manifest. I am but yong, yet elder by sixe yeares then I was, my body tender, yet exposted to the chaunce of warre; my counsell raw, yet bettered by your wisdomes; and my conquests in my selfe nothing, but yet in your valours both glorious & famous. What then are mine errors, that I may amend them? or your discontentes that I may redresse? for by the powers of heauen I protest, it is your loues which I most esteeme, and the good of the Empire, for which I onely wish to liue; the first is in your power to bestow at your pleasure, but the other in me (if it be possible) shall liue euen after death.

(6) These complaints notwithstanding, Philip so politickly nay, rather traitorously brought his owne projects to passe, as that the yong innocent Emperour was displaced, and abandoned of all: in which distresse he first sued to be made his Caesar, and that denied, to be his Prætorian Prefect: but neither would bee had, yet at length the charge of an ordinary Capitane, was with some difficulty granted him. But Philip bethinking himselfe of the greatness of Gordianus his blood, his loue and esteeme both in Rome and the Provinces, and his owne vertues equalising any, hee commanded him to be slaine in the twenty two yeere of his age, and the sixt of his raigne. The Senate hearing thereof, elected M. Marcus, and after him again, L. Aurel. Severus, Ostilianus. But Philip through the giddie multitude, prevailed against both. This Emperour though yong, so well demeaned himselfe, that the Senate by authoritie added to his titles T V T O R R E I P V E L I C A E, and P A R E N S P R I N C I P V M P O P V L I R O M A N I, and after his death even by his owne murderers, his Monument of faire Stone was raised in the confines of Persia, and vpon his sepulchre this inscription set Gordianus Salus.

(7) He was of condition most noble and lonely, of behaviour gentle, very studious and given much to learning; having in his Librarie no lesse then three-score and two thousand Bookes, as is reported. The truth is, that wicked people were not worthy long to enioy so vertuous, so clement, so pcerles an Emperour. He died in the moneth of March, in the yeere of our Redeemer two hundred forty five.

Hat man is there, who considering those forfeited murders, of so many, and so mightie Monarchs, would not, by the spectacle of others calamities, be induced to preferre the securitie of a moderate estate, before the desire of Soveraignty; whose glorious content is onely in appearance, but the cares and hazards are both real and perpetual. But of so attractive vertue is the Lead-stone of Maiesty, through the imagined felicity thereof, that most mens desires are drawne to that one point of the Compass, and if a little faire winde of fortune shall blow on them; they will launch forth with their full sailes into that Mer incognitum, a Sea of unknown calamities. And amongst others, such were the blinde desires, and such the unhappy event of this Julius Philippus the Arabick Barbarous. Of parentage obscure and ignoble, as Vulgar and others affirme, who pluckt off the imperiall robes of his Liege-Lord, to insuit himselfe.

(2) Being now accepted as Emperour by the Souldiers in Parthia, he wrote to the Senate of the death of Gordianus, as though it naturally had happened, and with faire pretensions of his good purposes, but more through the feare of his Parthian Souldiers, obtained their consents; whereupon flourishing vp a most dishonourable peace in those parts, and declaring his Joane Philip for his Caesar, (whose Coines with his, we have set in the beginning of this Chap.) hee made all speede towards Rome: where, the yeere ensuing, his shewes and games were exceedingly magnificent, for the Celebration of the Birth-day (as we may terme it) of Rome, that being, the thousand yeere from her foundation.
(3) It pleased God at length to touch this Emperours heart, both with such a lenie of his owne forpast sinnes, and also with the light of heavenly truth, that he hath the honour of being the first Emperour baptised into the faith of Christ, together with his sonne Philip, and his wife Severus: though the publicke

like authorizing of the same Profession was refused for the blessed times of our British Constance. The means of his conuersion from Idolatry, were Fabianus and Origen, who by letters exhorted him therunto : and for the same Profession were both homicide and foune murdered by Decius his Captaine, though others report, that Decius did rather hate Christianisme for their sakes, then them for their Profession sake. And howeuer Pompeius Latinus accuseth him to bee a dissimling Prince, yet Eusebius declareth the effects of his Profession furth otherwise : for Philip (saith hee) seeking to communicate with the Saints, could not bee admitted, till such time as he had made open confession of his Faith : at which time he inuied himselfe with those, who for their finnes were brought to examination, and was placed in the ronne of the Penitents, because that to many things he had bene faulty : which willingly he obeyed, and declared by his works his sincere and religious penite towards God. Which may the rather appeare by Sabellius and Bergomensis, who shew, that the hatred of Decius against Philip and his foune was conceiued, for that they had committed the custodie of their Treasures vnto Fabianus the Christian Bishop of Rome, who baptized them, as some write ; though others say, Fabius the Martyr did it.

(4) The Gothes againe descending from Scythia, infested Misra and Thracia with a mighty Arme, seeking their habitation in those Countries : as formerly they had done : against whose irruptions, the Emperour sent one Marinus a most valiant Captaine, who no sooner came into those parts, but drew the Souldiers into a Rebellion, and proclaimed himselfe Empe-rouer, taking (as he said) his example from Philip, that had in like sort raised his title by his Sauaignties fall. But the Souldiers that had newly erected him, as suddenly againe threw him downe, and in their mutable affections slew him.

(5) Into whose Charge was sent Decius, a man of great experience, who alio no sooner was in the Arme, but they forced the Imperiall Estagies vpon him, and (as some report) against his will : hee therefore sent secretly to Philip, declaring this attempt of the Souldiers, and how hee meant to make escape from them with persisting in his dutifull allegiance. But the Emperour fearing this to be but policie in Decius, left by delay he might giue him more strength, omitted no time to vphold his owne, and with a mightie Arme undertooke these affaires himselfe, not trusting any more to the disposall of his Captaines. And immediately departing Rome, with a stern resolution, and ouer-hard hand, held the reime of that begun Expedition, whereby he presently lost the loue of the Arme, and Decius was accounted the more worthy of rule, whom in Verona they forthwith proclaimed Emperour, and cut off Philip head thorow the teeth, before they had departed Italia. At newes whereof, the Prætorians slew Philip his Calar and sonne, a man of so obseruable composednesse, as that he had bene neuer seene to laugh in all his life. And thus the two Philips ended their reignes.

(6) Julius Philippus (saith Eusebius) reigned seven yeeres : but Entreprius and Fictor giue him only five ; whose death happened in the yeete of Christ Iesus, two hundred and fiftie.

(2) His Birth was noble, of the Cny Cabuli in the Lower Pannonia, now knowne by the name of Hungarie: himselfe well experienced, wise, and valiant, and wielded the Empire as a worthy Prince, had he not blemished his reign with a Reigne of Tyranny, and persecuted Gods Saints with such a Heathensh rage, that he is rightly noted by learned Writers, to be the fourteenth Horne of the Persecuting-Imperiall-Beast, whose insaigre cruelties towards the innocent Christians, is most lamentable to be heard, but more to their smart that suffered and felt it.

But long hee ragd not, ere God in his iustice tooke revenge, and brake him to peeces as a Potters Peckell.

(4) For the Goths that had invaded Asyia and Thracia, continuing their Inruptions into the bordering Provinces, drew him into an Expedition for thole

And according to his Death, so was his Descent: for neither hath he Father, Mother, nor Wife mentioned (for ought I know) by any Writer, (for of Salustia Barba Orbiana, it is doubtfull whether to him or his sonne Hastulian the were wedded) nor his Acts so exactly requir'd, as were those of the preceding Emperours, his lianes to deffrueing it, and God in his reuenge so punishing it.

(5) Aurelius Victor and Euagrius say, that hee reigned two yeeres and odder months: but Euagrius affirmeth his reigne, not fully two yeeres: most hold him to haue died at the age of fifty, and in the yeere of Christ, two hundred fifty two.

His overthrow of the Romans, and death of Decius, in outward semblance was so greuously taken by Trebonianus Gallus, that no man was so forward for revenge as hee, and therefore the last in suspicion of Treason. The Armie hee strengthened, and daily encouraged, pretending great service against thole barbarous Scythians, but all to gaine credit and liking of the Souldiers, whereby hee soone achieved his desire, and with their applauses was proclaimed Emperour.

(2) By Birth, he was descended of an honourable Familie in Rome: but true honour cannot harbour where dwelleth treachery and falshood, as it was with him, when appointed by Decius to bee Gouernour of Asyia, and to keepe the passages from the invading Goths, the desire of Rule so corrupted his mind, that he plotted with them against the Armie, and betrayed the trust and life of his Soueraigne.

(3) Neither is he stained with the blot of Treason only, but also with a careless and cruell government; for with the Goths hee made a dishonourable peace, whereby the Romans (who were Lords of the World) became Tributarie by a yearly pay to thole vnciuill Scythians, who neuerthelesse in short time brake their Truce with him, sacking and spoiling the Provinces of Thracia, Asyia, Thesalia, and Macedonia: the Persians then also by their example enaring Mesopotamia and Syria, made spoile euen thorow Armenia.

(4) Gallus little regarding their troubles abroad, consumed his time idly in Rome, rather as a Romane to his owne voluptuous desires, then a Conquering Monarch; taking for his companion and fellow-Emperour, his sonne Volsianus, as appeareth by inscription

with a wonderfull slaughter; whereby hee grew so famous, and Gallus so contemptible, that the Souldiers (ouer affecting change) proclaimed him Emperour, the newes whereof soone roused Gallus from the Bed of his lasciuious pleasures, and with his sonne entered the quarrell against Amilianus, whose fortune was to slay them both in fight, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, two hundred fifty three, after hee had reigned not fully two yeeres, and liued (as Victor testifieth) forty and seuen: whereupon the Armes joining their forces together, conferred the Imperiall Title and Ensignes vpon the Conquerour.

(3) But seeing Europian doth allow him the place, we are not to dispute his title or claime: only his short time of gouernment admitteth no matters of large discourse, being cut off in the budde, before the graft had time to spring. For his Armes disliking what themselves had done, and hearing of the worths and election of Valerianus, laid down their weapons born in his defense, and tumultuously murdered him in the heat of their bloods, after hee had reigned in name, without action, the space almost of foure months.

Herodotus in Clio.

Foer the saying of the wife Atthemian Selas (spoken to Crispus the rich king of Lydia) was true, That no man can be happy before the day of his death: then most truly may it be verified of this Valerianus the next succeeding Emperour: whose yeeres were multiplied with increase of honour, vntill they came to fceuty and seuen, but then were clouded with such ignominious miseries, as the like had neuer hapned to any Romaine Emperour before him, and (I may well say) to no other Monarch in the world before liuing: Such is the Ordinance of our great God, sometimes from the Dunghill to raise men of low degree, and to place them with Princes in the Chaire of Maiestie; then againe to bring down the Mighty from their Seate of Glory, & to leaue them chained with the poorest Captiues, & basest Vassals. For such was the State of that Great & Proud King of Babel, who from the height of Maiesty fell into the cōditions of an vnreasonable Beast. And so was it with Valerianus, though not vterly abandoned fro the Societie of men, as Babels King was: yet was he caried Captiue vnto a Nation whose Society was scarce humane, and where his viage was more then barbarous.

(2) This man was both nobly descended, and of so great eſtreme among the Romans, that beeing but a priuate, and then also absent, they chose him for their Censur, an Office of high dignitie, conferred euer vpon the Best, as Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the History of his Life, hath declared. Eusebius reporteth his beginning to haue bene gracious and milde towards the Christians: about any of his Ancestors whatsoever; yea even those who were themselves openly accounted Christians: in somuch, that his Clemencie was their Protection, and his Court the Sanctuarie of their safeties. But Satan (whose hatred sleepeth not) stirred vp an Egyptian Sorcerer against them, who fo enchanted the Emperors heart, that with great crueltie he began the Eighth Persecution, & so raged, that some haue appropriated the sayings of the Apocalyps in the thirteenth chapter vnto him, as to whom power was giuen for twa and fower monethes ouer the Saints of God, and a mouth to utter great blasphemies: Of which opinion is the ancient Dionysius Alexandrinus. Many indeed were the Martyrs that he caused with horrible tortures to die, and more had done, if the iust reuenging hand of God had not cut him off.

(3) For Sapor the fange King of Perſia, making great spoile in Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, drew Valerian from Rome into Mesopotamia, to withstand his rage, where striking Battell with him was leſſe (either by Treſſon or Chance) without sufficient Guard to secure his Person, and was there taken Prisoner by the Perſians, hauing then reigned seuen yeeres (whereof two were spent in spilling of the blood of Saints) and thence forward, the rest of his life was enthralled to a most miserable and mercilesse seritude: For the Tyrannizing Perſian putt vp with this fortunate gale, to an excessive swelling of pride; whenſoeuer he was disposed to take Horſe, made Valerianus his Foot-stole, causing this Greatest Monarch of the World to whom all Nations did homage, to bow downe his necke and backe for himſelfe thereon to tread, and mount into his Saddle: In which vnſufferable ſlaucerie his old body indured without releaſe, to the end of his most wretched life, which by some Authors account was full seuen yeeres more; the very time of the Babylonian Kings abasement.

(5) How vnſpeakable the cruelties were which this wretched Emperour endured by that Tyrant, may hence appeare, in that not only those which were Alies to the Romaine Empire, but also the Barbarous Kings, and friends of Sapor were moued with commiseration, and diſſaile, as Trebell. Pollio prometh by their own letters sent for his releaſe, the copies whereof hee there produceth. Other Princes also of the East, as of the Babrians, Arabians, Siberians, and Sythians, inhabiting Mount Taurus, had ſuch ſenſe of their ignominious viages, that they disdaind to receiue the letters from Sapor of his Victories ſucceſſe, and ſent their Ambaſſadors to Rome, proffering their aſſiſtance for the redemption of their Emperour; yet all auailed not, and Sapor held ſtill his Prisoner, abſorbing nothing either of his owne pride, or his Captiues miſerie, but in the end (ſo helthie a ſend is reuenge) commanded his Byro to be pulled out, and ſo for age and griefe he died, as Eusebius ſaith: being, as Agathas (a writer of credit) reporteth, ſlaied aboue by direction of this vnhumane King. Thus did God puniſh one Tyrant by another, and thus himſelfe felt thoſe torments vnpietied, which hee had without piete inflicted on others. The race of whose Reigne is accounted to bee ſeuen yeeres before his Captiuitie, wherein hee liued almoſt ſo long as Gallienus his ſonne ſit Emperour, and died in the yeere two hundred ſixty one.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Alerian now Captive in Perſia (while Odenatus grasping the advantage, tooke upon him the Empire of the East) & the now guide-lesse Armie of Rome, occupied onely in spoile and mainie, their leaders in faction, and the whole State astonished in affrighted terror and amazement) Babſa (a gallant gentleman) first of the Romans moved with the instant miserie of the Common-wealth, resolved by electing anew an Emperour, to prevent the apparant ruine of his owne Countrey: yet neuer in this his worthe resolution, once dreamed of Gallienus, (though before chosen Augustus in the full fortune of his father) but the affection of the Armie forcibly settled the Garland upon Macrian and his two sonnes, as the most worthe; who with his eldest not long after subdued by Aurélius usurping Syria (against Gallienus then received Soveraigne by the Roman Senate) and his youngest betrayed to murder by plot of Odenatus, left the distracted Empire to those three, of which the last disdaining much the indignitie offered to the State of Rome, by that base captivitie of Alerian, whose calamity nothing touched the sense of his vnaturall sonne, entered a warre against the Perſians, and tooke from them their Cities Nisibis and Carræ. But such was the moderation of this man, that although hee had power of an independent Soveraignie, yet he held still a good correspondence and intelligence in all his actions of Government, with Gallienus, to whom hee first (as monument of Victorie and Reuenge) such of the Perſian Nobles as became his Prisoners: and thus Odenatus did conquer, and Gallienus triumph. But such was the baseness of the other, that when he could not by any Princely vertue in himselfe, eclipse the true merit of Odenatus, hee endeavored to deface by treacherie what he could not suppress by valour. But in this failing, hee made him then (through feare) copartner of his Empire, killing him Augustus, and stamping his face and the Perſian Triumph upon the publicke Coin of the State, by approbation of the Senate, leaving him alone to delude those Frontiers of the Empire, whilest himselfe, neither regarding his old fathers miseries, (most miserable that hee had so vnaturall a sonne) the dishonour of the Roman State, nor the reuolt of the Provinces, whereof newes was daily brought him, spent his vnprincely thoughts vpon fruitlesse devices, as in reseruing sundry Fruits and Flowers, that they might grow Greene and flourish all seasons of the yeere; and (which was worse) vpon women and wanton dalliance.

Yet had hee a Ladie of excellent beauty and allurements, Coruſia Saluina Pipara, to his wife, the daughter of the King of the Mercmanns, whose feature wee finde often minted vpon her Monies. His sonne by her Sologimus hee adopted Cæſar, of whom there is no more remembered in Storie, then that hee was borne noble, trained vp princely, and perished through the errors of his father, and not his owne. And to his brother Licinivs Valerianus (to whom the father had giuen the title of Cæſar) hee added the honour of Augustus. And therefore we haue not held it improper, to adioine to his their monies in the front of his life.

(2) The calamities of this Emperours time were so many, as almost exceed credit: and Signes shewed both in the Heauens and the Earth, manifested his wrath, that fate vpon the Throne of Laffer, from whose presence issued Thunderings, Lightnings, and Voices. For (by Writers of best credit) the Sunne was clouded as vnder sackcloth, and not seen for many daies together. Earth-quakes great, and fearfully reſounding, ouerthrew Cities and other edifices, shaking the ground so terribly, that wall Caues, and hideous gaping bowels of the earth were thereby laid open, and whereout (no lesse strangely) flowed great streames of salt waters. The Earth roared, and seemed to thunder, when there was no voice heard in the air. The Sea ouer-swelled her banks, and brake into many Continents, drowning Countries, Cities, and People: and (besides all these) so violent a Pestilence raged, that in Rome no lesse then 5. thousand persons died in a day.

(3) These miseries somewhat moued this Heathenish Emperour to remorse: and thinking thereby to pacifie the wrath of the Diuine Powers, hee slated the Persecutions of the Christians, lending out his Edicts in fauour of them. For not only the Heauens, Earth, and Sea declared the anger of their God, out of whose mouth went a two-edged sword, but the Provinces also seemed to be removed out of their places. The Souldiers of all parts electing their owne Generalls, advanced no lesse then Therty at once, who assumed the title of Emperours, but are recorded to Posterities by the name of Usurping Tyrants. And as they were all deadly opposite each to other, so were they jointly almost all bent against Gallienus; whereby the Roman Empire was more oppressed with her owne forces, then euer it had been by forraigne Powers. And since fixe of them assumed the Purple Robe in this Wheresome Angle of the Empire, it will not be impertinent to the course of Story, with a light touch to remember them, and to expresse their Miseries, as we haue done the rest of those that held the reines of government in these parts of the Roman World.

Thirty Emperours in once.

M. Calfius Labienus Posthumus after the death of Salustianus (who was committed to his education by Gallienus) assumed the Empire, by aide and encouragement of those of Gallus, over whom he had born the office of lieutenancy by fauour of Valerian the Emperour. And these againe, as all Populars greedie of Innovation from him and Iunius Calfius Posthumus his sonne, tooke both honour and life, after ten yeares gouernment. This opportunity either made by L. Albinus, of sildy taken, mounted him vp with ease into that Emperiall throne, in which he late not with like fortune of continuance, though of conclusion. To this man succeeded together, M. Aurelius Valerianus, and Lucius his son; both in a Tumult neere Calan by their souldiours marched. And had not the inordinate lust of the elder, blemished his other vertues, he had to al the most excellent Emperors bin nothing inferior, in the best of their other verraces.

(7) The restless humor now of the giddy Commons, next felch it selfe vpon Aurelius Maximus, a soveraigne furible in his meane condition to their base affections (for he was no better then a Blacksmith) yet to him a man of their own meanes & making, they were no lesse vnconstant and cruel, then to the reits: after three daies, setting an end of his gouernment, with a sword of his own forging. And therefore Probus Tacitus, the father and sonne, though ascending the throne of Maicstie, with the great applause of that people, and filling it vp with much meric and happy successe of their own, when they considered the insufferable infolenacies and desperate practices of that prophane ranke, chose rather to adorne Aurilian Triumph, in a voluntarie captiuitie, then to liue and rule at the deuotion of a lawlesse multitude. And these times seemed no lesse fatally bent to bloud, disorder, and tyranny in other parts as well as these: For the Pannonians raised Ingenius: The Mysians, A. Regilianus: The Egyptians, Amilianus: In Africa Celsus was proclaimed: In Silyricum, Aureolus: and in the East, Odaenathus (a man the more famous for Zenobia, his glorious and magnanimous Wife, whose valour was so feared of Gallienus, that to make him his, hee admitted him his Fellow-Emperour, with the Sile of Angustus as we haue remembered before.) The Germanis innade Italy: The Goths waite Greece, Pontus and Asia: The Samaritians seize Anfricht and Hungary: The Persians robbe Syria: The Saxons breake into Gallia: The Franks into Spain: In a word, all are in vproares, the second seale opened, and the Red-horse prepared for Battale, whose Rider had received a great and sharpe Sword, with Commission giuen him to take Peace from the Earth: and these times of troubles are so famous in Scorie, and the reuolutions of Acts so agreeable to the words of the Prophesies, that they may seeme iustly a most exact accomplishment of that sacred vision.

(8) Finally, when Gallienus had reigned from his first Associating with his Father the terme of fiftene yeeres, Martian, Heracianus, and Ceremonius, three of his principall Captaines, (compounding together that one of them should bee Emperour) plotted his death, whiles hee besieged the Citie Milan, where they traiterously murdered him, the yeere of our Lord two hundred sixty nine, after that hee had suffered the Empire to be rent in peeces, and vsurped by many Ferraine and barbarous Nations.

Fl. Claudius Emp.

OMES glory thus declining, and the Imperiall Foundations thus undermined, the aspiring tops of all that beautifull frame began to shake, and to forebode the signes of her approaching fall. And had not the Fates even at that instant raised a stay to vnderprop the Waller, those mounted Tempes which so long had beased the Sky, had bene laid level with the Ground, and made the ruins of All-consuming Time.

(2) For whereas by the strange confusions vnder the late Emperour, the Eagles body was burdened with the weight of those thirty heads at once; of which number though many of them by their owne mutual reasoning were consumed before the death of Galenus, yet the mightiest Aurelius Gouverneur of Dalmatia, Tetrus, and Vitellius, who held Britaine and Gallia; and Zenobia (the Heretic Queen and wife of Odenat) all the Ealy, to omit the Murderers of Galienus; that durst not make their claime, (their deed so ill digested) all these were still remaining and strong, at such times Flavius Claudius by the Souldiers was elected before the Waller of Milan, and confirmed with much joy by the Senate in Rome.

(3) This Flavius was descended of noble Parentage, out of Dalmatia, by some; or as others say, of Dardania, and sprung from the Trasian Blond. But Aurelius Vilius will haue him the sonne of Gordianus the Emperour before spoken of. Howsoever, a most worthy man he was, an excellent Capitaine, of singular cominence, a iust Iudge, a lover of strangers, severe to the wicked, but most benigne to the vertuous: so that we may well say, he Rome was a new world; or at least, to the World was a new Rome.

(4) His first Expedition was against Aurelius, that held Milum, whom he there flew, and joined his Souldiers to his owne strength. But preferring the generall good before his particular quiet, he addressed his waies for the East, against the Goths, who (as Iordanes their Story-writer reporteth) had infected those parts of the Empire (for intestine yeeres continuance) with continuall irruptions, and had now lately entered friendship with many other like barbarous Nations, invading Thracia, and the Countries before them, even vnto Macedonia: and thence taking their way thorow Hungarie, came downe the Riuer Danubius, with two thousand Sail of Ships, fraught with Monition and Mee. To meet these, Claudius prepared: but before his Encounter, he wrote thus to the Senate:

(5) "Reverend Fathers and Reverend Lords, vnto thisland yefor certaine, that three hundred and twenty thousand men of Warre are entered our Confinnes, whose weight doeth seeme to burden the Earth it

"life, and whose warre-like preparations make these parts of the Empire to tremble and quake; with whom I am now to strike Battle: wherein if I Conquell be mine, the joy will be yours. But if I fall, yet I pray remember that I fight after Galenus hath resigned, and rent the strength of the Romans in these remote Provinces, and after the Rebellions of Labianus, Pesthianus, Eugenius, Regilianus, Celsus, and others, who haue so weakened the sinewes of our Armes, and broken the Swords and Leaves of our defense, that I may well say, wee want, if not strength, yet weapons wherewithall to fight. And to our shame be it spoken, Zenobia a Woman commands all our Crafts-men, and bends them against our vnarmed breith. How small focer therefore our performance shall becom this seruice, repaite it (I pray) for great, and with our proceeding may fort to the weale of the Empire,

(6) Which done, with no daunted spirit he entered Battle, and with more then wonted courage fought so valiantly, that he flew and tooke Prisoners, no the number of three hundred thousand fighting men, with two thousand Shippes laden with Monition, so that whole houses were filled to their toppes with Targets, Shields, Swords, and Lances, and other abiments for Warre, wherof he wrote againe to Rome: and following the Enemie with successe of Victorie, in Thracia neere Byzantium, in Macedonia neere Thessalonica, drove the Goths out of those parts which they had so long infected, and restored the wonted bounds of the Empire. Thence marching into Germanie, neere the Lake called Garda, gaue that revolted Nation a great overthrow, where (as Estropius and Vilius doe report) hee vanquished two thousand of those strong Germans, and there established againe their subiection to the Romans power. And now minding to goe forward against Vitellius and the pusillant Zenobia, Flavius did first cut off his purpose, and therefore alter his life: a thing very strange and rare in that age, as by the course of their reignes wee haue hitherto seene, not that so great a Monarch should die, (they being all of the same earthly mould that mortall men are) but that in those daies a Roman Emperour should die in his bed, as other men doe, of a natural death.

(7) Hee was of personage tall, his bodie well composed and strong, bright and cleere eyes, his face great and full; and of life most temperate and chaste. Hee reigned one yeere, tenne moneths, and fifteene daies, and died the fourth of February, in the yeere of Christ, two hundred fiftie one. His Statue of Gold was set vp in the Capitol, and his Target of the same metall hung vp in the Senate-house, himselfe (in honour of his admired worth) placed among the Romane Emperours that were deified for Gods: such an estimation and lone did his vertuous life procure vnto him euen after his death.

Europe.

Quintilius, the Brother of Claudius, and Vice-Roy in his absence for the Guard of Italy, was by the Arms whereof hee had command, proclaimed Emperor immediately vpon the News of Claudius his death: The Senate as idly confirming his Election, as they were sorrowfull for their losse of his most worthy Brother. Brethren indeed they were by nature, and in conditions not much vnlike: so that what seemed to bee past in the one, was in the other supplied and still remaining: For this M. Aurelius Quintilius, was both wife for Civil Government, and experienced for Warres, wanting no complements of an absolute Prince.

(2) But long his glasse stood not without a turne, nor his Fortunes fanning without a frowne. For the victorious Souldiers which in his expeditions had followed Claudius, and thought themselves worthy of the first voyce in Electiō, proclaimed Aurelianus for Emperor, a most valiant Captain; and of whose prowess there had been so sufficient experience, as that Quintilius knew hee could not stand against him.

And therefore mistrusting the strength of his Title, and affections of his Souldiers, reputed it ignominious for a noble minde, to die with lesse honour then he attained vnto, and enioied by his life: and therefore resolving to die an Emperor, chose rather by a voluntary cutting of his own veins, to powre out his life with his blood, then to hazard the chance of vncertaine warres, or to returne to his private estate.

And thus no longer reigning then seuen teen daies, (which short time could minister little matter of larger discourse) hee died with his brother the same moneth of February the twentieth day, and yeere of Christ his incarnation, two hundred seauentic one.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

L. Aurelianus
Emper.

An. Do. 272.

Short was the Reigne of the last Emperor Quintilius, that Aurelianus who followed him may be said to be the Successor of Claudius, and not of him: being elected by his Legions in the East, as soone as the other had bene in Italy (though confirmed before him of the Senate in Rome) continued still his riuall for Majestic, and attained the top of that high see

Gole, whereof Quintilius failed, before his foot had well mounted the first step.

(2) This Valerius Aurelianus was of parentage neither honourable nor rich, and yet his fortunes carried him to the height of both. Some recount his birth was of Dacia; others of Myria; both so doubtful that Flavius Vopiscus, (the copious Writer of his Life) leaves it vndecided, and to the censure of his Readers. His risings were by the Warres; wherunto from his child-hood hee had a naturall inclination; and for continuall carrying of his weapons, was commonlie called Aurelianus the Sword-bearer.

Aurelianus his

(1) His

(3) His service was sufficiently known to the Generals of divers Provinces, who had forty sundry times employed him in the charge of a Centurion and under Claudius in Persia he was the Cornet of the Harle. In the warres of Sarmatia he is reported to have slain forty Enemies with his owne hands in one day; and at other severall times, to the number of nine hundred men, as both Pyrrhus and Theodosius have affirmed. And generally so famous were his deeds, both before he was Cesar, and after, as that he is by some compared with Julius and Alexander.

(4) Upon the ratifying of his election by the Senate at Rome, hee halted not thither to be saluted and enthralled Emperour, but forthwith marched against the Sarmatians and Sarmates, who force infested the Empire with warres; and having foore subdued them, and quieted those parts, in great haste hee came into Italy against the Germans, who with Fire and Sword had gone as farre as Milan; and them likewise with great valour hee forced thence. Then entering Rome with great pompe, caused the Wall to be repaired and enlarged, which was not lawfull but onely for Vitellius Emperour. But long hee staid not, ere he returned into Syria, against the stout Queen Zenobia, whole brave resolutions, and warlike power for fight, her Letter in answer unto him (when being forcibly tired, hee professed her wealth, life and liberty to yeeld) doth manifestly declare: the tenour thereof being as followeth.

(1) "Zenobia, the most mighty Eastern Queen, to Aurelianus, Roman Angulus, sendeth greeting.
 "Neuer Captaine to this day, in vying Power in stead of Spurs, or filed Words for weapons points, hath more sufficiently discharged the parts of Warre, then thou to me in Writ hast done: wherein I well perceive thy drift, and blame thee not, that least me not a Woman: which Sex you men make subjects only by your smoothing tongues. But know, Angulus, thou dealest not with a Roman Dame, nor with her who upon bafe conditions will subscribe her honour; but with Zenobia, the Palmyrene Queen, in whose womanly breast the manly heart of great Othman doth still live and lie. These concurring teardrops doe ill befeme a Campe, and worse him who would be ruled a Mar. But yet thy Golden Shewre hath rained beside our Lappe, nor wee a Pen to mee thee for thy sport, but with our Launce in hand to trie our lawfull right, and with our Swords to answer thy demands in blood. I am a Woman; so was Tomyris; thou knowest the rest: in Armes against Angulus, so was Cleopatra, who rather chose to sting her selfe to death, then live a Slave (though a Prince) under great Othman. Art thou his better? thou art decreed: or I her worse? nothing left: who from her person doe derive my Pedegree, and from her courage will maintaine my cause. I am a Queen, and rainge be belowd, was Rome Empress, obeyed and honoured; and the wife of Othman, whom all you Romans greatly feared. Are my powers weak? The Perfians (whose strength you well have tried) will supplie. Are my Souldiers few? The Sarmatians have more that will assist: and the Armenians are wholly at my command. If then Theodosius and Robbers in Syria were sufficient to overthrow thine Armes, what hope is left thee to escape our hands, when all the force our strengths shall be thus conjoined in one? Therefore the same offers that

"to me thou hast sent, the same to thee I heere re-
 "turne, and will performe, if thou in time embrace
 "this truce.

(6) This haughtie answer of that undaunted Queen, put more fire to the furie of Aurelianus, who tooke the Letter in such scorn, that hee threatened death to the Writer, (whom hee supposed to be Longinus the Philosopher, who was alwaies with her, and her Instructer) which afterwards hee did accomplish: for delivring her severall Asis before they could meeete together, and belieging Palmyra her strong Citie, hee brought the same to such distresse, that in the end hee tooke her Captive; and glad of such a prey, carried her himselfe to Rome, where following his Chariot of Triumph, arrived in Tribunes and richett Robes of price, hee was lead his Prisoner in Chaires of Gold: upon wholl presence the Spectatores with admirations so much gazed, that somewhat hee dimmed the Majestie of Aurelianus: for hee is said to be exceedingly fair, though not very white, but somewhat browne: her eyes blacke and bright, her teeth shining like pearles, her bodie tall, and of most stately proportion, her countenance modest, milde, and pleasing, her voice sweet, her conversation honest, her minde chaste, and body continent, wise, temperate, and learned in the Greeke, Latine, and Egyptian tongues. Yea the achievement of this Conquest was held so notable, that hee repeated himselfe the Rehearser of the Eall, as it appeareth by the reuerie of his money here prefixed in the entrance of his raigne.

(7) These Acts of Aurelianus made him so famous abroad, and feared at home, that Tetricus which had held out against Galvus, came in vnder his protection, holding it more safe to be a Slave in quiet, then a Commander against an Opposite of so invincible a minde: by whom thereupon hee was made Governour of Campania, and of other Provinces in Italy.

(8) Hitherto this Emperours successes were very prosperous (we may well suppose) for his indulgence to the Christians, whose assemblies hee permitted, and whole Assemblies hee so favoured, that at their request hee banished Paulus Samosatensis the Heretic out of their Council, and published an Edict in the behalfe of their Synode. But afterward Satan minding to sift the Wheat, that the Chaffe might be his, stirred up this Emperour to raise the Ninth Persecution, and to send forth his Edict for the destruction of Gods Saints; which whilst hee was in petting, and about to set his hand and seale, a Thunderbolt from Heaven strooke into his presence, and so neere unto his person, that all accounted him to be therewith slaine, God warning him by this his Adviser to be wife: lest hee perished in his own wayes; as shortly after hee did, being slaine by his Servants, through the Treason of Masellus his Secretary, the nine and twentieth day of February following, neere unto the Chise Beautifull, when hee had fate 1 superior four yeeres, eleven months, and seven daies, the yeere of our happinesse, two hundred twenty six.

(9) Hee was of stature tall, of body well shaped, a pleasing countenance, and of a seemely presence, a great feeder, and very severe, whereby hee was as much feared as beloved, and therefore reported to be a good Physician, but that hee ministered too hater Phisians; and was Canniball after his death among the holy Emperours: in the second yeere of whose raigne, the Great Confusion of Italy in Britaine was borne.

CHAPTER XL.

Claudius Tacitus Emp.

An. Do. 276.

Aurelianus being dead no man thought to be Emperor.

Seneca and Sordanius being courtiers who should choose the Emperor.

Emilia Lepida, sister of Claudius.

Claudius Tacitus elected Emperor.

He former seditions ended by Aurelianus, and the state of the Empire remaining now in quiet, no man appeared to sue, much less tumultuouse to strive for that Royal Diadem; but all the great Commanders (as though they made courtesie in giving way each vnto others) stood at the foot of Matellus; no man attempting higher to mount. The soldiers sent to the Senate to designe the man whom they best liked; the Senate requested the soldiers to elect him whom they held worthiest; in which respectiue compliments, and most kinde correspondence of all parts, eight moneths passed with a peaceable Interregnum, as writers report.

(2) It seemeth, the fresh sense and fearefull experiences of the former heady proceedings, made men more wise, then to seeke their owne deaths, and especially the Generals to be better aduised, then to ruine desperately vpon their owne destructions. A change incredible, that Thirre ere whiles would needs be listed Emperours, among the tumultuous Soldiers (though they were fure to buy the vñ of that name with their dearest blood) and now one now in peace could bee found, either hally to seeke it, or verie willing to accept it.

(3) At last both Senate and Soldiers, having in their eye M. Claudius Tacitus, a man very Noble and of Consular degree, of great age, singular learning, & long experience in Magistracie; him by a ioint and conspiring suffrage, they all elected to their Empire: but he having before hand some inkling of this their purpose, got him out of the way, liuing very secretly two moneths at his Rurall Mannor, flying (saith Pappian) that high dignity which he fore-saw would proue his overthrow. And when they did by Embassages of men sollicite him to accept of their Election; sending him the Ensignes and Stile of Augustus: hee againe returned them, though with harty thanks, yet absolute denall, alledging by reason of his age and infirmities, that hee was currey way vnable to discharge their great expectation.

(4) But after much inter-courte, and many intrigates passed, at length (the necessity of the State so requiring) he accepted their offer, though not with much contentment to himself, who knew the weight of so great titles would proue heavy & alwayes dangerous for him to beare, but with vnspokeable ioy, was receiued by the whole Senate, which promoted all blessed hopes to the state vnder so worthy, so wise, so vertuous, learned, and so iust an Emperour.

(5) For as before his aduancement, he was of Exemplary composednes and vertuous disposition, so in this high Estate, his life was temperate, and without a pride, & so desirous to be a Preceder of moderation, & singularity vnto others, as that he would not permit his Emperre to weare any Jewels of high price, nor to vie other customeable superfluities, or excess in his owne house. For learning and learned men, whom he euer embraced in his priuate Estate, hee now by all means endeavored to honour and aduance, and publickly professed that what Imperiall vertues hee had, hee was so ascribe them to his study of good letters: For which cause, hee was wont to call Cornelius Tacitus (that worthiest Historian of the Romans State) his Father, and commanded his workes to be carefully preferred in eury Library throughout the Empire; and ten times eury yeare to be transcribed on publique cost. All which notwithstanding, many of that worthy Authors Bookes haue since miscaried.

(6) But his vertues were too great for the world long to enioy: and sith his Reigne was but short, it is bootlesse to lengthen it with long discourses: For his Peace continued without any memory of Warres; and his short time (wherein hee did nothing without consent of the Senate) was spent rather reforming other mens vices, and abuses of the Lawes and State, then in displaying his owne vertues; which doubtlesse (if their faire stream had not bene vntimely stoppt) would haue proued incomparable to any his fore-goes, and vnmachable by any his followers. What death hee died is left vncertaine; Estrapius thinketh him slaine, by his rebellious soldiers in Asia, vpon his voyage against the Persians: but Priſter reporteth that hee died a naturall death, and that of a burning-feuer, in the cite of Tharsus: And Flautus Papiſtus, (who wrote his life) saith his death came vpon a furcharge of griefe, by reason of factions; whereby (the infirmities of his age thereto helping) his vnderstanding was crazed, and his heart broken, whereof hee died, when he had reigned six moneths, and twenty daies, the yeare of Christ Iesus, one hundred fentie six.

M. AVREL. VALER. PROBUS.

CHAPTER XLII.

Val. Probus
Emp.

An. Do. 277.

HE Eastern Armie most potent and famous at the death of Tacitus, from thence was expected the new Emperours election, which accordinglie they did, but with much more wisdom and deliberation circumspection, then the Souldiers of those times were accustomed to doe. For every Capitaine of the Armie singled out his owne Companies, and in severall Assemblies exhorted, that all affections laid aside, they would applie their mindes to thinke of the worthiest man, on whom they might conferre their voices and fauours. At which time, the opinion of Probus his worth had so generally possessed the hearts of all men, that the shout and crie of all was vniforme, Let vs haue Probus for our Emperour. This being signified to Rome, the Senate with applause and thanks approoued and confirmed his Election, with additions to his Title, Augustus, The Father of his Country, and the highest hishop. For in those times, even amongst Heathens, the sacred Title of a Bishop was accounted an additament of honour euen to an Emperour.

(2) He was borne in Hungarie in the Citie Sirmia, of honourable Parentage, especially by his mothers side. His fathers name was Maximus, a man famous in Military Service, who died Tribune in the warres in Egypt: and himselfe very young, but very valorous,

Probus at first the father of his Country, and the highest Bishop.

His descent.

by the Emperour Valerianus (who so loved him for his virtues, that he wiled to say of him, that of all men he best deserved the name Probus, that is virtuous) was made a Tribune alio. In which Office, with great praise he served under Galienus, Aurelianus, & Claudianus the Emperours; under whom besides other exploits he fought severall single-combats to the great honour of himselfe and Country, and received as marks of victories, many Cinicall Crownes, Collars, Bracelets, Launces, Banners, and other Ensignes of Martiall deuotion and Priviledge. Preferred to be General in Africa, he subdued the Marmarides: In Egypt the Palmerines, under Aurelianus the Sarmates and Germans; under Claudianus the Gethes; and in all places so famous for his Acts, that hee was compared with Hannibal and Cæsar.

(3) His first service after hee became Emperour was in Gallia, against the Germans, that had made themselves Lordes thereof, where in one Battel, continuing two daies, he slew seuer hundred thousand of them, and recovered seuerall Cities from the Enemy, as himselfe signified by his own Letters to the Senate. After this warring in Scythia, he quieted the Provinces of Atacensis, Rafina, and Polonia: And curing Thracia, did no lesse in Greece, Syria, Arabia, Palmyra, and Iudea; whence passing into Perfia, hee had honourable compositions of Narfeus their mighty King. Whereupon issued for vniuersall Peace, that there were no warres heard of in all the Provinces of the Empire; inasmuch that it was a common Prouerbe, The very most darst not gaine for feare of Probus. But long this lasted not, ere hee was disturbed: for the Egyptians erected one Saturinus, a Captaine both wile and valiant, for Emperour, and that to fore against his will, as he was like to be slaine by them for gaine-lying their desires; and by a speech delivered to his Erectors, he made known to them his aduersaries from so dangerous an ambition; to this effect.

"(4) Fellownes and Friends, by my whole endeavour I haue alwaies fought to prevent that, which now I see I cannot shunne, I mean the Thyrus of Ataxifus; which howsoever to others, it may seeme full of glory and securitie, yet to my self, I fore-see it will prove, both base and dangerous. Base, for that I am no more the master of mine owne affections; which hitherto in my private estate were bestowed freely, & where I thought best, but must henceforth be carried at other mens dispose, and cast vpon those that deserve them least. That little time that I was wont to take, in retyring my selfe to my selfe, must now be straitned to serue others; and my thoughts wholly spent to prevent those weapons, which are borne (in them) for my defence, but are (in truth) the keyes of mine Impediments. I cannot go without a Guard: I cannot sleepe, without a watch; I cannot eate without a Talfer; these are but bonds, to get to a free condition, and neuer needs in a private fortune. That it is dangerous, it is no lesse apparent: for besides the flour-powder & weighty sword, hanging onely by a twisted-thred ouer our heads, Probus is not a Galienus to compound for the Diadem, but to touch his septer, is to awake a sleeping Lion: What should moue you then, to stir vp his wrath, to seek my death, and your owne destruction? For assure your selues when I die, I shal not die alone: So all our fame purchased in so many yeeres imployments, shal be lost by this one daies worke: and my Conquests in Africa, of the Mores, and in Spain, branded lastly with the eternall feares and infamie of Rebellion.

(5) These speeches (as Flavius Vopiscus the Writer thereof receiued them from the report of his Grand-father, who was there present and heard them) could nothing at all diuert the resolution of the Souldiers, but that they persisted and maintained their Election against Probus: who vpon notice thereof halting toward them with a mighty power, offered them pardon, as one vnwilling to shed Ciuill-blood, or to lose so worthy a man in Saturinus was: but vpon refusal of his proffered Clemencie, hee gaue him a most sharpe battell, wherein most of the Recoulers were overthrowne, and Saturinus in the assault of a Cassie belied, was slaine, to the great griefe of Probus, who sought to haue liued his life.

(6) But with his death ended not all Ciuill Broiles: for Bonifacius & Præxas two monsters of that age (though of different kinde of vices) opposing themselves against him, and assuming the Titic and Robes Imperiall, vsurped the Præsidies of Britaine, Spain and some part of Gallia, knowing that in these places Probus was not much beloued. Bonifacius was borne in Britaine, but brought vp in Spain, without note of faction, but onely in his cups, for bee was esteemed the greatest drinker of all men liuing: inasmuch as Aurel. said of him, he was born, not to sinerit, sed ut inebrietur not to drinke beeth, but to drinke in liquor: & yet (as it seemeth) hee was in good account vnder the said Aurelianus, hauing a charge of Ships vpon the Germane Sea, which either by treacherie or negligence were burned by the Enemy, in the month of Rhine, and (as Probus tooke it) not without the priuite of Bonifacius: who therefore not daring to stand to the trial, made all his powers against the Emperour, but was in Battel overcome, and despairing euer againe to make head, put his owne in a halter, whereupon it was said, that a Battel was hanged, and not a Man.

(7) Præxas was a Lygarian borne, as vnfaust a vassall to Venus, as the other to Bacchus; and therewithall so impoultic impudent, that as hee had a heart to commit any filthinesse, so a forehead to boast of it openly, as apparer by his owne Letters, wherein hee vauntheth, how many scores of faire Virgins hee depprined of that faire name in one fortnight; but this Grond-General of Venus Camp was suddenly forsaken by his Souldiers, and came to his deferred end.

(8) Some Irish there were at that present in Britany, by the incitements of their Gouernour, vvhose name though Histories doe not specifie, yet he may seeme to bee that Cl. Carr. Lalanus, whole ancient Cathes are found in this Iland, and not else-where: and his meanes to the place, was Villorinus a Moore, in great fauour with Probus: who taking himselfe not cleare from suspition, got leave of his Emperour to repaire vnto Britaine, where giuing it out that he was come thither for sake of his Life, was courteously receiued by the Generall. While secretly in the Night, hee murdered, and then speedily returned to Rome; hauing by this Expedition, both appeased the tumults in the Province, and approued his fidelitie to Probus. About this time (as is recorded) certaine Pandels and Barbarians that had invaded Gallia, were sent into Britaine by the Emperour to inhabit, who though they had troubled the Romanes peace in Gallia, yet did them good seruice in Britaine to stay their subiection; and the Britaines themselves for some good seruices were now satisfied by these Emperours, to plant Vines, and make Wines, with other matters allwell for pleasure as profit.

(9) At length the Empire in these ixviii parts standing vniuersally quiet, Probus determined a boysty into the Egyp, to end at once all forraigne wars; saying, he would shortly bring it to passe, that the state should need no more Souldiers: (which speech they tooke very indignely) & hauing passed Thyrus in Scythia, was by some of his own Army for curbing, as they conceived, with an over-hard hand their disoluite & idle manners, conspired against & treacherously murdered, in November the second, and yeere of Christ, two hundred eighty two, hauing reigned five yeeres and foure moneths: others say, six yeeres: where notwithstanding they erected for him a most honourable Sepulchre, wherein was engrauen this Epiph: Here lieth the Emperour Probus, highly for his goodnes called Probus, of all the Barbarous Nations and Tyrants a Conqueror.

R O A V S has laine in the out any apparant cause manifested, the Soldiers were stricken into a great fear, and mistrusted each other to be guilty of the Treason, no man therefore diligent to finde out the beginner, nor halfe to punish the bloudy executors, but holding the right of election to remain in themselves, they presently chose Carus for their Emperour, who had been the Prætorian

Præfect valiant, sufficient, of worth and esteeme;
whereunto the Sonati likewise consented.

(2) From whence or what parents we should derive his birth, is vncertaine, and of diuers writers diuersly reported. For Flavius Cassianus, who wrote the storie of his time, as Vopiscus doth report, saith, that he was borne in Sclauonia, or as we call it Moesia. Orosius
an ancient writer affirmeth his birth was in Rome, and that his father was a Sclauonian indeed, but held for a citizen, as he cith by letters from Vopiscus: Aurelius Vidius, Ensebius, and Paulus Orosius will haue him a French man, and borne at Narbonne: but whence soeuer, his princely parts defersed these his princely performances, and no waies for the short time of his raigne, carried he himselfe vnder expectation. Two sonnes hee had of vncqual conditions, Carinus and Numerianus, these both he made his Cæsars, with the Name and Power of Augusti.

(1) His first proceedings was to finde out the murderers of Probus, whom hee severely punished, which took away all suspicion of treason in himselfe.
Then marching against the Sarmates, whose furie had pierced so far into Pannonia, that they threatened Italy it selfe, hee ouerthrew with the slaughter of sixteen thousand, and took twenty thousand of them prisoners.
And leauing Carinus (his elder sonne) to gouerne Brit-taine, Gallia, Ibheria, and Spain, himselfe with the younger, Numerianus, prepared for the East against the Parthians, in which expedition hee tooke in his way Mesopotamia, Sclerica, and certaine cities whom the ene-mie had entred: and being surprized with sickness, and not able to trauel, pitched his Paulion vpon the shore of Tigris, where in the midst of his armie (about the yeere of our saluation 281.) garded from all supposed dangers and assaults of man, felt the vnexpected stroke of death euen from the hand of God himselfe:

for in his bed by a thunderbolt falling from heauen,
he was laine, with many others then present with him in his tent, and the same consumed altogether with lightning fire.

(4) The terror thereof so daunted the courage of his whole army, that no further they proceeded in their enterprise: and his death was so griuous vnto Numerianus now elected Emperour, that with continuall weeping (a fault in few Sonnes who are raised by their fathers fall) his eies were so weakened, that he could not indure any light. Vpon which accident, Arrius Aper, (his wifes father) tooke occasion to conspire his death, hoping thereby to attaine the Emperie himselfe. For hauing at all times free access to his presence, as length in his closet hee secretly murdered him;
pretending to the armie, that his infirmie only kept him from sight, and so leauing his body to putre-fie and corrupt, in short space by the very siner thereof the treason was deliered, and the Traitor laine by the hands of Dioclesian, who was both his Iudge and executioner.

(5) His Empire thus ended before it was well begunne, the Armie proclaimed Dioclesian, a Principall man in the Camp for Emperour: who to vphold his election, made all his power for Gallia, against his Concurrent Maximian, a man of profuse frivolisitie, who there had caused himselfe to bee proclaimed, and in his fathers absence had so ruled there and in Brittain, that Perthys lining at the same time, gaue out this estimimonie, that Brittain was a fertile Province of tyrants.
Betwixt these two Captaines, many skirmishes were fought with variable successe, till lastly in a set battell, Carinus was laine by a Tribune, whose Wife he had defiled; whereby the Imperiall Title was iustly conferred vpon Dioclesian.

(6) The time that these three, the father and two sonnes reigned, is reported to be two yeeres and somewhat more; and this last to die the yeere of Christs nativity, two hundred eighty foure.

He Empire thus deuolued to Dioclesian, with approbation of the Senate, hee every way studied to bee accounted worthy of the ſame, as knowing well his birth was no way anfwerable to his preſent lot; and therefore choſe for his Caeſar, Maximianus, a man of better deſcent, very honourable, wiſe, and valiant, as was maniſeſt in his firſt ſeruiſe againſt the Gaules, whom with an infinite number of petans in that province, troubling the peace of the Romans, hee with much ſlaughter ouercame. For which exploit hee fortunately accompliſhed, the Emperor made him his Conſort in the Government.

(2) Diocleſianus parentage is vncertainly reported by Writers, ſome making him the ſonne of a Notary, and others of a meere Bondſman; but all agreeing that his Countrey was Dalmatia, and his offspring very baſe. This man being but a Common ſouldier, conſoluted with a Witch for his future ſucceſſe; who told him (if you pleaſe) to belecue the reporters) that he ſhould become an Emperour after he had killed a Bore: to which he gaue credit, and euer after was a great enemy to that beaſt, and in time grew vnder Probos ſo great account for dexterity in expediting his affaires, that he was made Steward of his houſe, and now laſtly elected to the Empire.

(3) The very ſill thing that he attempted, was the puniſhment of his predecessors death; for which Arrius Aper being conſulted before his tribunall ſeat, himſelfe riſing ſuddenly from the Throne, ran him thorow with his ſword, in outward ſhew for zeale of Juſtice, as not able to endure ſo foule a fact; but in truth to fulfill the Prediction of his hoſteſſe, the Druid; for that Aper ſignifieth a Bore. After which act he held his Empire fully eſtabliſhed.

(4) To let paſſe many imploiments and troubles of the State, theſe two Emperours choſe to themſelues two Caeſars, whereby the One-headed Eagle became againe ſquare-headed, and each almoſt of an equall authority. Diocleſian choſe Galerius Maximianus, perſon Maximianus, ſurnamed Herculus, choſe Constantius Chlorus a Roman Senator, enforcing them to put away their former Wiues, & to take their Daughters, for an aſſurance of loue by the bonds of that Alliance; of whom the former was imploied for defence of Syria, and the other afterwards into Britaine againſt the Rebells there raiſed by Carauſius, whoſe coine is here ſet.

(1) This Carauſius by birth a Meſapien, but of low Parentage, as Beda and Entropius ſaith; who being appointed Admirall by the Romans to guard the Britiſh Seas, from the Pyrates of the Saxons and Lower Germans, who with continuall robberies waſted the coaſts, aboſed his authority both in ſuffering thoſe Pyrates to paſſe vnder Compoſitions, and in taking many ſhippes and much ſubſtance from the true Subieſſ to his owne vie; whereby in ſhort time hee became very rich, and (like a cat ſet to keepe mice from the larder) did more miſchiefe then the Robbers themſelues. Sabellicus reports, one very poliſtick cuſtome whereby hee enriched himſelfe; and that was by ſuffering the Pyrates to take as much ſpoiles as poſſibly they could before hee would ſurpriſe them; whereby they were his inſtruments to rob others, and nothing to better themſelues.

(6) Maximianus then warring in Gallia, and fearing the greatnes of his wealth and power, ſent ſecretly to ſlay him by treacherie; and in the meane while ſurpriſed many of his principall men at a Ceſſation.

the Tenth Horn of the Imperial Beast, who had received his Power from the Dragon (the devil) and Famine from those four Beasts depicted by the Prophet Daniel, whose mouth was as the Lyons mouth of Ashtar, his feet like the Beasts feet of Perfly, his spots as the Leopards of Greece; and these ten horns taken from the Monster of the Grecians parted kingdom, the Sciences and the Palmetics, called in Ezekiel, Gog and Magog, and here alluded unto by S. John, that thus made battle against the Saints. But as those four Beasts perished and were crushed by the fall of The first cut without hands, Emmanuel borne in our flesh: so this Beast compounded of them Famine, fell in the destructions of these most wicked Emperors, whereof almost all died by violently and unusual deaths, as the like is not read of elsewhere.

(14) For some flew themselves, as Nero and Otho did, some were smothered to death, as was Tiberius; some poisoned by their wives, as Claudius and Commodus; some ragged and torn in pieces by their own soldiers and soldiers, as Vitellius, Heliodorus, Papienus, and Balbinus; some flayed by them whom they most trusted, as Caligula, Othman, Didius, Gallienus, and many others; some tumultuously murdered, as Pertinax Severus, Maximus, Emilius, and Probus were; some slain in battle and defence of their titles, as Macrinus and Gallus; some hanged themselves, as Gordianus and Maximianus did; some drowned and swallowed up, as Decius and Maximus were; some slain by a thunder-bolt from heaven, as Carus was; some died in most miserable captivity, as Adrianus did, whose skinne was flayed off, he yet alive; some cut their owne veins and bled to death, as Quentius and Florianus did, some dying mad, as did this our Dioclesian some few, and them somewhat favouring Christians, died in their beds, a thing most strange to see in these times, wherein the Wrath of God thus fought against them in his Justice, and the power of his Gospel preached by his Apostles and Disciples, that as a Conqueror returned, and riding upon a white horse, bare a bow in his hand, and that the sharpe Arrows of death into the hearts of these the Kings enemies, as in the opening of the First Scale is seen; and in the Second is described and made manifest by a Red Horse prepared for Battle, whose Rider bare a Bright sword, and had commission To take peace from the earth, which most effectually we have seen performed in most of these preceding Emperors. And as Famine in great Wars is not greatly strange; so Scarcity exceeding Plenty, was seen under the opening of the Third Scale; whence a Black horse sent from God, passed through the earth, whose Rider bare a Balance to weigh Corn, as it were Spice, for dearth; and in the reign of this last Tyrant Dioclesian, they that had Eagles eyes might see the threefold judgements of God in the opening of the Fourth Scale, when Sword, Famine, & Death were all together as a pale-horse, sent from the presence of the Lamb, whose rider was Death and Hell, following as his Page. These were the times of calamities, when as the Scales of the righteous in the opening of the Fifth Scale, cried for vengeance for the blood of the Martyrs, whom these ten horns had gone to death; and under the Sixth Scale, both then, and for ever the wicked are said to call for the Mountains to fall upon them and for the rocks to hide them from the presence of Him that sits upon the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, before whom none could stand.

But why doe I (weake man) thus open the Curtaines of Gods most sacred Tabernacle, to behold the Mercy-fate of his diuine Mysteries in the accomplishments of these holy Oracles, when as they who have worn the Ephod, and in whose hand Aarons Rod hath budded, with a religious reverence haue feared to look into the same? Therefore with the charge of Iesusa I will not approach neere the Ark, and with Iohs hearers will lay my hand on my mouth, and returne to the prosecution of my purpose.

(16) The fountain & chiefe cause of these miseries lighting on the Church of Christ, did arise from the Christians themselves, as Eusebius in these words declareth: After that our conseruation through too much liberty and licentiousness was degenerated, and holy discipline corrupted, whiles everyone of us did cease, bite, and backbite each other, waging intestine warres within our selves, and piercing one anothers hearts with the sharpe speares of opprobrious words; so that Bishops against Bishops, and people against people were at bitter contention. Lastly, whiles nothing but hypocrisy was in the face, deceit in the heart, and guile in the tongue, whereby mischiefs were even full at the bosome, then began the heavy hand of God to visit us, &c. Where he proceedeth and sheweth that the greivous finnes of the Christians, was the cause of drawing downe these iudgements on their heads.

(17) And so this wicked Tyrant accordingly was but as Gods Instrument and Iron-throwing-flail, to bruise the precious wheat and seed of the Gospel, and to crush that outward glory of the Christian profession, which then was flourishing in most parts of the world.

(18) But long the Lord deferred not their release nor that Tyrants end. For after the first yeere of their persecutions, and twentieth of his Reigne, the thirteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere of Christs Nativité three hundred and three, hee with his fellow Emperors (both of them by the reuenging hand of God, stricken with a mad humor (saith Eusebius) renounced the Empire, and defending from the Tribunal of off their Purple and Imperial robes, whereby they againe became Private men.

(19) Dioclesian retired into Dalmatia, where in the Cite Salonia, hee poisoned himselfe, as Aurelius Victor affirmeth: and Eusebius saith, that no small dislike overtooke him, for that hee died mad. His consort Maximianus escaped not unpunished, but died for attempting the Murder of Constantine, and as Eusebius saith, hee hanged himselfe in the cite Mediolan: such ignominious deaths followed these two persecuting Tyrants, whereof Dioclesian had formerly made himselfe a God, and by an Edict commanded his Faute to be kissed: a practise pretely since imitated by his Successors, who have ruined the wounded Head of the Beast, and have trod his steps in wounding and persecuting the true members of Christ.

The Christian
began peace.

Diocletian and Maximianus resigning up their Souerainties (as is said) at the Citty Nicomedia in Bithynia, comitted the charge thereof, and the defence of the Common-wealth vnto Galerius and Constantius, who had been their Cæsars: vpon which occasion, great peace followed in the Church of Christ, and most especially vnto these Western Provinces. For those Emperors confirmed by the Senate, presently diuided the Empire betwixt them, as two Seuerall Estates, and not subiect to one Government, as formerly had been exercised; which (as Euagrius hath noted) was the fatal end of the Imperiall Glory.

(2) Vnto Galerius fell the government of Sclauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Egypt, and the Provinces in Asia, who took for care of that burden these two, whose Coines we haue here expressed.

Maximianus and Constantius Cæsars.

(2) C. Galerius, Valer. Maximianus, and Aurelianus.
Seuerus his sisters sonnes, whom in the year of Christ

three hundred and six, hee elected Cæsars, and after Augustus which honours the last enioied not long, for he was slaine at Rome by the treachery of Maxentius, after one yeere. And the other, when he had foure yeeres gouerned as Cæsar, and three as Augustus in the East, died at Tarsus in Cilicia.

(1) And to the lot of Constantius, who much at one time with his Copartner, elected his sonne Constantine, (so famous in christian historie) Cæsar, fell Italy, France, Brittain, Spain, Germany, and most of the Provinces in Africa: which seeming to him (who rather chose to gouerne well then much) too spacious, gave vp to Galerius all that in Africa, as too remote from the Seat of his residence, and eie of his direction.

(4) This good Emperour was for his Father named Chlorus, by birth a Roman, his Father named Eutropius, his Mother Claudia, Niece to the Emperour Claudius. Himselfe had attained the dignitie of a Senator, and was both Wise, Valiant, Noble, and Vertuous; whole parts Euagrius doth thus commend.

Constantius was a man of singular clemencie towards men, and pietie towards God. He did not partake with him in cruelty, whose partaker he was in Seneca aligie: neither staining his Raigne with the blood of the Saints, nor destroying our Churches and places of Prayer as Maximianus furiously did; but rather he reuerenced and highly honoured those who truly honoured God. For which God so blessed him, that this godly Father left a more godly Sonne Constantine the Heire of his well-gotten Empire.

(1) To which his vertues, other Authors adde, that he was of great affabilitie, louing, and gentle, little regarding his Private Profit, but altogether reigning to enrich his Subjects, and to that end would often say: That it was more behouefull for the Weale publique, that the wealth of the Land should be dispersed into the common hands, then to be locked up in Princes coffers. In which kind, so uerle he was from all superfluities, that hee may be adiudged fairly the other way: for vpon Feast-dayes, and in his Entertainments of Strangers, he was faine to borrow Plate of his friends (for such many times are richer then their Soueraignes) to furnish his Table and Cupboard.

(6) But aboue all other vertues, was his louing countenance

courtesance and protection to the late persecuted Christians, making his Court their Sanctuary, and his Chapel their Oratory. And to winnow the Chaffe from the ivy heat, he vied the like poeasie as Itho King of Israel sometime had done against the Priests of Baal. For he commanded all his Officers to offer sacrifice to the Idoll-Gods, pretending to dis-coutt all such as refused: but contrariwise those that obeyed hee put from him, with this reproofe, that hee who is displayd to his God, will neuer be true to his Prince.

(7) When he was first made Caesar, he was forced to forsake his first wife Helena, by whom hee had his vertuous sonne Constantine, and to take Theodora daughter in Law to Maximianus, for a further confirmation of friendship.

(8) Helena by birth was a Britaine, the daughter of Caelus a British Prince, as saith Eutropius, though Nicophorus make her of Bethunia, and Beda tearmes her his Concubine, some an Ivne-holder and others for her person and parentage stand very doubtfull: to meet with whom, let vs heare the censure of Times Chief Secretary, the learned Camden in his Britannia: Constantinus (saith hee) what time hee served in Britaine under Aurelianus, took to wife Helena daughter of Caelus or Coelius a British Prince on whom hee begat that noble Constantine the Great in Britaine; for so together with that great Historiographer Baronius the common opinion of all other Writers with one consent beare witness, while it becometh one of two petty Greeke Authors of late time, and those discounting one from the other and a very learned man, grounding upon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compiled he was by Maximianus to put her away, for to marry Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena which in Antique Descriptions is called VANARABILIS and PISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Christian Pietie, for cleansing Ierusalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord suffered and for finding the sayng Crosse, is so highly commended of Ecclesiastical Writers.

And yet both Jewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominie and reproch, Stabularia, because shee (a most godly Princess) fought out the Cribbe or Manger where Christ was borne: and in that place where blood that Hostie, founded a Church; for which cause shee was by the Enemies of Christian Religion called an Hostie, and (because such are commonly kind to their Cuckies) a Concubine also. For whose defense, let the Funerall Oratun of Ambrosius, made upon the death of Theodosius, answer, wherein hee doth rather commend her humilkie, then asseme any such base Offices in contempt of her person.

They say that this Lady was at first an Ivne-holder or Hostie, &c. Well (saith he) this good Hostie Helena halted to Ierusalem, and sought out the place of our Lords Cribbe, and made diligent search for the Lords Cribbe. This good Hostie was not ignorant of that Guest which cared the wey-faring mans hart, that was wounded by Thernes. This good Hostie chafte to beget a Stable-sweeper, that she might thereby save Christs.

And verily she was the moover and only worker of her husbands conversion, who calling off all superstitious worships, willingly acknowledged the only all-ruling God, suffering the Christians that had beene hidde in Caves and Denes, now to exercise their Devotions publicly, and both to reedifie the old ruinate Churches, and to erect new.

(9) Of the like Pietie wee read in a Queene of the like name, Helena, Queene of Adiabene (commended by Iosephus) that was Converter to the Jewish Religion, who coming to Ierusalem to visit the Temple in time of a greivous Famine, which happened in the daies of Claudius, sent to Alexandria for great quantity of Corne, and for Dried Figges from Cyprus, which shee very charitably bestowed vpon the poore. And about three blades or furlongs off from Ierusalem, built a Sepulcher with three Pyramides, wherein her selfe and her two sounes (both Kings) were afterwards interred. But to proceed.

(11) "It now sufficeth, and death is not feared, full, seeing I shall leave my vnaccomplished actions to be performed in thee my Sonne, in whose person I doubt not but that my Memorials shall be retained, as in a Monument of succeeding fame. What I had intended, but by this my fatal period left vndone, see thou performe: let those fruits bee ripened in thee the Branch, that I thy Stork from a vertuous intent have had ingrafted alwaies in me: that is, govern thy Empire with an vpright Justice; protect the Innocent from the Tyranny of Oppressors; and wipe away all teares from the eyes of the Christians; for therein, about all other things, I have accounted my selfe the most happy. To thee therefore I leave my Diademe, and their Defense, taking my Faults with mee to my Grant, there to be buried in everlasting obliuion: but leaving my Vertues (if euer I had any) to reuiue and live in thee. With conclusion of which vertuous counsell, heeooke his last farewell of his sounes, his friends, and his life, after hee had liued Caesar fiftene yeeres, and Emperor two, as Eusebius accounteth, and died the five and twentieth day of Iuly, the yeere of our Saviour three hundred and six, and of his owne age fifty six.

Id. 3. cap. 14.

HE Father thus departing both gloriously and peaceably in the presence of his Son and sage counsellors, the grief in the loss of the Sir was no greater then was the joy conceived that they had gained the sonne for his Successour, all men rejoicing at the good fortune of that journey, wherein he came to close the eyes of his dying father, and to comfort the sorrow of his mournfull Countrey-men.

For forthwith here in Brittain by acclamation of the people, assistance of the Souldiers, and advice of Erastus King of the Albans (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome) they proclaimed him at all hands Emperour, and Successour to all that part of the world which his father deckt. This election was joyfully ratified by the Senate, and of all other Provinces so gladly accepted, that they accounted this Island most happye of all other, whose chance was fitt to see him their Caesar, as in these words of the Panegyrist is scene: O fortunate Brittain, and more happye then all other Lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Caesar.

(2) His birth (as is said) was in Brittain, and honourably defended, his father a Roman Senator, Caesar, and Emperour; his mother a Brittain, (daughter to Celcus) a Princesse vertuous, wife, chaste, and religious: himselfe in true Pietie degenerating from neither. At his first entrance he purified the reliques of the warre which his father had begonne against the Caledonians, and other Picts, subduing the Britains that were more remote, and inhabitants of those Lands that are witness (saith one) of the Sunnes let or going downe

Rome, and Romulus his founte (whose face wee have here with his fathers from both their monies expressed) was created his Caesar (the way to that Seat of Maestie whereunto hee had too hastily and most vnderly climbed) for now this Caesar by his Neeremancie, Adulteries, Persecutions and Murders, was growne so intolerable and odious, that the Senate lent to Constantine, craving him and redresse, who fore lamenting the fores of the Empire, and the case of the Christians, first wrote: but that taking no effect, prepared his forces against Maxentius.

Maximianus the father, either in true zeale or fained pretence, (which by the legell is more probable) tooke great offence at his sonne Maxentius vnderstandable outrageousness, and vnder colour of dislikes and redresse, repaired to his sonne in Lau Constantine, whose daughter Fausla hee had married, and notwithstanding his fauor pretences before the face of Constantine, yet secretly he tampered with Fausla to make away her husband. But the good Lady well knowing that the bond of a child is great, but greater the love of a wife, revealed his treachery to Constantine, who caused him thereupon to be put to death, a fit end for so bloody a Tyrant. And ripe was the like destiny for his no-way-degenerating sonne, against whom hee prepared his forces: and drawing Licinius Gouernour of Sclauonia, who was made Caesar, to his side, by giving him his sister Constantia to wife, (a man but of an ordinarie descent, though Gallienus Maximianus had made him in Syria his Copartner in the East) halted towards Rome with an Host of ninety thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, leaved out of Brittain, France, and Germany.

(4) But knowing well that successe in warre dependeth more in diuine assistance then humane strength, yet doubtfull what God hee should in this blessed enterprise inuocate for aid, (for as yet he was not fully settled in the Christian Faith, though the Gods of the Gentiles hee observed altogether deceitfull) cast vp in this his holy meditation his eyes Eastward to heauen, and had by daime ordinance presented to him in obiect the signe of a Crosse, wherein were Starrs (as letters) so placed, that visible might be read this sentence in Greeke, IN HOC VINCE, as diuers Authors report.

Yet are there some fro the testimony of Eusebius himselfe, vnto whom this blessed man did declare his Vision, that affirme this forme being the first Greeke Character of the name of Christ, (to which the reuerse of Desertius heretofore expected, as of many others, may addemuch probability) rather then either of these, although Terentianus and S. Jerome affirm, that the latter was the very figure of the Crosse whereon our Saviour died: but this as a question beyond my judgement or intention, I leaue to those learned Diuines and others, who haue laboured in that subiect with curious search.

An inscription made in memory of the victory over the Goths.

The memorial
of the victory
over the Goths.

(5) This miraculous sign promising Victory, and that (saith Eusebius) not in an inscription only, but by voice of Angels, was so comfortable to Constantine, that with great courage he went forward, bearing before him and his victorious Army, in place of the Imperial Standard, the forme of this vision imbrodered with gold and fimes of greatest price. And as one armed from heauen, proceeded against his heliish adversary.

Maximian as much depending vpon his Sorcerers, was no lesse assured of the victory. In furtherance whereof, as a stratagem of warre, hee framed a deceitfull Bridgeouer the river Tyber, neere to Pani Atalini, to intrap Constantine: but byoyning battell, and overlaid with strokes, retired and fled, and (whether for haste, or through forgetfulness) rooke ouer the same Bridge, which suddenly failing vnder him, hee was with many more drowned, and Constantine remained victor. In memory whereof, hee caused a triumphall Arch to be erected in the midst of Rome, where in his Statue was imholled, holding in his Right hand a Crosse, according to the fashon of that which hee had seene in the heauens: and vpon ancient inscription in memory of this Victory, thus we finde engrauen: IN SINGVLT DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVS- TITREMP. VLTVS EST ARNIS. Thus: By insinuation of the diuine power, with great magnanimity and hope of his armie in a lawfull warre, hee reuenged the cause of the common wealth, as well as the Tyrant himselfe, as on his whole faction all at once. With the like successe had hee warred against the Franks in Galatia, whose Prin- ciple was likewise slumped in gnd, wherein is a Woman sitting vnder a Trophy, and leaning her head vpon a Crosse borne, with this inscription, FRANCIA.

(6) But as his fame increased in the mindes of most, so was it as much malignd by Lectinius fellow Emperour and Brother in Law, who in his heart neuer fauoured the Christians, howeouer for a time outwardly hee suffered their Religion: but at last, seeking occasions against Constantine, hee raised a cruell Persecution in the East, where hee reigned with Martianus, whom at Byzantium, and Julius Licinius Lectinius at Arles, hee had before made Casars: permitting chē to stamp these monies as marks of Souerainete.

(7) By this affliction of Gods Church, he informed this Champion of God for their defence to prepare his forces, with which hee met Lectinius in Hungary, where he gaue him a great overthrow. But hee escaping to Byzantium in Asia, the lesse joynd againe battell, and was there taken Prisoner: yet by the mediation of his wife Constantia, had his life spared, and was confined within the citie Nicomedia, where for his treasons afterwards, he and his sonne Licinius, that sometime had furnished him, were put to death. And now the peace of Gods Saints manifestlie appeared, and the progresse of the Gospell passed vntroubled.

(8) For now (saith our Gylden) no former was as the blessing tempest and storme of Persecution blowen over, but the faithfull Christians, who in time of trouble and danger had hidden themselves in woods and deserts, and in secret places, being come abroad to open sight, reedified the Churches ruined to the very ground. The Temples of he- lie Martyrs they founded, and erected (as it were) the banners of victory in every place, celebrating festiual holy daies, and with pure hearts and mouths performing the sacred ceremonies: for the which blessednesse, hee euer after had the Attributes ascribed vnto him of most blessed Emperour, most pious, happy Redeemer of Rome, Cause, Founder of Peace, Reiller of Rome, and of the whole World, most great invincible Augustus, Sacred, Divine, and of sacred memory, &c. Howbeit, for admiring these praises, as it should seeme, hee is taxed by Eusebius and Vulser of pride, as also crueltie for putting to death Crishon his sonne (by Minervina his concubine, whom hee had made Cesar, and permitted to stampe these monies here vnder inscribed) as likewise his wife Fau- sta, sister to Maximian: but others affirme that the causes of their deaths were just, though (as Pantus Orsius saith) the reason thereof was kept secret, and Quintus doth therein excuse him as Cassiodorus relateth, and so doth Rafinus and Eusebius.

(9) Touching Constantine affairs in this Island, it appeareth by the last Author, that after his Fathers death, and his owne departure out of this Countrey, some aspiring mind taking aduantage of his absence, in other warres, perswaded the people here to withdraw their obedience. Whereupon once againe hee addressed himselfe with his Armie to the reestablishing of the Islands subiection: and passing (saith Eusebius) ouer into Britaine, inclosed on every side within the banks of the Ocean, hee conquered the same. The joyfull memory of this expedition is registered to posteritie vpon his Coine set in the entrance of this Chapter, inscribed Aduentus Augusti, and by these Letters, P. L. N. the place of the Mint to heare London.

(10) After this (saith the same Author) hee began to compile in his mind other parts of the World, so the end hee might come in time to succour those that wanted helpe: and when hee had furnished his Armie with milde and modest instructions of Pietie, hee inuaded Britaine, that hee might likewise instruct those that were inuaded round about with the waves of the Ocean: bounding the same fitting as it were with those coasts. And of the Politicall gouernment therein by him altered, let it not seeme offensive that I, who know and professe mine owne weak fight in most of these matters, doe light my dimme candle, at the Bright-flaming Lampe of that Illustrious Antiquarie, who saith:

(11) About this time (saith he) as evidently appeareth by the Code of Theodosius, Constantinus was the Vicegerent of Britaine: for by this time the Premier had no more Proprietors, nor Lieutenantes, but in stead thereof, was a Vicegerent substituted. And againe, Seeing that Con- stantinus altered the forme of the Roman Government, it shall not be impertinent to note summarily in what sort Brit- taine was ruled vnder him, and in the next succeeding ages.

He ordained foure Prefects of the Pretorian, to wit, of the East, of Thyrace, of Italy, and of Gauls: two Leaders or Commanders of the forces, the one of footemen, the other of horsemen in the West, whom they learned Præfates. For civil gouernment there ruled Britaine, the Prefect of the Pretorian or Grand Seneschall in Gauls, and vnder him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent and honoured with the title, Speatialis, that is notable or remarkable: him chiefed respectiue to the number of the Praesenters two Consular deputies, and three Presidents, who had the bearing of civil and criminal causes.

mander of the footmen in the West, at whose disposition were the Earls or Lieutenants of Britaine, the Earle, Count, or Lieutenant of the Sacre Coast along Britaine; and the Duke of Britaine, ruled every one Spectabilis.

The Erie Lieutenant of Britaine fermeth to have ruled the Inland parts of the land; who had with him seven companies of footmen, and nine companies or troops of horse.

The Earle Lieutenant of the Saxon coast, who defended the Maritime parts against the Saxons, and was named by Antiquaries Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coast, had seven companies of footmen, two Guidons of horsemen, the second legion, and one cohort.

The Duke of Cornwall, who defended the Marches against the Barbarians, had the command of thirty and eight garrison forts, wherein their Stations kept, consisting of fourteen thousand foot, & nine hundred horse.

So that in those daies (by Pausanias account) Britaine maintained more thane threescore and two hundred footemen, and five hundred horsemen, as thereabout in ordinary. Besides whiche, the reuerend the Emperors TIMARUS or TIMARCHUS: the Prætor of the Emperors Treasures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Drapery in Britaine, in the which the clothes of the Prince and Scoulders were Vpon: and the Count alfo of private countreies had by Ratiouall or Auditor of private State in Britaine: to lay nothing of the sword-greene [School Procurator in Britaine: whereof an old inscription maketh mention] and of other officers of inferior degree.

(12) After the settling of these Affairs, to the end that he might with the more facility bring the untamed Persians that he found were in quire, he removed the Imperial Seat of his Residence into the East, for now Gallathea and Lutetia both dead, the rent and divided State of the Roman Empire was in him united: and purposing to build there a City, as an eternal Monument of his name, he chose the plot at Chalcedon in Asia; but whilst they were measuring out the circuit, an Eagle swooping at the Line, led with it over the Sea towards Byzantium in Thracia, to which place (the thing seeming ominous) he transferred his new foundation, and there built a most Magnificent City, naming it New Rome: as appears by an inscription of Fifth stature. In imitation whereof the Circled Selen sits with a Wall for Heigh, Thicknesse, and Beauty, the fairest in the world; and not only erected Temples, Towers, and most lofty Palaces himself, but by his publick Edicts, commanded all the Princes of the Empire to raise therein some Monuments & memorable Edifices, becoming the Martyrs of glorious foundations.

(13) Hither also from Rome he came to be brought many renowned Monuments of Antiquities, as the famous Goddeſſe Pallas of old Troy; the Image of Apollo in braſſe of an vncumbrable beauty; the Statues of Juſus, Minerva, Venus, and the like : whereupon Myrmene ſaith : That Conſtantine to enrich this one Citie, impriſoned all others in the Empire : and other Writers which ſaw it in the perfection of beauty report it to be rather an habitation for the Gods, than the dwelling place for Earthly men. Herein alſo (ſo Rudious was he of good Arts) was built the Princel Palace of that Publick Library, wherein were contained one hundred twenty thouſand of the choicest Writers Books, and in the midst thereof were the Gates of a Dragon, in length one hundred twenty Foote, on which was admirably written in Letters of Gold, the Poſts of Homer. The New Name of this new Citie laſted not long, for the affection of all men to the Founder, afforded it rather the name of Conſtantinople. As a prophecy then of this Emperours tenure, though now a brand of infamy to another of that name, who loſt it in the yeere 1452. to Mahomet the Turke : and as New Rome was reared and ruined in one ſame ſod, ſo Old Rome in Auſonia her patch of height, and in Auſonia her bed of pitch.

(14) He drew likewise hither those Legions that lay for defence of the Provincers, as well in Germany and Gallie, as in Brittaine: from whence hee broughte (saith Adamesbury) a great power of British Souldiers, through whose industry and forward service, having obtained Tri- nephews Villi ories to his hearty desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were pious service, and had performed the pious part of Soldiers their fulltime, he planted in certain part of Gaulle Wigward, the popery very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posterity remaining, are wonderfully given ears to a mighty people, in manners and language former that degenerate from our Britains. In which his doings, he laid open the Procurator to the irruption of their Emperors: and is therefore by Zefum hardly censured, as being the only man that by this means first liboured the flourishing estate of the Empire. And indeed, by withdrawing his Forces out of Britaine, the Poets and other their wonted Emmoes had the bolder and easier entrance into the more chiall parts of this Island: whereby ere long, being altogether abandoned of the Romans, it became a prey of Cannibals to the Scythians: as shall be shewed in due place.

(13) But Emperour his policie failed (carried) as it is seemeth) by a Divine inspiration to leave Rome; yet is this good Emperour much commended by all Writers for his many vertues, especially for that hee laid the foundation of the Christian securitie, that the same bold vnder the protection of Princes ever since, euen vnto this day. And albeit that many Casars his successors, haue often attempted to shake it by their authorities, and the tharpe instruments of hereticks dangerously haue vndermined it, yet hath it borne out the Stormes of all their boisterous affaires, and stood in the strength that this Emperour first laid it.

(16) And upon this foundation, that a glorious building might be raised, hee congregated three hundred and eighteen Christian Bishops in the Citie Nice in Thracia, where himself was present, and also President of the same Council (though now his Bradrinne (the Pope) put him & his Successors from that right) and as another Moses, he then pacified the contentions of the brethren, and reestablished the authorities of the Bishops for the godly government of the Church in that Primitive age.

(17) But as the clearest Sunne hath his set, and the fairest day his night, so Constantines glorious life drew to an end, though his living glory shall be endless: attending a voyage against the Perſians, he fell grievously sicke, and was called by his Physicians to be carried vnto Nicomede, a Citie in Byzonia, to the Hots Bathes that naturally there spring (which caused some erroneously to write that he became a Leper) he died on the way neere to the place, and in great deuotion commended his departing Soule to his Crucified Redeemer, May 22. the yeere of Christ Iesus three hundred thirty leane, and of his happy victorious reigne thirty one, and of his age sixty five; whose body was interred at Constantinople, in the Church of the Apoſtles that hath since had therein founded.

(18) Esau in writing this good Emperors life Jaish, that he deffered his Rapine vntill his old age, in declare that he might receiue it in terdwane, where our Sauiour him selfe was baptiz'd. Yet others thinke that he was baptiz'd with his San Cristos, what time he created him his Caesar: for the Celebration whereof, he caufed a most impudens Fest to be made in Rome, which Plinius & Sabelius affirme to haue continued to their times. And the ingenuity of the same Sabelius is much to be approued, in that speaking of Censextians Denial, which some fo much vaunt of (though the vank of that forgery is now laid open to the view of all by sundry learned men) he acknowledgeth (himselfe being a Romanist) that he findeth no mention of any such matter, in any of the ancient Records which he followed, and so leaue it to the Patronage of those Craft-men, out of whose forgery it first was formed. He left to succeed him in the Em-per as Angustis, (with dilasse of the eiden) his three Sonnes, Constantine, Cen Constantine, and Constantine, whom before he had made Caesar, & designed by Teitelmast, Delmatius the son of Amiballmar, (his brother) Caesar;
 and therefore we haue infered him moyn in ranke of those that succeeded this great & glorious Emper

A Council lagued the Anti-christ called by Constantine.

FOR the Empire being divided among these Brothers, Constantinus the eldest, whole portion was Britaine, France, Spain, and part of Germany, took himself wronged in this partition; whereas Con-stantinus his second brother had Italy, Africa, Sclava-nia, Dalmatia, and Greece; and Constantinus the youngest possessed Thracia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, Provinces much greater in his sight, than his owne seemed to bee; and therefore at last ambitiously hee attempted to enlarge his vpon the Frontiers of his brother Constantinus, at that time in Dacia, and in warres against the Goths, who there also invaded his territories, but was met with and slain by a Captaine of his brothers, neere to the Cinc Agula in Italie, when he had held his Seigniorie the terme of thre yeeres.

(2) Hieronimus Constantinus grew exceedingly proud, and setting his deceased brothers Provinces, joined them vnto his owne Possessions, and with his brother Constantinus came into this Island. This Battle, and their annual heere, by the words of Iohu Firmus, changed in the winter season: for (saith hee, speaking to these Emperors) you have subdued vnder your Oares the furthest and raging waves of the British Ocean, run in the deepe of Winter: a thing which never seene before.
And the Britains were sore afraid to behold the vnexpected face of their Emperour. This Constantinus was he that called a Councell to Sardes against the Arians, whither were assembled three hundred Bishops, and among them, some of the British, as formerly we haue mentioned. But this Prince being youthfull, cast away all care of the Empire; and drowned in his owne pleasures, followed all counsell, (the vntill way to Princes ruines.) Thus growne greivous to the Provinces, and nothing acceptable to the Souldiers, was by Magnentius a Captaine of his owne saine, as hee was hunting neere the Castle of S. Helens, situate amongst the Tapers, a Spanish people vnder the Pyren Mountains. And as hence this Murderer of his Soveraigne, Lord and Master, was branded with the name of Traitor, so in this Emperour there murdered was fulfilled

a Prophecie that hee should die in his Grandmothers Lappe.

Olympas the Widow of this Constantinus was giuen to Asparius King of Armenia, by Constantinus his brother, to be a bond and purchase of his sister friendship, of which his need was much, as the times required: for after the death of Constantinus, Vetranus was proclaimed Emperour by the Pannonian Armie, though shortly disrobed, and sent to end his decrepit age in a private fortune. Neposianus the nephew of Constantinus by his sister Eutropia, was at Rome by the abiekt Raul saluted Augustus, which he envied not much above twentie
daies, being suppressed by Magnentius, who had now made the trunkes of Marius, his Soveraignes bodie, the Staffe, whereby he meant with Diocletian and Dy-clianus, his two brethren, to ascend the Throne.

(3) Simon Daniellus saith, that Great Constanti-nus at his departure from Britaine, left one Ollianus to gouerne the Land, who shortly rebelled, and after diuers conflicts was slain by Treverius, Commander of a Roman Legion. Galsfridus makes the said Ollianus a Britaine, and will haue him to raigne with great victories ouer this Island the space of fifty foure yeeres, which (as Fabian hath accounted) doth extend to the time of Valentinianus Rule in Rome: so farre doe our British Historians differ from the Romans. But from them most certaine it is, that Magnentius before mentioned, a Britaine by his father, though borne among the Latins in France, inuaded himselfe into the Imperiall Dignitie, usurping France, Spain, and Britaine, thus flamming the face of himselfe and his brother Decentius, by him made Caesar at Milan, vpon the current Monies of such reuoluted Provinces as he vsurped.

A Council in favour of the Arians assembled by Constantius.

Election he meant to disavow : and Julian for his part resolved in point of honor to maintain and uphold. Whereupon warres prepared. Constantius set forward to encounter him, and coming to Tarsum, from Antioch in Syria, fell there like of a fever, which still increased as he further travelled, and in the borders of Cilicia, at the place called Mopsus Wells, situated at the foot of Mount Ararat, died the third day of November, the yeere of Christ by Jeromes account, three hundred sixtie foure : by others, three hundred sixtie one, when hee had ruled twenty foure yeeres, and lined foure and a few moneths, as Amianus Marcellinus, and Pomp. Latins affirme. But Socratus and Zosimus say, that he lived forty five yeeres, and reigned thirte eight, that is, thirteen a Caesar, in the life of his Father, seern a Competitor in the lines of his brethren, and seuerenteen yeeres Emperer alone.

Hee is neither accounted with the best, nor worst Emperers, his Virtues seeming to hold scale with his Vices : temperate, courteous, liberrall, and affable, not eloquent, yet desirous to speake well, blunt witted, yet a great fauor of learning, a most skilfull Archer, and apt to take paines, but withall very suspicious, led by Flatterers, and most cruell to the accused, and in exacting importable Tributes, drew more hatred vpon his head then money into his coffers. But especially is he stained with the heresie of the Arians, for whose sake he banished many of the Christians, and amongst them Athenagoras, that excellent light of the Catholike Church. In fauour of those Heretikes, he caused to be summoned foure hundred western Bishops vnto the Council of Arminum, whereof three are reported to come out of Brittaine. And he is by Amianus his Life-writer, condemned for mingling feign'd superstitions, with the sincere doctrine of the Christian Religion, giuen rather to a more intricate search therein, then to settle his opinions vpon grauities : and stirring up seditions and disorders in maintaining of words and contentious disputations, which as they spread more and more, gat wing euen vnto this Island of Brittaine, as by the words of our lamenting Historian Cyprian is seene. When (saith he) the sweetest consent of Christ the head, and his members the body had continued until such time, as that deadly and pernicious Arianisme, like to a pestiferous Serpent from the other side of the Sea, casting vp her venom open vs, caused brethren dwelling together, to be deformed piteously one from another. And thus the way as it were being made over the Ocean, all other cruell and fell Beasts wherefoere, flaking out of their horrible mouths the deadly poison of enuy bersege inflicted the deadly sting and wounds of their teeth vpon this our Country, desirous earnest to heere some nauelie.

(1) For personage, this Emperer was indifferently tall, his complexion browne, the cast of his eyes losie, his sight quicke, his haire soft, his cheekes alwaies shauen, from the grafting of his necke to the groine very long, but from thence somewhat short and bow-legged withall. His body after death was embalmed, and in Constantinople entered nere vnto his Father, at the commendement of Julian, whom by his testament (for all his former displeasure) hee declared his Heir and Successor.

He doth callow down the Bishopps of the Provinces of Brittain in an Epistle vnto the Bishopps.

FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS IV- LIANVS EMPEROR APOSTATA

CHAPTER XLVIII

Julian succeeded, whose birth had as much of Nobilitie as either the greatness of place ; (for it was New Rome) ; or the high blood of parentage could adde vnto him, for his Father Constantius, was the brother of great Constantine, and not much his mother

Rafina was lower in her birth, though most vnfourunate in bearing him, her owne destruction. An Orphan he was left together with Gallus his brother, long tossed betweene the sources of his owne imperfect constitution, and the cloudy iealousie of his ruling-kinsmen (not long before the fatal ruine of his Father) for being too nere allied to their Crownes.

Meane he was of stature, yet carrying from head to foote a iust proportion and vni forme knitting of his lineaments, whereby he had agilite and strength : big and broad his shoulders, his necke fat, bearing his head forward; lonely and gracefull was the cast of his quicke and cleere eye, straight his nose, and no feature of his face amisse, but the greatnes of his mouth, and the parting of his nether lippe, the soft haire of his head he wore in a decent length, and his rough beard he cut in a pointed fashion.

(2) His education was vnder many masters, of which Mardonius a Syrian Eunuch was the first. From him he was sent to the publike Schoole at Constantinople, where of Nicetius of Laodicea, he learned his Grammar, and of Eusebius the Sophister his Rhetorick; and of both of them (as of Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia) the Christian Religion, in which his delight was such, that he betooke him to the function of a Deacon, reading in public to the people the sacred Bookes, and aimed at no further mark of greatness than the reprobation of a holy man: led on with the love of knowledge, hee went to the Schooles of Nicomedia, where, of Lambertus, who succeeded Porphyrus in the Chaire, he learned the Philosophie of Aristotle and Plato. There bewitched at length with the fame of Liberius Eloquence, though detesting his religion, from reading in private studie his prophane labours, hee grew a publick hearer of his inuestive Lectures: and imitating at first in exercise of wit only this Rhetoricians forme of declaiming, hee grew in the end the profane Railler, and deadliest Enemy of all other himselfe against the Church. And to fill vp this vessel of iniquity, Ataxius, the only Imperator and Magician then of the world, (worthily after for his impious doctrine put by Valentinian to the sword) mult come to Nicomedia. From him did Iulian learne such Astrologie as foretold Natiuities, and such Magick as inuoketh Spirits. And here was the schoole of this mans Error, and Mistis of his impietie. The feedes of whole Nature and Education hazing thus obscured, let vs search with an impartial Eye into his manners and condition, and see what vertue was in fruit.

His temperance.
Marcell. lib. 3.
de Iuliano Iulian.

(1) His temperance is commended to vs with admiration. He slept little, and could awake at pleasure: his bed was curd with the hardest, and his diet the meanest meat, and the moderate measure, whereby he neuer but once, and that by accident, durbarded his stomach by vomit, and would often say, that it was the fatetie of his life, that he neuer had any war with his belly. Such was his chastitie, that hauing lost at once in Francia, Helena his beloved wife, and her infant, his only Sonne, he neuer so much as in suspect, had an incontinent desire. And therefore of all the Persian beauties taken in those warres, as the richest spoiles, Nee contrahere aliquam uoluit nec uidere: Neither suffer in his Army either Cookes or Barbers, as being delictum in armis, inter imperatores meminit.

Arces mepsum & Theatru: I force my selfe (saith he) from the view of Stage-places, and neuer but once a yeere permit my Eye that delight in Court; wherein the delecter of my mind is, tanquam pauper agricolae tributum aliquod pendens inque Domini. And when the action was performing, familiar sum detestanti oculis ludis quim spectanti. Yet doth Marcellinus tax him of much verborosie and affectation of vaine glory. And Gregory Nazianzen charging him with intemperate passion as vnconfortably, Iust: But by his ranging and furious affect, his vnsteady and halting pace, his fleeing leaue, and immoderate laughter, I demer ante opera uidi qualem in operibus cognoui.

His Justice.
Marcellinus, lib. 3.

(4) The loue of Justice in this Prince is remembered to vs in his rules of DIRECTION: for he so amended the Lawes Ambagibus circumcissis, that the Iudges might clearly fee, Quid iuberet fieri quid octarent: and in his EXAMPLE for imitation. For when to an innocent denial before him, Delphidius the Oratione inuighed saying; Necesse est patitur quoniam innocentis suffocari: himselfe replied, Et qui innocentis esse potest non esse possit? and so discharged the party. As for his clemency and charity, which ought to attend the sword and Scepter of a Soueraigne, since the one is Magnanimitas remedium, and the other will be post concres tributum; Nebriodius and Lucilianus are Regiments of the one, whom notwithstanding their conspiracies in fauour of Constantinus, hee not onely pardoned, but defended with perill of his owne person from the furies of his owne followers. And for the other, those his letters to Arcadius is a sure record, Let there bee in the Cities of your charge, many Hospitalia erecta: that the want of the vnsuffring may be releued by our benignitie: and not of them only of our Religion, but of all the right: for it fautes not well with the goodnes of our Government, that when the Ieros permit none of theirs to beg, and the wretched Galileians releue not only theirs, but ours, that ours should be the dispensation of other helpe.

Some haue blemished his bounty with the brand of vainglory: thus did the Antiochians for deepening so much the reasonable price of Graine in their Markets, by a profuse expence of his owne Treasure, gaining thereby at first onely the applaude of the light multitude, after which he hunted, and drawing on in the end a miserable dearth, through the licentious exerceise of their improvidence: which often happeneth.

And as the banishment of Palladius into Britaine vpon a weak suspicion, Taurus to Parcedum, in whom the eye of Justice could finde no skarre; and to death Vrsulus, with Figulus (the first his Treasure, that had spent with him and on him his owne meanes, when being Cesar, he had little of his owne: the other the guide of his youth, and to whom he truly ought the greatest part of his goodnesse) may iustly blame him with lawlesse severity, and vngratefull cruelty: so may his malicious spirit against the Christianians, howeouer masking in more Art than many that went before him, set him vp in the ranke and top of the greatest Persecutor. And although there be some passages in his Government more calie then in some others that may imply a gentle disposition toward them, (Sometimes taking the Gods to witness, that the Galileians (for so he named the Christianians) should not vndergoe the least of injury, neither be led to Pagan sacrifice, or forced to any thing beyond the compasse of their owne consciences: and that he not onely revoked the Edict of Constantine the Atrian Emperour, whereby those holy men stood long exiled: but taking the advantage of an vproare begun by the Atrians (their Enemies) at Edissa seized vpon their goods, twolue too great in number and fortune by the graciouse aspect of his Predecessors, to whom hee dissembled himselfe a Christian: yet did he while he had in his owne hands the reime of Government, by all his actions and ends, declare himselfe an heauy opposit vnto them. Sometimes by alurements to assy to corrupt them; sometimes by a subtil siding with one faction of the Church, as he did with the Catholicke against the Atrians, to counterpeise their power, sed secum regnaret, that by such licence of sedition, Nos timere vnum tantum phobem, he need not feare the power of their vnite, as himselfe professed.

From this vnfortunate plot of earthly policie (but with worse success) he minded the Ieros to redifie the Temple at Ierusalem, and renew their Sacrifice, permitting to them their debt of Tribute, and vowing that at his returne from Persia he would visit that holy Citie, and (as he faith to them) of uoluntatem in re Deo optime gratias agam: well beleueing that by raising such an opposit to the Christianians, he should suppress their increase, and annihilate their Prophecie of Ierusalem desolation. To repaire these cursed wallies against the prouidence of Diuine Iustitie, Alipius of Antioch, that had bene Governour of Britaine, was sent: but his indeuour, and the worke of all his Ministers, was interrupted by fearefull flaming ballies of fire, which issued from the Earth nere vnto those foundations, consuming very many of the Ieros and workemen; by reason whereof, this Element still giuing fresh assault on them, the place became vnaccessible, and the enterprise giuen ouer: so vaine it is for Man to strive against the decreed purpose of God. And it is by others affirmed, that at the same time can Earthquake to shooke those Foundations which were left by Titus vntouched, that one stone thereby was not left standing vpon another, but were all laid leuell with the ground: by which miraculous fights many Ieros were turned to the embracing of the Christian Earth, vpon whose garments fell formes of Croesse, which shined as the beames of the Sonne, neither could they by any meanes be washed or wiped away. Alipius that had bene chiefe in this business, was afterward confined into Banishment, with the losse of his goods, by Valens vpon suspicion of Treason. And thus farre of Iulians vailed harred: now of his open actions of despiight against the Christianians.

to affect the Empire, and restore the State. As touching his election, he calleth the Gods to witness his unwillingness, and the publick protestation he made against it at Paris, when he was there by the tumultuous Arme called Adulphus. And although by the great promotion made by him of Corne from Britannie, to hold a foot the Arme against the plot of Constantius (that grew now envious of his fortune, hee may seeme to have intended the ruine of his Sovereigntie) yett doo hee by the Gods of his great confidence, lupiter and the Sonne, protect. Quod Constantinus occidere nunquam optavit, nisi ne id accidere contemnit.

(7) But Constantine ending this quarrell and competition by his death, Iulian, whom a Priest had deduced with the hope of Peris, telling him that his fortunes should be like his fathers, like Great Alexander, desired in him a thirde desire after the surname Perseus: whereupon hee prepared an Arme for this expedition, and seeking the favour of his Gods the Moon, Fortune, and Mars, embred their Altars with the blood of an hundred Bulls at once, though manie ominous signes, as they were interpreted by his Philosophers and Soothsayers, forbade the same. Such was the great Earthquake happening in Bithynie, that swallowed up the Citie of Nicomedia. Rivers likewise are said to stand drie, even in the heart of winter; and Springs forgetting their usuall boilings, yielded not forth their wonted waters: yea and if wee will beleieve the reporters, his successe was foretold by the departure of an Angell, and by a Meteor gliding in the Aire. All which hee sought to prevent, by pacifying his Heavenly Gods with multitudes of Sacrifices: and with an Arme extended ten miles in length, entered Peris, cutting asunder the Bridges by which hee passed over his men, to adde to them more of resolution, as their meanes were lesse of returne, refusing all humble submission and composition offered him by their King: and at the place then called Phrygia, joined Battle against Surrena, a great Commander among the Persians, and Mertres, General of their Hosts, accompanied with two of the Kings sonnes, whose powers not able to resist the Romans, gave backe and fledde.

Iulian either vpon a vaine confidence, or sudden Alarm, had forgot to arme himselfe with his Corslet or Brigandine; and in following the disarmed flight of the Persians, lift vp his hands in signe of victorie: at which very instant a Javelin brucke throw his left Arme into the floure Ribbet, and brucke in the nether lapet of his Liner; which whilst hee endeavoured to plucke out, did cut the finewes of his fingers: whereat altogether distracted, hee fell forwards vpon his horses maine, and thence was carried vnto his Familiam. From whose hand this Javelin came (saith Amianus) God only knoweth. Some report the Caiser to have bene a Justine Persian: others say that from the hand of one of his owne Souldiers it proceeded: and Calpurnius one of his owne Guard, that wrote this Battle in Hericall Persie, affirmeth, that by some wicked Fierd or Duvel, this Javelin run him thorow. Howsoever, there are that report that in pulling out this Liner, and casting it into the aire with his blood, hee should utter this blasphemous speech, and say, I am baptizme me, O Gilean. At his setting forth he vowed to his Gods a Sacrifice of Christians if hee returned Conquerour, but he performed it with his owne. His flaine Corpes was carried to Tarsus a Citty in Cilicia, where with small pompe of Funeral Obsequies it was interred neere to the Citty side, which place himselfe for that purpose had formerly assigned: although Nazianzen affirmeth the earth to have opened, and in a flame of Sulphur to have sucked vp his body into her Wombe.

(8) Thus ended this Emperour, the twenty sixth of Iune, in the two and thirthe yeere of his age, and three hundred sixty and three of Christis Nativity, when he had reigned Angustius neere three, and Cesar full seven yeeres. Whole wit and eloquence needs no further testimonie then the Monuments of his owne Pen; nor his religious zeale more then the Function his youth so worthily performed in the Christian Church. His Imperiall Vertues we see match him in florid with Titus, in moderation with Aurelian, and for successe in warre, with Traian; three of the most excellent Princes; and his fortune was to see bounded within his sole greatnesse, what the hand of right and sword of tyrannie had loosed dispersed. But now one Error, his Apostasy, disrobing him of all his Morall Vertues, leaves him an obiect naked to the vulgarie, but as a Monster of men, and marke of infamie. I hold it therefore fitting no lesse the vs, then the iustice of a Story, to doe him (as I haue done) all his right: since in him we lesse that all those admirable endowments of Nature, embellished with all the morall and internall graces that Art could adde, are not the base of holinesse, without diuine grace; nor dalliance of Fortune, and fulnesse of Empire (that made this man wanton and forgetfull) is the center of security and happinesse, without heavenly protection: since from the seate of Sacred Pietie hee fell to Pagan Superstition: for many are called, but few are chosen; and in the feat of Presumptuous Marius hee felt the rod of Diuine Revenge.

Fla. Iovianus, Emp.

An. Do. 364.

He mindes of the whole Army being much distracted by the death of Iulian, the next day, being but twenty seven, they met, and consulted vpon a new Emperour: where for a while two factions were maintained, & with equal deserts argued, till

lastly in one accord they both agree vpon Salustian, a man very honourable and wise, but withall aged and weakke, and therefore hee absolutely refused the election. Iovianus by them then was nominated, in regard of his fathers desire indifferently commended, saith Amianus: but Eusebius, Theodoret, and Socrates attribute great worths vnto himselfe, and confidently affirme his unwillingnesse to accept of that dignitie, for that the whole Arme had yielded to Iulians Idolatrous Edicts, openly professing himselfe to be a Christian, and withall protesting that he would not be a Sacerdote ouer an Ethiopicke Empire, vntill by the instance of the Souldiers, which declared themselves likewise to be Christians, he did accept of the same.

Iouianus his Personage.

(2) His Father was Varrenianus, by birth an Hongarian, a Captaine of good note, who not long before had laid downe his charge of warre, and retired into his Country, to a more quiet course of life. Himselfe serued Julian the Apollata in his Campe, from whence he departed by vertue of his Edict, commanding all Christians out of his pay, among whom Iouianus (as wee haue said) chose rather to cast from him his Sword and Giraffe, (marks of honour to Military Professors) then to forsake the Ensigne of his Heauenly Chiefeaine, and the Badge of his Christian Profession.

(3) No sooner was he clad in the Purple Robe, but one Iouianus (a Roman Emperour, lately at variance with this new Elected Emperour, then a private man) fearing the danger of so powerfull an Enemie stepped now about the degree of the common sort, resorted to the Perfians, and hauing good access, informed King Sapor of the death of Julian, (to them till then vnkowne) and disabling Iouianus for an Unskilfull and Effeminate Captaine, both encouraged the Enemie; and gaue directions how to take the advantage. The Perfians as ready to execute as ioyous to heare, set forward his forces, his Elephants leading the way, whose terrible brayings and fearefull approach much affrighted the Roman Souldiers. Afore battell was fought, and fountaines of blood drawne from the sides of both parts: wherein, with an infinite number of Perfians, Iulianus, Mercelins, and Maximus, three Roman Tribunes, of thofe Legions that then were the Principall of the whole Army, were slaine: in regard whereof, and especially for want of Vittuall, (whose cariage then was such, that for one Pecke of Meale, ten peeces of Gold were given) Iouianus made Peace with the Perfians for thirty yeeres, gining them five Provinces beyond Tigris, some Cities and Fortins in Mesopotamia, whereof Nisibis is named for one that had been the very sinewes and strength of the Confines, ever since the Warres of Mithridates: for which his doings, he is taxed by Eutropius and Amianus (who both liued in his daies) and of most the deed is held very dishonourable to the greatnesse of the Roman Empire: howbeit diuers others excuse him very iustly, considering the extreme misery and famine where Julianus left the Army, which was in apparant hazard to be giuen ouer for a pray to the Enemy, to the endangering of the whole Empire, had it not been thus preuented: and therefore they highly commend him herein, as the onely Preseruer of the Roman Army.

(4) Howsoeuer, he is highly commended by Socrates, (the continuor of Eusebius his History) who flourished about Twelve hundred yeeres since; for his constant faith grounded vpon the Niuen Creed, and for his Learning Reuerence to the Christian Bishops, recalling from banishment thofe that Constantine and Julian had exiled; among whom, Athenasius of Alexandria was one: putting downe the Idolatrous Temples of the Gentiles, and restoring to their Officers both in Court and Campe, thofe who for their Conscience had been expelled.

(5) At his departure from Persia, hee visited the Citie Tarsus, where he caused the Sepulchre of Julian (though otherwise he had found him merke both in Affection and Religion, yet for that hee was his preceeding Emperour) to be richly adorned: and taking Antich in his way for many daies together was troubled with some accidents, which that age did take for Ominous signes. For the Statue of Maximianus Cæsar, standing at the entrance into the Kings Palace, fell off the Ball or Globe out of his hand, no force mouing it: horrible sounds and noises were heard within the Consistory: and Blazing-starrs appeared at Noone-day.

Thence therefore in great haste he marched, and at Ancrea, declared his sonne Varrenianus his Cæsar, a verie Infant, whose Wrappings and unwilllingnesse to ride in the Imperiall Chariot, portended (saith Amianus) that which after happened. For halting still towards Constantinople, he came to Dadastana, a place that diuidenth Bithynia and Galatia asunder, and there died suddenly of the obstructions and stopping of the Lungs, caused by the damp of a new mortered Chamber wherein he lay; or (as others write) by coales there set to dry the new feeling, whose vapors haning no issue, stifled him to death, the thirteenth day of February, the yeere of the worlds redemption, three hundred sixtie foure; after hee had reigned seuen moneths, and twenty two daies, aged thirty three yeeres.

(6) For his personage, he was of goodly presence, both tall and big, his gesture graue, his eyes gray, and countenance pious: an affectionate brother & professor he was of the Christian religion, of indifferet learning himselfe, but a most honorable imbracer thereof in others, very precise and considerate in chooling of Judges and Magistrates; facile and familiar to his seruitors about him. His Blowes were these, that hee was a great feeder, and giuen to wine; and somewhat to that other Vice which usually accompanieth such intemperancies.

Valentinianus & Christianus.

Theodore.

Recently vpon the death of Iulianus, by a secret whispering and running rumor, Eugenius, Tribune of the Senatus, was nominated Emperor, a man naturally rigorous, and rude; and therefore disliked of the better advised, and no further followed. But frō him, their voices turned to Iulianus, a kinsman to the last deceased Iulianus, at that present Governor of Africum. But he also reiected, Valentinianus, then absent, was Elected at Nice, as a fit and meet person for the managing of their Warres, and good of the Wede-publike.

(2) His birth was of Pannonia, in the Circus Celsus, of meane and poore parentage; the sonne of Gracian (spoken of before, who by trade was a Rape-seller, but of great strength; and therefore by sence preferred to places of account, and had been made Ruler of Britaine. His owne life likewise was spent in service of Warre, and was ere-while a Captaine over the Targathens; but Iulian requiring him either to Sacrifice to his Gods, or to leave his place; he chose rather to lay aside his Belt then his Faith and Christianitie, as likewise Iulianus had done; and so for neglecting a litle honour then, he had now a farre greater bestowed on him by the disposer of all Earthly Kingdomes. The Estate so vrging it, he made Valens (his Brother) Partner in the Empire, the trumpets every where sounding warres throughout the Roman World. For the Almans invaded Gaul and Rhetia, the Sarmatians and Quadi made spoile of Pannonia: the Picts, Saxons, Sents, and Attacens infested the Britaines: the Austrians made roades into Africa: the Goths ranfackd Thracia, and the Persians entered Armenia. For which cause, Valens remained to defend the East, and Valentinianus tooke his progresse into the West, where in three Battles vnder the conduct of Iulianus, hee discomfited the Almans: and Valens likewise ouercame and beheaded Proce-

pins; whose feature we haue here expressed, a dangerous surper in the East.

(1) But in Britaine things prospered not so well: for by the generall bandings of the forlaid Nations, their old Enemies, the Franks was fore distressed and brought to extreme misery. For Nestorius, Admiral of the British Fleet they flew, and Belisander, Lord Warden of the Marches, by a traine of these barbarous people, was forelaid & assailed on every side. The intelligence of which occurrences, when it was brought to Rome with great horror, the Emperour first sent hither Securus, Steward of his House, if fortune would happily speed his hand, to redresse whatsoever had happened amisse. But he in short time being called away, had not the hap to see the wished successe. Then Iunius, famous for his Warres in Germany, came into the same parts; and feeling the puissance of the Enemy, meant to cruse aid of the Auxiliary Forces, the vrgent necessitie requiring so much: at last, in regard of many (and those fearefull) accidents, which rumor continually reported, reaching the state of this land, hither was designed Theodosius, a man esteemed most happy, and approved for his Martial prowess, who with a bold resolution and select power both of East and West, set forward for Britaine.

(4) The Picts at that time were diuided into two Nations, to wit, Deuadidones and Pesturians. The Attacens likewise a warlike kinde of people, and the Sents ranging in diuers parts, waited all where they went.

went, As for the Traffs of Gauls, the Frankers and Saxons their neere confined neighbours, whereſoeuer they could brake forth, and make Roads by Sea or Land, made hauocke heere by ſeizing of Barkes, ſiring of Towers, in killing of men and women, and leading away Captiues. To Ray theſe woſull miſeries, if the Meaneſ had bene ſo benigne, this valiant Captaine intended a voyage to this our end of the World : and coming to Bononia, which lieth diuided from the oppoſite tract of Land by a narrow Channell ebbing and flowing with terrible Tides, where the waters are ſcene ſometimes to match the height Mountain, and ſome to ſtride with the ſuell of the Plaines, without any harme of Sailers or Paſſage : this Slew with a gentle courſe hee croſſed, and arrived at Antipie, a quiet Road and Harbour our againſt it: from whence alſter that the Balkanians, the Herau Jony and Vllores (Companies bold and confident in their ſtrengths) were come, he marched towards Laudinium, an ancient Citie, which poſſeſſities afterwards named Anguſta: and hauing ſeuered his Troopes into ſundry parts; he charged vpon thoſe companies of roning and robbing enemies, even when they were heauie laden with Barkes and ſpoils, and were driving away before them both Aſen and Women bound for their Captiues; beſides much Cattle, and a great Prey. Theſe hee ſoon diſcomfited, and reſtored to the poore diſtreſſed Tributaries their Liberties and Liſſes, beſtowing ſome ſmall parcels thereof among his weary and well-deſerving Souldiers; and entered the City with exceeding great ioy, in manner of a Petty-triumphe, which ere-while was ouerwhelmed with Calamities, but now on the ſudden reſtored and ſet in perfect ſafety.

(1) Vpon this proſperous ſucceſſe encouraged to greater attempts, hee abode yet doubtfull of the future, ending with himſelfe many projects, which poſſed Fortunes Scales alike: but laſtly by certain Captiues and Fugitiues hee learned that thoſe Companies of ſundry fierce Nations, ſpread ſo farre and diſſeuidly vpon the face of the Prouince, could not be vanquiſhed, unleſſe it were by ſleights and Stratagemes. By Edicts therefore hee firſt proclaimed impunitie to ſuch as had forſaken their Celerys; if they would returne, whereby many which had run to the Enemie, or at their owne pleaſures had bene diſperſed into diuers parts, came in, and by their countenance declared their reſolutions in his behalf. Notwithſtanding, miſtruſting the euent, and penſiue ſtill with cares, hee thought good to call to his aſſiſtance Chauls, a man of great vnderſtanding, quick ſpirit, and withall an vpright Iuſticer, who was to rule Britaine as Deputie, and likewise Dalcitus a Captaine, renowned for his ſkill and deedes of Armes.

(7) Now there happened whiles hee attended theſe exploits, a dangerous matter likely to haue broken out into great miſchiefe, had it not bene quenched in the very beginning of the enterpriſe: for one Valentinus of Valeria Patronia, a man of a proud ſpirit, firſt Deputy Lieutenant and alſer preſident, for ſome notable offence baniſhed into Britaine, as Frontinus immediately before had bene, as one impatient of

reſt, like ſome noiſome wilde Beaſt, vpon a certaine ſwelling pride, roſe vp in commotion againſt Theodoſius, whom hee perceived to be the only man able to withſtand his wicked deſignes. Howbeit, calling about many waies, both cloſely and apparently, as the gale of his vnmearurable deſire roſe higher, hee ſolicited as well the baniſhed perſons as Souldiers, promiſing (as the time would alſoſordly) rewards to allure and draw them on to ſome aſſaill attempt. Yet when the day came wherein it ſhould haue bene effected, Theodoſius hauing intelligence thereof, ſurprized Valentinus with ſome few of inward complices, and deliuered them vnto Dalcitus, to be put to death accordingly. But in his militaie ſkill and policie, (wherein hee was reputed to haue exceeded all men liuing in thoſe daies) getting at ſuture dangers, hee inhibited all Inquiſitions to be made touching the reſt of the Conſpirators, left to generally a feare ſurprizing at once, and ſpread abroad among many thoſe trempetuous troubles of the Prouinces, which were now well allaid, ſhould reuiue againe.

(8) Therefore turning himſelfe from this buſineſſe to the reforming of ſuch enormities as were of moſt conſequence, now that all dangers were quite ouer-blowne, hee reſtored the Cities, repaired the Gariſon Caſles, and fortified the Frontiers with ſtanding Watches, and ſtrong Fortreſſes. And thus hauing recovered the Prouince againe which had yielded ſubiection to the Enemies, hee reduced it vnto the priſtine ſtate, ſo as by his meanes and motion hee had againe a lawfull Governour appointed, and alſo named it VALENTIA, in honour of Valentinianus the Emperor.

(9) The Arcanes, a kinde of men (as witneſſeth Amaſius) inſtituted by thoſe of ancient times for politike implements, who by little and little were fallen into diſorders and vices, hee remoued from their Sitians, as being manifeſtly conſiſtred, for that (induced with the greatneſſe of rewards receiued or promiſed) they had diſſepts times diſcovered vnto the Barbarous whatſoeuer was done or debated betwixt the Preſident and his Counſell: for indeed their charge was to runne to and fro by long iournies, to intimate and make knowne vnto the Romane Captiues vpon the Marches, what doings and ſtirres were among the Neighbour Nations; whereby they had great opportunities both to know and reueale the ſecrets of the State.

(10) And thus Theodoſius hauing managed moſt excellently theſe affaires, was lent for to the Emperours Court: who leauing the Prouince ouer-ioied for their Peace, was no leſſe famous for his many important Viſceres, then was either Varus Cornelius, or Papinianus Carſer. And being honourably accompanied and attended vnto the Narrou Sea, with the hearty loue and fauour of all men, departed, and with a gentle gale of winde paſſed ouer, and came to the Princes Camp, where (being receiued with ioy and praiſe) hee ſucceeded in the roome of Valens Iunioris, who had the conduct of the Warſomen. For theſe his Martiall deedes ſo happily achieved, in honour of him there was a Statue erected, reſembling a Man of Armes on Horſebacke, as by Symmachus may be vnderſtood, thus ſpeaking to his ſonne Theodoſius: The Author of your hundred and ſixtye, Captaine Generall both on Africa and Britaine, was (among other ancient Titles) conſecrated by the moſt honourable Order with Statues of Knighthood. And in his commendations, Claudian with full noce thus poetically ſing:

(11) Strange and dreadfull were the signes that in the third yeere of this Emperour chanced; as Earthquakes, inundations, and the like; whereof Arrianus
thus reporteth: A little after the Sunne-rising (such he)
the waighy and fleshy mist of the whole Earthly Globe flowed, flues of lightning very thicke and fierce going before: the Sea also driven aside, and the waies and hollowes
so proportionally tumbling and retiring back, that the deepe Gulfs being discovered and laid empty, a multitude have sene sundry sorts of swimming creatures floating in the wilde: Also the vast Vallies and Racket, which Nature had set farre away under the huge Waters, did now behold the Beames of the Sunne; insomuch that many Ships were bedded fast in the drie ground, and flukes of people streight as their pleasure in the small remanens of water, to take up Fishes as the Sea-fishes, when on the sudden the waves dissembling to be thus dispossessed, returned with such violent beating upon the Lands and Promontories, which lay farre into the Sea, as that they over-flowed, and land itself an infinite number of buildings and Cities. And therefore in this furiosum disorder of the Elements, the surface of the world being covered, represented strange and wonderfull fighes. Among which S. Jerome reporteth, that there rained Wool from Heaven so perfect and good, that no better grew upon the Sheepe, the naturall Producer. But to returne.

(12) Frammarus, whom Valentinianus had ordained to be King of the Bucinobantes in Germanie, was made Tribune and Colonell over a Regiment of Almans in Brittain, which for number and valour in those daies were renowned; where (no doubt) matter enough was ministered for him to worke upon. But the death of the Emperour presently following, admits no mention of further discourse: which happened in this manner: The Rhods after many molestations done to the Roman Legions and their Confederates, sent their Ambassadors unto him, desiring pardon for their former fautes committed, and an abolishment of all remembrances thereof: with whom being in earnest conference, suddenly the blood gushed out of his mouth; and being laid upon his bed, shortly after died of an Apoplexie, or rather of the Plague, as the blew Markes appearing vpon his dead body gave confidence: November the twentieth, of his age fiftie five yeeres, having reigned eleven yeeres, eight moneths, and two daies, in the yeere of our Christ three hundred seuentie five.

(13) For preference, he was Majestically, of bodie fat, his complexion faire, his eies gray, and having therewith som what a true cast, his haire shining bright, his joints strong and well knit: he was a Prince merci-full and loosing, and mitigated many Tributes formerly imposed on the Provinces: a wife Warriour, sterne in countenance, halbie of speech, and chaste of body, a good Iudice, and impatient of all delays. But these his Vertues with some Vices were accompanied:
for he is taxed with enuie and partialitie, in punishing severely the poore Sculdres for small offenses, but re-missive to the faults of their Captaines and Leaders, and that was the cause (by Arrianus has report) of the troubles in Brittain, the losses in Africke, and the waring in Thrace.

(14) His Asian brother Valens succeeding him, reigned Emperour in the East by whose sufferance the Barbarian Gothes entered Thrace, which presently proved to be the bane of the Roman World, for that these Gothes (a strange and ynkowne People till then) being forced out of a secret Nook in Syria, by the Hog-Backs Hunnes, rushing as an irresistible wherle-winde from those High Mountains, invaded the Cosses about Danubius, and obtained licence from Valens to passe the River Danew into Thrace, where long in quiet they staid not, but like a violent Flood running with a full current, they over-whelmed all before them, overcoming the Romans in many Battles, and in one slew the Emperour Valens, with most of his approoned Captaines, and twenty five Tribunes that had charge of Regiments, the third part of his Armie hardly escaping vnsaine. Some report that Valens flying the Pelts, tooke into a house neere Adrianople, whither being pursued by the Lombes, and his Head fired vpon his head, was therein burned to ashes, after he had late Emperour fourteen yeeres.

Gracianus, the Eldest Sonne of Valentinianus, by his Emperesse Mother, was made his Father's Colleague in the Empire in the fourth yeere of his Reigne: notwithstanding six daies after his death, his second Sonne Valentinianus, a Child of four yeeres old, by the advice of the Counsell and generall consent of the Camp, was also stiled and proclaimed Emperour. These Brothers lived in much love, and ruled in the West, as their vncle Valens did in the East, of whom wee last spake. And albeit Gracianus had taste of displeasure, that this his Younger Brother was thus advanced without his allowance, yet he as a Prince kind and naturall, regarded his Brother exceedingly, and brought him vp in all tender affection, forgetting the wrong offered unto himselfe and his owne Mother for Valentinianus mother sake.

(2) The Mother of this Valentinian was Justina, a damzell of an admirable feature and exceeding beauty, surpassing all other women so farre, that the Emperesse her selfe fell in love with her, and vially conuersed with her familiarly as her equall, imparting her most priuate secrets vnto her as her trustie Counsellor, and often basking together in the same Bath. Neither was her ardent affection contained within the measure of womanish modestie, in so much as she restrained not in the hearing of the Emperour (her Husband) to extoll her incomparable beauty, preferring her far above any creature in the World. Whereupon Valentinianus so farre affected this Lady, as that he tooke her to his Wife, by whom he had this young Valentinian, and also three Daughters, notwithstanding Justina was yet living.

(3) The foremes of the Gothes as a violence tempest beating still against the Shores of the Roman Frontiers, caused Gracianus to leave Seyle toward the South Harbour, and to commit the guidance of his shippe to the most assured Pilot: their forces being so great, and their outrages so terrible, that hee thought it best not so adventure his owne person, but to employ some other approued Captain. For which exploit, none was held more sufficient then Theodosius, the Sonne of that Theodosius who was so famous for his Britishe Warres, and whose life was taken away by Valens the Easterne Emperour. Him he made first Captaine Generall of the Roman Empire and immediately vpon his first seruice against the Gothes, his Fellow Emperour and Augustus, allotting him those parts in the East, that his vncle Valens lastly had enjoyed.

(4) In many Battels, fought to the last drop of blood, this worthy Generall overcame the Gothes, so that their King Athanasius was lastly inforced to sue for his Peace, which vpon honourable compositions was granted, and himselfe in most princely manner entertained by Theodosius in the Imperiall Citie Constantinople, where falling sick after three moneths, he died, and was both much lamented, and sumptuously buried by the Emperour. These reports caused Sapor, the most puissant King of Persia, to submit himselfe vnto Theodosius, and by his Ambassadors, attending his Court, obtained his Amistie. Thus gloriously reigning and perfect peace established, he ordained his young sonne Arcadius his Fellow Emperour in the East.

(5) But the affaires in the Western Empire proceeded nothing so fortunately: for Gracianus a merke and soft tempered man, ballanced with Theodosius, was held without regard; and Valentinian by his Prefect Preboscus, held both Rome and Italy at his deuotion, onely Gallia obeyed Gracianus. For Clemens Maximus borne in Spain, but descended lineally from Constantine the Great, by his affability and liberal carriage, had wonne the affections of the Brittaines to side with him; a man, no doubt, both Valiant and Wise, had he held his allegiance to his Soueraigne Lord. But the time fitting his purposes, when the Scots and Picts with their wonted inroad, sore indamaged the Province, he set himselfe for their deliuerance, and thereon sped so well, that the Soldiers by constraint (as Orosius saith) forced him to assume the Imperiall Stile and Purple Robe. so having into Gallia, with all the flower and strength well near of the Britannia forces, arrived in the mouth of Rhene, unto whom also the German Army joined, and now accounting himselfe an absolute Monarch, admitted Victor his sonne, then Cesar, to be partner of his Empire, whose Stampe therefore with his father we have here annexed.

Against him Gracianus made his power, but after five daies skirmishings was forsaken of his own Souldiers, and so put to flight. And now dejected and deliquite of names to maintaine his quarrell, hee sent Ambrosius (a great Doctor of the Church) his Ambassador unto Maximus, to treat for Peace, which in outward shew was granted, but was faine otherwise intended, as the sequell proved. For seeking his death, hee did shortly after effect it in this wise: He caused Letters, and reports to be given unto Gracian, that his Emperre was in journey to visit him, and withall sent forth a Carriage stuffed with Souldiers, and with them a desperate Captaine named Andragathus. Gracian greatly rejoycing for his wifes approach, prepared himselfe to meet her accordingly, and opening the Letter, thinking to embrace his Emperre, was by these Ruffins treacherously murdered neere unto Tours, when he had reigned fiftene yeeres, and lived twentie nine. Valentinian with his Mother Iuliana, fearing the like conspiracies, became supplicants unto Theodosius in the East against Maximus.

(7) He therefore preparing his forces, marched as fast as Aquileia in Lombardy, where Maximus remained both confident and secure. For having fortified the straits of the Mountains with sufficient Garrison, and dammed the Naues with strength of Ships, himselfe and assistants with great boldnesse proceeded against Theodosius, and gave him a battell before the Citie Sylva in Pannonia, and againe most valiantly received him in another, under the leading of his brother Marellus; but in both of them was overcome. From this last, hee secretly retired unto Aquileia, where of his own Souldiers hee was betrayed, and delivered to Theodosius his pursuers and by him to the Executioner to be beheaded: of which his vnfortunate, but deterred end, the famous Bishop Martinus Turnough being in Britaine, did foretell him long before. Andragathus also, the Murderer of Gracian, whose fate was now desperate, cast himselfe headlong into the Sea, and made an end of his wicked life. Victor the sonne of Maximus, made his Casir in France, as we have said, was defeated, taken Prisoner & slain. This victory was held so worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward solemnized that day every yeere as festiual, saith Prosperus.

(8) But these Britaines that had assailed Maximus, as by Writers is recorded, did forcibly invade Armorica, and there planted themselves: From whence (saith Bede) the Britaine first arrived into this Island. But surely himselfe is either greatly mistaken, or else we must take him altogether, and that rather, for that by Cesar those Counties that lie vpon the Sea borders, are called Armorica, and there the Celts lived, being the Originall of our Inhabitants, as is holden, and so from thence they might spread themselves further into these British Islands, long before it received the name of Little Britaine. The like troubles fell to other Provincers at the sametime, by the inselme warres of the Emperre: for the Gauls were molested by the Frankes, Spain by the Sacians, and Africk by the Vandals: the East parts by the Heruls, Ostroges, and Hunnes; Italy by the Lombards and shortly after by the Goths.

But to retorne into the path of our History, from whence (by the intangled occasions of these foure Emperres raigning together) we have windred; let vs remember what occurrents happened vpon the death of Maximus the Tyrant, and hasten to end the greatness of the Empire, which in most Provincers began to end of it selfe. For Valentinian being rid of his faires, unto which hee had bene subiect, and Theodosius of his Caligae, vnto whom hee was enforced; great hope was conceived of a flourishing Estate, but it brought forth onely the remains of their downefall: for the one returning to Constantinople in great Triumph, liued not long after; and the other left peaceably in the Western World, was (as you haue heard) loone made away by Conspiracie.

(10) Valentinian remaining at Vienna in France, free from Hostile Enemies, retained in his Court those that fought his life, whereof Arbogastes, a Captaine of a haughty stomacke, politticke, aduenturous, and of great power, but withall of a base Perverse, a stranger and an Infidell, was one; Eugenius a Grammarian, but now bearing Armes, and of great account, was another. These corrupting his Chamberlaines, compounded for his death, which they as wickedly performed, by strangling him in his bedde, giving it forth that the Emperre had hanged himselfe; which was so confidently mouched, that Prosperus in his Addition to Eusebius writing his death, saith, that it was ailed by himselfe, after hee had liued twenty six, and reigned fiftene yeeres, being strangled in the yeere of Grace three hundred eighty foure.

I haue declared in the life of the last preceding Emperour, the Birth and Fortunes, Warres and Victories of this most worthie Theodasius, vntill the death of Maximus the Britaine, (for so most writers terme him) and now onely remaine his latter Acts in her related.

(2) This Emperor returning from Aquileia in Lombardy vnto Constantinople in the East, long time there staid not, but was drawne againe into the West both to reuenge the death of Valentinian his Fellow-Emperor fortrochiously strangled, and also to oppose the proceedings of Eugenius, whose Coine we haue here exprest, being one of the Murderers then vnting that portion of the Empire, sided by Arbaces the other.

(4) No means being now left, but either to cleave the passages, or be overthrowne, he first became supplicant with Prayers and Tears unto his God, whom he knew to be the God of Heaven and whom ever he had feared, and whose aid had hitherto never failed him: whereupon boldly encouraging his men, he accepted of the Field. But the Battle furiously begunne, fell so sore against him, that ten thousand of his Souldiers were presently slaine, and the rest despairing ready to flie, himselfe at that instant had beene surprized, had not God turned the heart of Athens, Captaine of his Enemies, suddenly to come to his aide, and to rescue him. Therewith much daunted by this unfortunate beginning, yet conceived better hopes of the following issue, trusting to the vprightnesse of his Cause, and the helpe of his God, which still he implored, till the Hausas were propitious to his earnest

(5) For suddenly a violent tempest arose, and a raging wind rushed so extremely on the faces of his Enemies, that they were in no wise able to withstand it, the power thereof beating backe againe their darts into their owne sides; whereas the arrows shot from the Emperors part, were thereby forced with double strength to pierce through the Rebels Iron plates, whereby a molligrivous victory was obtained; and Engenius taken, who lay grollelling at the Emperors feete, deploring his estate, and craving his pardon; but even as hee kneeled with cries and tears, the Souldiers standing by bruckt off his Head. And Archangelus the Author of their evils by flight escaping, two daies after ran himselfe upon his sword, and so reuenged on himselfe his owne wicked actions. This victory was achieved the sixth of September, in the yeere of grace three hundred ninety six, by Stratus account; and was so famous, that belies the Records of Crinith Historians, Claudian a Heathen Poet thus eternizeth the same in his Heroick Poeme

But this her ioy through the Treasons of these three Gouernours, was loone turned into lamentations and teares, and the whole Empires glory brought to a fallall period, as presently it will appeare.

(1) This Theodosius for his Princely parts by all writers is ranked among the very best of all the Emperours: And as he is likened to Trajan for his feature and personage, so may be compared in wisdom to Marcus Aurelius: In temperance with Antoninus Pius: For his Christian profession and deuotion, with Constantine the Great: and for his meeknes, c-

quall to any: Whereof among many other, we haue one example very remarkable, vpon an offence committed by the Inhabitants of Theſſalonica, hee commanded most severe punishment to bee inflicted, which was so vnadvisedly executed, that as well the innocent, as the offenders were involved therein. He then coming to Milan, would haue entered the Church to haue communicated with other Christians in their sacred deuotions, which Ambrose, the great Doctor, and Bishop of that See (though otherwise a man of admirable mildnesse) resisted and forbade, in which estate the Emperour stood for eight moneths continuance: and then with great humility & submission, acknowledging his offence was absolved, and againe receiued into the congregation: For preventing of the like rash offences by him committed, he then enacted a Lawe, that thirty daies should passe betwixt the sentence of death, and the execution of the Malefactor: And to suppress his hasty choller (wherunto he was much subiect) his usual manner was to recite the Greek Alphabet, before hee vntured any speech sueruing of that humour.

(2) He died January the fourteenth, the yeere of the worlds happines three hundred ninety five: when he had reigned seuenne years, and liued sixty, as Aurilius Victor writeth, with whom he ends his History. His first wife was Flavia, a religious Lady, the Mother of Arcadius and Honorius, by his second wife hee had a daughter named Placidia Galla, first married vnto Athenasius King of the Goths, and after his death vnto Constantine, whom Honorius her brother made Augustus and his fellow Emperour.

CHAPTER LIII.

Arcadius Emp. East.

Honorius Emp. West.

Anno 395.

Asail was the Act of Theodosius, in his Election of the three foresaid Protectors, whose greatnes carried with a glutted prosperity, grew to a surfeit after his death in their ambitious thoughts, and was the downfall of the now aged and drooping Empire: first Gildas in Africa, not contented with the title of Comes or Earle, cutt off all subiection, and as an absolute Lord, acknowledged neither Arcadius, nor Honorius for his Soueraigne.

(2) Against these proceedings, his owne brother Massecerius opposed himselfe, and both in words and acts assayed to set him in his wonted place of obedience, which by no other means could be brought to passe, but by assistance sent him from Honorius, with which, though much too weake, he marched against the Emperours Enemy, and as Pausanias Orosius writeth more by force of prayers to God, then power of men, in his encounter preuailed, and behended Gildas for his Treason: But himselfe becoming mightie, and forgetting that which in others hee remembered, himselfe viurped the command of Africa against Honorius, calling off all subiective obedience, and as a free Prince ruled the Province: The Souldiours that had lately assisted the Emperours cause, now well perceiving his aime, leuelled at the Crowne, thought best to cut the string before hee loosed the shaft, and made him shorter by the head.

(3) Austrianus in Constantinople as boldly bare himselfe, thinking Arcadius both too weake and yong to found the depth of his designs, whose thoughts did also worke vpon concerned Soueraignty: he therefore secretly sollicitated the Goths to warre vpon the Emperour, that so Arcadius might either be slaine or in-trapped, or else himselfe in those dangers, set vp as the more sufficient. But these things thus dangerously comploted by Raffinus, were as politically prevented by the Emperour, although a Child: for before the Seed of this Treason could bring forth either Bad or Blade it was discovered, and the Author (slaine by an Italian Band, his Head (which as some affirme, first tooke breath in Britaine) was advanced ouer a Gate in Constantinople.

(4) Thus Peace obtained by the Deaths of these two Traitors, the Third stood vp with more danger in the wey. For Stilicho, Tutor to young Honorius, thought it not sufficient honour for him to haue his Daughter an Emperesse by the Marriage of his Ward, but set at hazard (for himselfe and sonne) his own Confession, both their Lives, and the facill ruine of the New-declining Empire. For first, sowing seditions amongst the Lieutenants of the Provinces, picked also quarrels in the Emperors Court, Causing with disgraces those Gates that had serued with good proofe of their fidelitie aboue twenty yeeres, since their entertainment by Theodosius. These to reuenge their Wrongs, chose for their Chiefe a valiant Goth named Alaricus, which shortly proved the Seuerge of Rome: with whom ioyned the Vandals, Alanes, and Suenians, who ioyntly with great fury beganne to waite in Austriack and Hungarie, increasing their Power with such Multitudes, that as Paulus Orosius, an Author of that time saith, The World was amazed and stood in feare. For vnto their Colonies resorted two hundred thousand Goths, more, vnder the leading of Rodericus their King, who together with vnited forces, subdued all Thracia, Hungary, Austriack, Sclauonia, and Dalmatia, and spoiled all in such manner, that it seemed Diuels and not Men had passed that way, as Saint Ierome (who liued at that time) expresse it: These brute Beasts (saith he) suffered by the wrath of God in this warre, haue laid Cities waste, flaine the People, and left the very Fields bare and desolate, whereof the Provinces of Thracia, and Sclauonia, with the Country wherein my selfe was borne, beare too true, but lamentable Records.

(5) The Roman Empire thus daily declining, and these fierce Nations making hauck where they came, the Armes in Britaine were put in great feare, lest the Flames of their Neighbours fire might Flash out, and take hold of them also. Therefore providently to prevent that danger, they elected one Marcus their Lieutenant for Emperour, yielding him their obedience some short time, and then finding his defects, immediately murdered him.

In whose stead they Interposed one Gracian a Britaine: whose carriage not answearing their expectations, they Murdered also, within Four Months after his Royall soleimnity.

The features and Imperiall Titles stamped on the Romish Money of these two Vsurpers, (according to the usual manner of the like in Elate) we finde not, neither stands it with credit of our Hitory to faim them at pleasure: therefore till time bring them forth, from the Causes of obscurity we haue allowed them place onely by these Circles inserted, that others may supply what prektulle wee want, and accomplish by penicill what we cannot by Presse.

(6) Yet time to Constantine hath bin more favorable in preferring his remembrance by his minted Monies, which here with his Story we prefer to fight. At the fall of these former, no better at all then a Common Souldier, but vpon confidence onely conceited of his Name, was made Emperour, who with more respect of honour, and liking of his aduancers, bore himselfe better then the others had done. For putting to Sea, and landing at Bologna, he easily induced the Romans forces as farre as the Alps to side with him: Valentin in France hee manfully defended: the Rhine, which long had been neglected, hee fortified with Garrisons: vpon the Alps as well as vpon the Mediterranean Coasts, where passages were frequented, hee built Fortresses: Spain likewise hee held vnder the hand of Constantine his Sonne, whom of a Master hee had made Augustus, &c. by whose valour subdued all from the Pyrenean Mountains to the Ocean. Whose Monies wanting to expresse his Image and Stile, we haue also supplied with another Blanke.

(7) Constantine prospering as wee haue said, sent Letters of excuse vnto Honorius, affirming constantly that he was compelled by the Souldiers to doe what he did: whereby he so pleased the Emperour, that commending his Valor, & holding him fit, hee sent him of free gift a Purple Robe. Whereupon this new-grown blade began to bud faire, and at Arles planted his Imperiall Seat, Commanding the Citie to be called Constantina from him, and ordained that the Assemblies of the affaires of Seven Provinces should bee therein held. But this his Smoothness of prosperitie was soone overcast with the Clouds of aduersie fortunes, and his Crowne & Life laid together in the dust. For in Spain against him was arrayed Maximus & Fassall, whole Generall Grontius intercepting Constantine, (his Sonne and Cesar) at Vienna in France slew him: and Constantine himselfe within the *Wall*es of Arles, besieged for Four Months, after the Raigne of Four Yeeres, laid aside his Purple Robe, and entered the Church in Order of Priesthood, surrendering the Citie with his Stile Imperiall, was lastly led into Italy, and there beheaded.

(8) From that time Britaine renewed her obedience to Honorius, and the Provinces while was repressed by the Wisdom and Prudence of Vigilantius her Lieutenant, who often repressed the incursions of the

That Man in himselfe had Freedom. 3. That the Grace of God was given unto vs according to our merits. 4. That the lust have no sinne. 5. That Children are free from Original sinne. 6. (11) Thus were the affairs of this Land managed under these British Emperours; the elder of which, Arcadius, died in peace at Constantinople, leaving his sonne Theodosius, a child of eight yeeres, to the succession of the Empire, and to the tuition of Modestus King of Perfia; a matter which seem'd at first very dangerous, but proved at the last very profitable. He reigned thirteen yeeres, and died the first of May, the one and thirtieth of his age, the yeere of Christ's birth four hundred and ten. At which time one Innocent, of an obscure beginning, had raised some Tumults in Gallia, stiled himselfe Emperour, usurp'd the Purple Robe, and stamp'd his Coines with the Title of Victorius, as is seene in one which we heere present.

(12) Against him Honorius made his power, and with his little Ioffe slew the Pyssars in the Field: whereby his fame was more spread in the West, though not so fortunate as his brothers was in the East, after whom hee liued fifteen yeeres, and with whom hee had reigned other thirteen; and he died, saith Paulus Diaconus, of an infirmie at Rome in the yeere of grace four hundred twenty foure, leaving no issue of his body to succeed him in the Empire.

Great have been the Wars and strange the Alterations which both here at home, and through the World abroad have chanced vnto States since the first attempts of Julius Caesar vnto these present Emperors, Theodosius the second, and Valentinian

the third, his Affiliates, whole Lixen and Reignes did conclude the Successions of the Samoy Monarchs within this Island of Great Brittain, and threw downe their Triumphall Arches in many other Provinces, which for long time had been obligatours to Romes Soueraine Command. So vncertaine is the Glory of this World, and her Seeming Strength so liable to Mutabilitie, that the Powers and Personages thereof held in His hand that holdeth the Princes fall, are suddenly turned from their high-mounted fire and beaury of the Sun vnto the Darke fall and darke side of the Globe, and either fall againe into the small Circles of their first compasse, after they haue expired their Number, Waights, and Measures: or else with Daniels Image are vicerly extinct and blowe away, as the chaffe from the Summer flower.

(2) The continuance of whole Estates seeme they neuer so Great and Durable in Power, Circuit, Defence, and Multitude, hath feldome extended much the limit of Five hundred yeeres, but that their high and mounted Flammes, fall in the ashes of their owne consuming decayes, or else hath received some other alteration of Empires increase, as many learned Writers haue obserued in most Common-wealths. So was it in the State established by God himselfe among his Peculiar People. As from the Promise to Abraham, made of Christ the Blessed seed and life of Man (where created the World formerly-closed computation from the Ages of Men) vnto the Law delivered vpon Mount Sinai, declaring condemnation and death, were four hundred thirty yeeres: from Israels departure out of Egypt, when their Common-wealth beganne to be ruled by Iudges, and Gods service celebrated in the Tabernacle vnder Curtaines vnto the Building of their Glorious Temple erect by King Solomon, were yeeres foure hundred and eighty. From the Anointing of David, the first King, set vpon Iudahs Tribe, vnto the death of Zedekiah the last King thereof, slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, and that Holy Temple consumed by fire, were yeeres foure hundred & fouentie. And other Politike Estates haue stood much vpon the like Space of time. For the Kingdoms of Athens set vp by Cereps the first

King thereof, vnto Codrus the last, when they changed their Monarchie to a Democratic, is said to haue continued foure hundred and ninety yeeres. The Lacedemonians staid from Lycurgus their Law-giver, vnto Alexander the Great, that ouerthrew it, flourished the space of foure hundred ninety yeeres. From the expulsion of Romes Kings vnto Tarquinus, vnto the affected Empire in Julius Caesar, were foure hundred ninety and nine yeeres. And omitting many others, to come to our selves; from Casars first Inuasion of Brittain, vnto the daies of this Valentinian the third, wherein the Romans did quite abandon it, were five hundred yeeres. From the Saxons intrusions and diuision of this Realme into an Heptarchie vnder their Government, vntill the viued Monarchie made by King Egbert in the yeere eight hundred and nineteene, were yeeres foure hundred sixty nine. But from thence, vntill their issue failed in King Edward Confessor, were yeeres only two hundred forty seuen. And from the Normans Conquest, vnto the death of that most sacred Soueraine of eternall memorie, Queene Elizabeth, when began againe the name of GREAT BRITAIN, and the vntion of the whole Island to be brought into one lastre Monarchie, by the rightfull Succession and thrice-happy entrance of our most gracious King IAMES, are yeeres five hundred thirtie six. But of these three last, we are to speake hereafter; and now returne to finish vp the falling Estate of the Romans Greatnesse.

(3) Theodosius the Sonne of Arcadius beganne his Empire in the yeere of the worlds diluacion foure hundred and eight, and was governed with a speciall protection by the Persian King during his Adolescence, vnder the charge of Antigenus an excellent man. But now growne to yeeres and some variance happening betwixt him and his Father, he was left to the disposal of himselfe; and his vncke Honorius leaving at his death great troubles vnquenched in the West, the mightie Potentates assaid to make themselves Emperours ouer feuerall Dominions, and from the rebusse of the Imperiall Diademe, each one sought to plucke a Tewel to beautifie his owne Crowne. So the Barbarous Nations out of this one Monarchie began the foundations of many succeeding Kingdomes. For in Spaine the Vandals, Sueues, and Alans, not contented with their portion therein assigned, betooke themselves to Armes. The Franks and Burgundians, which had been driuen out of France, relapsed againe to returne. The Goths, that were Lords of Barcelona, Norboma, and Talaf, did as the rest. The Hunnes entered Hungarie, Iohn the Tyrant held Rome: and in Africa, Boniface became a Neuter. These sturres moued Theodosius to nominate nominate Valentinian his kinsman Emperor in the West; whose reign and affairs (so far as they touch Britain) we will follow, being the last of the Roman Emperors that held out the facession of our British Monarchs.

(4) This Valentinian was the sonne of Constantine, made Augustus, as is said, and of Placidia Galla daughter to the first Theodosius Emperor; which Lady in the taking of Rome by Alaricus the Goth, was taken Prisoner, and by him given in marriage to his neere kinsman Athaulphus, who afterwards was King of that Nation; and by her sweet demaion, and prudent counsels, a Peace was concluded betwixt her Husband and her Brother, but with such dislikes to the Goths, that they presently killed him, and raised one Wallia for their King; who likewise coming to composition with Honorius, delivered Placidia according to Covenants, whom the Emperor her Brother bestowed in Marriage upon Constantine his General, in reward of his good service and Fidelity by him achieved.

(5) Shee, with young Valentinian newly made Emperor, being sent into Italy, selected the best approved Captains to secure her sonnes Estate; whereof Alar was one, that in Rome first slew the Emperor, who had there made himself Emperor, stamping this his face and stile upon the current Money of the State, and by his Tyranny held his fortunes for five yeeres continuance.

Alar likewise, that had been Governor of Spain, was imploied into Gallia, where the Franks and Burgundians (under the conduct of Cladius their second King) fought to establish (as shortly they did) their Kingdom in that Country, giving it the name of France, according to their own, by which name they were never knowne to Caesar, Strabo, Pliny, Tacitus, Arrian, nor Ptolemy; whereby the great blab of their Antiquitie is shew'd to be but a puffe of winde.

(6) At this time the Britains were againe fore oppressed by the Saxons and Picts, who having notice that the Aides sent by Honorius were returned, passed over the Water in their Boats at both the ends of the Wall, and invaded the Province with such force, that they bare downe all before them. The Britains in this lamentable plight, sent their Ambassadors to Rome, with their Complaints, and layd upon their heads, unto Valentinian the Third, bewailing their most miserable Estate, and craving his helpe. The Emperor moved to remede, sent a Regiment of Souldiers into Britaine, under the Command of Galla of Ravenna, a most valiant man, who having put backe the Enemy with the assistance of the Islanders, gave some small comforts to the distressed Britains. But the Burgundians passing the Rhine, and threatening to walke Italy, Alar was compelled to recall Galla with his Legion, to secure the Countrey about Paris, whilst himselfe with him followed the dangerous France.

(7) He now ready to depart for France, told the Britains that it was not for the Romans to take so long and painefull Journeys, neither at that time especially when their own Empire was in danger to be over-run. Therefore he willed them themselves to stand upon their Guard, and go provide for their owne Estates; and to that end, to regard of their good services done to the Romans, he taught them the use of their Armour and Weapons, as also to strengthen their Fortification, and Wall of Turfe, which now they began to build with firme Stone, last eight foot in thickness, and twelve foot in height. This Wall (saith Gildas) they drew in a straight line (at the publick charges of the State) from East to West, and from Sea to Sea, planting Bulwarks, and raising Towers, with convenient spaces distant one from another; which gave a faire and rare prospect into the Sea. And so the Romans gave a small Farewell, meaning never to returne againe; and burying part of these Treasures here in the Earth, whereof much hath bene found, and more is still sought, left Britaine about the yeere of Christ five hundred, after the first invasion thereof made under the conduct of Julius Caesar.

(8) This unfortunate Emperor Valentinian sold not only Britaine, but suffred also Africa, France, and Spaine to be plucked from his Empire: and the weakness of the Roman power (whose strength consisted most in Fortified Cities, as Tacitus saith) was left unable to defend it selfe; when they had bereft this Province of all the Flower and Chiefe of Men, as Gildas in that age complained, saying, Britaine is depopled of all her armed men, with her military forces: her Rulers (scall though they were) are wasted, her Garrison withdrawn, and defenceless laid open, and an exceeding great number of her stout courageous Souldiers taken from her, to serve the Romans in their warres. With which his sayings the Roman writers themselves agree, and record the Multitudes and great multitudes of Britains that have bene transported by them out of this Land: as when Trebelius Maximus with his British Forces made Ground the Fallow against Otho in Germany; and then also Honorius Flavius brought thence eight thousand choise Souldiers to uphold Arcadius in his cause.

Cladius Albinus banding against Severus the Emperor, assuming the Title, and stamping the Monneyes of the Imperial Estate (as by this here inferred is to be seene, which coming to our hands since his storie was written, we hold it more acceptable to set here, though out of place, then to give it no place at all in this Worke, being so worthy an Antiquitie, and so much concerning the Britains) under whose Banner the Flower of their Chivalrie perished in Battle, when in the Fields of France, and neere unto Lyons, they spent their blood in his cause; whereby the sinewes of their owne Countreys defense was fore weakened, and laid open to Forraigne Invasions. Constantine the Great also (as Malmsbury noteth) carried hence a great power of British Souldiers with him in his warres, by whose puissance (as he saith) he obtained Triumphant Victories, and the Empire of the whole World: and after assigned them that part of Gallia to inhabit, which was called Armorica, lying backward upon the Sea Coast, where they leaving themselves, their posteritie was increased, and continueth a Mighty People even unto this day.

(9) This Countrey afterwards (being conquered by Maximus, and his reconciled Enemy Canus Neriodor, Lord of Denishland, by the prowess of those British Souldiers whom hence he carried in his quarrell against Valentinian the Emperor) was received in free gift of Canus, after the slaughter of Iulianus the King, and the name thereof changed to Little Britaine, as being a Colonie or Daughter of this our Land. The Province is large, pleasant, and fruitful, and contained in her Circuit nine Bishops Sees, whereof three are called Cornwalles unto this day, which are Lannec, S. Paul, and Tregriers; the other six are Dole, Rheas, Eborac, Eborac, Eborac, Eborac.

I omit to speak of those other Numbers of men sent for out of this Kingdom by the said Conan, whereof our British Historians make mention, besides the sending of Ysida with Eleven thousand Virgins to be married in marriage with those their Country-men, all of them perishing by Sea or by Sword, but none of them returning, either again; whereby the bane of the Land presently followed, her hopes being cut off, and deprived of woored Pastrants.

(10) This Conquest and Plantation to Armerica, Matthew of Westminster accounteth to have happened in the year of Christ three hundred ninety two. And these Soldiers thus withdrawn, are so recorded by Henry of Huntingdon his ancient, and Nimius also long before both, reporteth that Maximus gave many Countries to these his Britons, even from the Poole which is on the Top of Jupiter Hill, to a Cite called Cantuar, and vnto the Welsh Mountains. These (saith he) are the Britons in Armerica, who neuer returned againe: in regard whereof Britane was Conquered by Strange Nations. With whom agreeth Gregorius a Monke of Canterburie, Iohn Anglus, Raphael of Chesler, and others. Thithert also in the downefall and desperate Estate of the Britons, many of them fled from the rage of their Enemies, as hee that was borne in Armerica, and lived neerly to that age, even the Writer of the Life of S. Winald of the Confessor, doth sufficiently prove. As of Wing (saith he) of the Britons embarked in Fleets, arrived in this Land, on this side the British Sea: what time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons, fierce in Armes, and vicious in manners, possessed their Native and Mother Sayle, &c.

(11) And lastly, in the cause of that other Constantine, who was elected only for his Name, most of the Flower and Strength of the Britons were transported into Gallia and Spaine, where in his variable fortunes many of them perished. And Malmesbury writing of these Times, saith, that the Romans had emptied Britaine of all her Flower and Chivalry of Warre, leaving now in her Countries but Halfe-barbarous men, and in her Cities only Epagres, vntil for service. In confirmation whereof, the most learned Notitia Praeuenturae, hath observed, that these Companies vnder written serued the Romans in their Warres, and were dispersed here and there in their Provinces, which also were from time to time euermore supplied out of Britaine.

(12) No marvel is it then if Britaine lay weak, being thus continually exhausted of her strengths, which these approved Records made so apparant, as we need not allege the doubtful Story of Isopus of Norway, for the depopulation of the Island, who is said by feibilty vnder pretence of Kindred, and Honor to be achieved, to have gotten an infinite number of Britons to follow him in his enterprise, which neuer returned againe: or the Booke Triades mentioned by the Author of the Reformed History of Great Britaine, that bringeth an Army hence, consisting in number of one and twenty thousand men, into Aquitaine and Gaul; which, as he saith, was the Aid mentioned by Caesar, that out of Britaine assailed the Gauls against him. Which may partly seeme to be gathered from Caesar himselfe, as hath been said: where he affirmeth, that the Britons and Gauls were governed vnder the same King: and is further confirmed by the Fashion and Inscriptions of Antique Coines, which wee haue seene stamped in Gold, the Forme round, and shield-like: Imbossed outward in the Face, and Hollow in the Reverse a Forme vnfallible to be of the Britons Coines, and yet the word Comes is inscribed vpon the Imbossed side, whom we imagine to be the same Governor of Artye in Gallia, whom Caesar mentioneth.

(13) Thus then was Britaine first made Weak by the Romans exhausting, and then quite abandoned of their helpe, and left as a tree in the Wilderneesse, to loke her faire leaues by the continuall blis of cheif sharp Northerne winds, whose beauty before had bin as the Cedars of Libanus, or like vnto those in the Garden of God. And whose Riches had drawne the Worlds thither: to such liking and love, that no means was omitted to attaine the same, nor care neglected to keepe it in their Subiection: which, while it stood a Prouince in their obedience, was held and accounted to be the fairest flower in their Triumphs Gardens, and of some of their Emperors thought worthy the Residence of their Imperiall Throne.

BOOKE VII. CHAPTER I.

BRITAIN thus abandoned of all the Romane Garrison, and emptied of strength that should have supported her now down-falling-glare, lay prostrate to confusion and miserable calamities; no lesse burdened with the tumultuous uproares of her owne great men, who strove for the supreme Government, then of the Barbarous Nations which with continual incursions made spoile where they came. These times (saith Namus) were full of feares, and were prolonged with forty yeeres afflictions: wherein Peritigern then King was troubled with the violence of the Romans, the threats of the Picts and Scots, and the oppositions of Aurelius Ambrosius, who surmounting his blaine Parents, that had borne the imperiall Purple Robe, sought their reuenge upon their wicked Murderer: besides the Inrations of the German Saxons, called in for Friends, but proceeded indeed the greatest Enemies. During the conflict of these tempestuous stormes, some small comforts were ministered vnto the Brittaines by Bishop German his presence, who from France assisted them against the Pelagian Heresies, and the perillous assaults of the Scots and Picts, who in diuers skirmishes overcame them.

(2) The dolorous times of Brittaines destruction, Gildas the moorish Historian, who liued not long after, doth declare. As saue as the Romans (saith hee) had left Brittain, and were returning vnto their homes, fourteenth hideous multitudes of Scots and Picts came furrowing out of their Carreghies, (wherevnto they passed the Scotch Picts like whole Armies of diuillish vermin), which at high noone, when the Sonne in his greatest heat, began to crawl forth of their narrow holes an infinite number of hideous Scots and Picts; which two kindes of People, though in conditions somewhat different, yet they consorted too well in greedy desire of blood-shed: and having intelligence, the associates of Brittain were now returned with water disclaine of further assistance, with more confident boldnesse then euer before, they seize all the Northern and uttermost part of the Island, as if it had bene

their own inheritance, euen as farre as to the Wall. Against these attempts there were ranged in the high Ports along the Wall, Garrison of Soldiers, but such as were both foolish, and also vnconseruable for Martiall Affaires: which white-beared Ladies with quaking hearts sat still war ding day and night, till their hearts were as benumbed and stayed as the stones whereon they sat: as much as the naked Enemies did with long hooked Engines plucke from off the wall these miserable Warders, dashing their bodies against the ground. Thus good yet they got by this their vntimely deaths that being thus suddenly disatched out of the world, they escaped the imminent lamentable calamities that their brethren and children shortly felt. To bee short, having abandoned their Cities and that high defensible Wall, once more they betooke themselves to flight, and were dispersed in a more desperate manner then euer before. For the enemye was at more hot in pursuit, and more cruell in the slaughter, the wofull Inhabitants being by their Enemies massacred, and rent in peeces like Lambs in the hands of bloody Butchers; or in the waves of creek and fangie Beasts. In these most miserable times, (needles so compelling) the poore distressed people for bare not to rob each other of that sustenance, which could helpe them but for a very small season: and so their hostile oppressions were increased by their domesticke vexations, for that the whole Countrey by these continuall disruptions, was utterly depriued of the stiffe of food, having nothing left to prolong their life, but that only what they got in hunting. Whereupon about the thirtie nine yeere of Theodosius, and of Christ foure hundred fiftie six, the distressed Remaines of the down-cast Brittaines addressed their misliue Letters to Aetius, whom Gildas calleth Agitus, President of Gauls, in most lamentable manner, and thus inscribed.

To AETIVS Thrice Consul, the groanes of the BRITAINES.

"We Barbarians drive you backe to the Sea; the Sea againe putteth you backe vpon the Barbarians: thus betwene two kindes of death, we are either slaughtered or drowned. And the more to intimate their miseries, and to moue his assistance, then they further wringe: Wee (say they) are the Remnants that survive of the Brittaines, and are your Subiects, who besides the Enemye, are afflicted afflicted by famine and mortality which at this present extremely regeth in our Land. And putting him in mind that it much importeth the Majesty of the Roman Empe-re to protect and succour the Maileys of the Roman Empe-re, he had now flood upon the point of five hundred years vnder their obedience, whose strength of Soldiers taken from thence to serve their Emperors in their Wars elsewhere, was now decayed, and their wealths wasted

by maintaining their many Legions in their own Land and abroad : All this notwithstanding the Romans either would not, or could not relieve, hauing enough to doe to uphold their owne; but returned them againe with heavy hearts into the hands of their most cruell Enemies, who now knowing themselves free from the Romans interceptions, as a violent flood brake thorow the Province, and hure downe all before them; the Inhabitants flying like chafed Deere, some taking over Seas into Brittain in France, some to South-wales, North-wales, Cornwall, and parts of Deuonshire, leauing the beft of the Land to the will of their Persecutors, and much of their Treasures hid in the ground, which neuer after they enjoyed.

(4) But the greivous Famine still increasing, though it had this wofull issue with fome, that it made them yield themselves into the Enemies bloody hands (only in hope to gaine a little sustenance of food for the present) and for many yeeres after left lamentable tokens (saith Beda) of great desolations wrought by that dearth: yet with those other which were of more noble and resolute spirits it produced a better effect; inasmuch as frowd of the Mountains, Caues, and thicke woods, they affailed their enemies, reposing their trust not in Man, but in God, whose help is then most at hand, when mans helpe faileth. There in many skirmishes gaue them the overthrow with much slaughter, and that for many yeeres together, when they made their incursions for booties and spoiles, which caused these Rascally Irish to returne home, and the Picts a while rested from further molestation. Notwithstanding the Brittaines returned not from their owne wickednesse, growing strong now daily in repressing the Enemy, but stronger in their owne sinnes and ciuill dissensions. By means whereof, though a force of Hostile Warres was imbraced, and the skarres of famine cleerly skinned vp, yet another sore as dangerous as either, secretly bred, and shortly brake forth. For the Land being free from the Enemies wailes, yielded full plenty and abundance of all things, as the like before no age had seene; and therewithall such riot and excess, that the peoples sinnes grew to a plentiful harvest, as by the words of Cydrias is apparant.

(5) Certainly it is heard (saith he) that there is such fermentation, as the like is not among the Gentiles. Truth with the maintainers thereof is hated : Lies with the Forgers thereof by his effection. Enall is entertained for good, leauing his request more then uprightnesse, darst he desired before the bright Sonne, and Satan accepted for an Angel of light : Kings then were mounted, not according to Gods liking, but such as excelled others in cruelty; and as cruelly enuie by their anuities were they moued, not for any demerit, but that they might aduance others more sinners then the former. If hee were nullo, or inclining to truth, the darts of hatred were on every side levelled against him, as the surely Subverter of the Brittaines Estate. What was pleasing or displeasing to God, was all one with them, financing that the better things commonly wrought most discontent: so that requite the saying of the Prophet, which was denounced vnto the people in old time, might bee applied to our Country : Yet lewdisse and corrupti children haue forsaken the Lord, and are prouoked vnto err with the holy one of Israel. Why should ye be sinners any more, still multiplying iniquities? Every head is sick, and every heart is heauy :
from the sole of the foot vnto the crowne of the head, there is nothing found therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their saluie, as if that medicine which was bestowed by that trust Physician of all, was needlesse for the world. And not onely the prophane sort did this, but also the fildell flocks of the Lord, and the Shepherds thereof, who ought to haue giuen example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them lay fouslesse and weltring in wine, swelling with pride, contention, and griping enuie, putting no difference in iudgement betweene good and euill : inasmuch that it seemeth contempt was as poured forth both vpon Princes and people : and all of them seduced by vanities, wandred in errors and by-paths, not lead to the right way. When God therefore was minded to purge his Familie, and reuerse them thus infected with the corruptions of sinnes, by heare-say only of Tribulation, the winged flight of an often-tried rumour pierced the attentive cares of all men, giuing notice of their ancient Enemies, ready to arrive, and fully minded to destroy them v-terly, and to inhabit (as earli they did) the whole Country from one end to another. Yet all this could not reclaim them, but like vnto mad horses, which taking the bit fast betwixt their teeth, runne away with their Riders, so the leauing the way which leadeth (narrow thought bee) vnto saluation, ranne at random in the wide way of all wickednesse, which leadeth directly to death. Whiles therefore (as Salomon saith) the flabourer feruent will not bee amended with words, he is feared for a foole, and feeleth not the whip: for loe, a pestilent contagious fell heauily vpon those foolish people, which (though the enemies frowd was great) in short space destroyed such multitudes of them, that the liuing were not able to bury the dead. Neither yet also were they thereby bettered, that the saying of the Prophet Esay in them might be fulfilled: God called them to mourning, to huldnesse, and sack-cloth: but behold, they fell to drinking of calnes, and to feasting of Rommes; loe, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall, Let vs eat and drinke, for to morrow wee shall die. And indeed the time was drawnere, wherein their iniquities (like as those in times past of the Amarrites) should come to the iudgement. And euen at that instant the like measure beganne to bee heaped vpon the Brittaines.

(6) For the common enemy now invading the Southerne parts, was entred as farre as Stamford vp-on the Riuer Welland; whom to resist, the Brittaines assembled together, and hauing experience what ci-uill warres had formerly done, they jointly vniue their meanes and powers, and with one consent elect a King to manage these affaires, which was Fortigern, by birth extracted from the Brithy Line, nobly descended, had not his many vices hlemished the fame.
The Brithy Historie saith, that hee was Earle of Cornwall, and of great command in the daies of Constantine their King, whose simplicitie hee much abused, and whom lastly hee caused to be murdered by the Guard of his Person, the Scots and Picts by him so placed, and to that end infligated: whom neuertheless with death hee fearefully punished, to auoid further suspicion. In whose reuenge, these fierce Nations so affaulted his Dominions with rape and spoile, that hee was forced for further assistance to send for these Saxons to his aid. Whether thus, or otherwise, most true it is, the Saxons were sent for, and of hoped Friends, became the tried Enemies to the Brittaines and their Estates, as out of Gildas their Historian we shall anon decare.

(7) The occasion and manner of this their insuing and comming, is set downe by a Countryman of their owne Wiltshires, a Writer of good antiquity, who thus relateth the circumstance thereof. Brittain (saith he) by Vespasian the Emperour, long since being reduced among the Roman Provinces, and hold in their subiection, stood them in no small stead: but their Legions abandoned, and deliues (as it seemeth) determining the down-fall, became soone a flinted by their neighbour Nations the Nor-therne Borderers. For the people of Rome after that the Em-perour Marcellus was slaine by his Soldiers, being tired out with forraigne wars, were not able to assist their friends with supply of accustomed aides. And yet had they built a mighty piece of works for the defence of the Country, reaching betweene the confines from Sea to Sea, where it was thought that the Enemies would offinde the Inhabitants left in the Land. But no difficulty it was for them so fiercely bent, and euer ready to make war (especially where they dealt with a Nation feeble and left vnable to make resistance) to destroy the said works. Therefore hearing of the worthy and fortunate exploits achieved by the Saxons, they sent an humble Embassage to require their aid; and these having audience, (saith as follows).

"Most noble Saxons; the poore and distressed Brits, outworne and tired by the many incursions of their enemies, hearing the fame of those victories which you have most valiantly obtained, have sent vs Suppliants unto you, craving that you would not deny them your helpe and succour. A large and spacious Land they have, plentiful and abundant in all things, which we yeeld wholly to bee at your devotion and command. Hitherto wee have lived freely under the patronage and protection of the Romans, next unto whom wee know not any more powerfull then your selves, and therefore we seeke for refuge under the wings of your valour. So that we may by your puissance be superiour of our enemies, whatsoever service you shall impose vpon vs, that will we willingly abide.

To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made answer in this wise.

"Know yee that the Saxons will be fast friends unto the Brits, and ready at all times both to assist them in their necessitie, and also to procure their wealth: with joy therefore returne ye Ambassadors, and with this wilfull-for tidings make your Country-men glad. Heretupon (according to promise) An Armie first into Britaine, and wisely recruited, which in short time freed the Land from the insulting enemies, & recovered the country unto the behoof of the Inhabitants.

(3) But how true this last clause is, may appeare out of the ancient Gildas, who thus recordeth it: To repress (saith hee) many transgressions of those their ancient enemies, which with cruell slaughters and hosties continually afflicted them, the Britanes fell to consult upon some convenient course therein to be taken. Lastly, all the Counsellors, together with the proud Tyrant, being blinded in iudgement, devised such a protestation, as in the end proved their Countries destruction; namely, that those fierce Saxons, a people savage and of basefull name, adous both to God and man, should be let into this Island, as it were in waies into sheepe-folds, to ravage (saith hee) the Northern Nations, then which priuile double so nothing was ever more pernicious and unhappie unto this Land. O senselesse and plunge it into deepest miserie of error! O desperate dunnel, and blinde blacknesse of minde! Those whom in absence were feared more then death, now of their owne accord are invited by these Princes of Aegypt (if I may so say) thus, surely counselling their Pharoas, to come and rest with them under one roofe. Presently out of the Denne of that barbarous Lioness rushed forth a kennell of her whelpes, in three lang y effels called in their Language 'Cy-mle, carried under full saile, and with ominous presages fore prophesying that for 100. yeeres they should possesse that Land unto which they then directed their course, and for halfe of that space, (viz. one hundred and fiftie yeeres) they should waste and depopulate the same. These being put on shore first in the East part of the Island, and that by Commandement of this vnsoueraigne Tyrant, there sit forth their terrible peres, pretending to the Islanders, defence of their Country, but more truly intending the destruction of them. To be first said Leoness finding that her first troupe of whelpes fed so well, sends againe a greater Rabble of the same Litter, which here arrived in Flotes, bringing with them some other Associates of hostility and vauable blood. And these beginning, the steps of vengeance, and the roots of bitterness, (an accursed plantation well befitting our demerits) have sprung up, and put forth in our Isle their haughtie boughes and spreading branches. This barbarous Nation thus admitted, professing themselves our Soldiers, and such as would endure all hazards (so they found) in defence for their good Hosts, first they created supple of victuall only; which being given them, for some time stopped (As we may say) the Deys mouth: but when, afterwards they complained that their wages was not beautifully enough paid, dening of purpose colourable occasions of quarrell, and threatening that unless they might have more magnificent entertainment they would with the breath of conceited flouts and waste the whole Land. And without further delay, they feared these threats with deeds (for our Sinnes, the cause of deserved reuenge, were still manifest) and the first kindled Eastward, as if a flaming by these sacrilegious men from Sea to Sea, crying not to consume all the Cities and Countries bordering therewith, untill such time as burning welcome all the Inland Sides of the Island, it breked (as it were) with the red tongue of the flame the very Western Ocean it selfe. In this violent invasion, comparable to that of the Assyrians against the Land of Israel in old times, is historically fulfilled also in vs that which the Prophet by way of sorrowfull lamentation uttereth: They have set fire vpon thy holy places, and have burned the dwelling place of thy name, euen vnto the ground. And againe: O God the Heathen are come into thine heritage, thy holy Temple have they defiled: for all the Fortifications demolished with their Engines, and the Inhabitants together with the Bishops of the Church, and also the Priest and people, with glittering swords and crackling flames, were all at once laid along vpon the ground, yea and (which was a most lamentable sight) the stately Towers, high mounted Walls, and the sacred Altars lay all tumbling together (all piled with the broken and bloody Quarters and gauded Carcases mixed as in a horrible woe-press. Neither were there any other Sepulchers abroad, save the ruines of building, and the bowels of wilde beasts and birds.

(9) During this most wofull, desperate, and tempestuous season (saith the mournfull Hieronym) some pure Remaines of Britanes being found in the Mountains, were flaine by whole heapes: others pined by famine, came and yielded themselves vnto their enemies, vpon composition to serve them as Bond-slaves for ever, so they might not be slaughtered out of hand: which granted, was repaid a most high and especiall grace. Others went over Seas into Strange Lands, flying under their forced Sailes with a lamentable and mourning note, that of the Psalmist: Thou hast giuen vs, O Lord, as Sheepe to bee deuoured, and hast scattered vs among the Heathen. Yet others remained still in their owne Country (albeit in fearfull estate, and continually suspecting hazard) committing their liues and sosenes to the high Sheepe Hills, to cragie Mountains naturally intrenched, so thick growne with Woods and Forrests, yea and to the Racks of the Sea.

(10) Thus was Britaine brought to the period of her glory, and the people miserably subiect to a foraine Nation, about the yeere from Christs Nativity 473. and after the Romans last farewell 28. In which time you see they were most cruelly purified with all calamities of warre, and lastly betrayed by them in whom so much trust was reposed, as mournfull Gildas hath ruefully declared.

THE SAXONS ORIGINALL.

CHAPTER II.

A times decayed Ruines have stopp'd the Passage of those small Springs issued from the first fountaine of Nations beginnings, and bane diverted their Streames far from any sure Courſe, or certain known Heads; ſo the originall parent, place, and name of our Engliſh Saxons, have bin writte with a pen of ſlight touch vpon the leaves of obliuion, or elſe recorded in thoſe obſcure Roules, that as yet lie bound vp in the Office of Times forgetfulneſſe: whereby it reſts doubtfull from what root theſe branches firſt ſpring, ſome bringing them from Aſia, ſome from Africa, ſome from Aſia, ſome from Denmarke, and ſome without all likelihood from Britaine it ſelfe.

Ocea Starcklyſa a Friſlander borne, affirmeth theſe Saxons to come of Saxa a Prince of India, who with his two brethren were baniſhed by lot to ſeek their deſtines abroad, their owne Countries being peſtered with our many people at home. Theſe (ſaith he) following Alexander the Great into Greece, became Progenitors to their Countries, that from them receiv'd their off-ſprings and names; as that from Friſo the eldeſt, his Friſlanders defended; from Saxo the ſecond, the Saxons vpon the River Albiſ, and from Brano the youngeſt, the Inhabitants of the Dukedome of Brandenwicke. And of this opinion alſo Saxidius Petri ſeemeth to be. Crantzius doth derive them from the Cattin Germany, and the Phrygians a Region in Aſia; to omit others, who would bring them from Saxa the brother of Vandale.

(2) F. Aſinius a learned Author, doth thinke the Saxons to be defended from Saxa, a people in Aſia, and that afterward in proceſſe of time they came to be called Saxons; as if it were written Sax-fines, as much to ſay as The ſonnes of the Saxa. To this opinion Maſter Henry Ferrer, a Gentleman of ancient deſcent, great reading, and a iudicious Antiquary agreeeth; whole iudgement for my particular, I have alwaies honoured, and from the Prognos of his Engliſh Monarchie have taken my principall proceeding in theſe Saxon Succellors.

(3) As touching the ancient place of their abroad, Ptolemie the Alexandrian placeth the people Soſones in the Inner Scythia, betwixt the Mountains Alm & Taporand. Ammian Marcellinus ſitteth the Saxa (no doubt the very ſame) a fierce and ſavage Nation, to inhabit overgrown places, commodious onely for cattell, at the foot of the Mountains Aſic-movis and Comanus, nere unto which the Cities Alexandria, Trivandra and Dreſſo were adjoyning, and are ſoſet by Ptolemie. Neither is it leſſe probable that our Saxons defended from theſe Saxa in Aſia, then the Germani from thoſe Germani in Perſia, of whom Herodotus writeth. And Ioſeph Scaliger, a renowned Author, ſheweth, that theſe words fuder, moder, lander, utcher, land, and ſuch like, are at this day found in the Perſian tongue in the ſame ſenſe, as we ſee Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bound, &c. a great indocement (as ſome thinke) for the Saxons originall from thoſe parts; though in my opinion the Latine, Peter, Adeſer, Frater, have no leſſe affinity of bound, and in all likelihood were the Primitives to theſe of ours. Of theſe Saxa, Strabo writeth that they made Innations into Countries lying farre off, as namely Armenia, where they left the memory of their ſucceſſe in a part of that Country, by calling it Saxoſa, after their owne name.

(4) From theſe parts of Aſia, as Scythia and the reſt, one Band of them, conſiſting chiefly of their Yonth, proceeded by degrees into Europe, and poſſeſſed the Neſſe, or Fordland, which the Romans called Cimbria Cheroſus, being at this day the continent part of the kingdome of Denmarke. In which place they were firſt knowne by the name of the Saxons. And here alſo they among themſelves beganne firſt to be diſtinguiſhed into other Tribes, as Halt-Saxons (for ſo Perſes, out of their old Chronicle, ſaith they were called) for their keeping in the Woods; but more properly (wee may ſay) into Saxons, Angles, and Jutes. From hence afterwards they departed, and paſſing over the River Elbe, diuided themſelves into two Companies; whereof the one taking into the vpper parts of Germany, by little and little intruded themſelves into the ancient Seat of the Saraceni, which now of them is called Weſtphalia and Saxony; and the other inroched vpon Friſland and Holland (then called Batavia) with the reſt of thoſe Countries that lie along the German Seas.

(5) The time wherein theſe Saxons ſhould thus inleſt Germany, by Ocea Starcklyſa verduſt, is as ancient as great Alexander: others account it long after, in the raigne of Thiberius. But before Ptolemie we finde them not mentioned by any Author, who flouriſhed in the daies of Antoninus Pius, about the yeere from Chriſt Natiuitie 140. And moſt certaine it is by Eutropius and Beda, that before the yeere three hundred, when Diocleſius ſwaid the Roman Scepter, the Saxons out of Cimbria Cheroſus ſore offended the coaſts of Britaine and France, with their many piracies, and were fearfull euen to the Romans themſelves. Theſe multiplying in number and ſtrength, ſeated in the Meritime tract of Iſeland, Sleſwick, Holſtate, Danmark, Breme, Oldenburgh, all Engliſh and Holland; and indeed according to the Teſtimonie of Fabius Quaſtor, Wholely all the Sea coaſts: from the river Rhene unto the Citie Dona, which now is commonly called the Denmarke; and with him Henry of Eſford affirmeth Saxon land to ſtretch from the River Albiſ onto the Rhene; the bounds of no one people of all the Germani extending any way ſo far, ſaith he.

(6) But theſe ſpreading Bonghes, are brought by others from a neerer Route, planted not in Aſia or Scythia, but rather in Europe and in Germanie it ſelfe; grounding their opinion from Cornelius Tacitus, who maketh them to be bred in the ſame Country, though diſtinguiſhed by Name from the reſt, as others more beſide then were. Which Saxons (ſay they) though they were not mentioned by Tacitus in his Deſcription of Germanie, yet in Pliny, that wrote not much about ſortie yeeres after him, they are named; as alſo the Gata, and the Angli, Copartners of their Conqueſt. Tacitus placeth among theſe Germanes that worſhipped Herthum the Mother-earth for their Auoourie Goddeſſe; at firſt but one People, but afterwards diuided into three ſeueral Tribes; that is, the Saxons, Angles and Jutes, who left the remembrance of their Names ſtamped (as it were) in the ſoile from whence

(7) Ptolemy, among the Saxonijs in Germanie placeth the Saxons neere to the mouth of the Ruer Albis, in the continent of Cambria Chersinensis. And in this Iland of Britaine, Beda telleth vs, that the Kingdomes of the East and West Saxons were of them peopled: Whole originall Name, besides the Indian Saxe or the Seythian Saxe, some will haue Etymologed from Saxum a Stone, becaufe forsooth these people were hard or Stone-bearded; and some againe from the Axones in Gallic, of whom Lucan maketh mention in this his verse:

(8) Iustus Lipsius coniectureth, and Engelssius affirmeth (as Perisgion saith) that the name Saxon, tooke the appellation from the Falsion of the trepan that vssually they wore, which was a Crooked Boring Sward, somewhat like vnto a Sittle, with the edge on the contrarie side, called by the Netherlanders, a Saxer, and by themselves Seaxen, and the shorter of like fashion for hand-weapons, Seaxes; such as were those that were hid vnder their Garments in the Masse of the British Nobilitie vpon Salisbury Plain, where Henric gaue the watch-word, Nimere oer Seaxes, that is, Take your Swords: three of which Knives Argent, in a Field Gale, were borne by Erkenwyne King of the East-Saxons, vpon his litle of Armes, as some of our Earls haue imblazed. And that their Name was so giuen them from their Weapons, some alleage their accustomed manner in wearing thereof, which vssually was to tresse the same oerwaith their backs when they went foorth to battle, whereby notice was taken, and that name attributed vnto them, as the like hath been vpon like occasion vnto others: for so in Asia the Serians were named for their skill in shooting in France the Picards for their long Pikes vsed in fight; and in Ireland the Gallagallies, which bare the Pollax as their principal weapon: and of latter times, vpon like occasions haue Surreymen growne both to particular men, as also to whole Societies; which may appeare in such as hauing vowed their volage and seruice for Ierusalem, were continually vpon their backs a red Crosse, whereby the name Cross-backe, or in old English, Crouch-backe, was to them attributed: in which ranke, Edmond Earle of Lancaster (second sonne to King Henry the third) was a principall, and thereby got that name, which he could not claw off from his backe euer since. So likewise those men who entered that Religion of Monachall life, were vssually vpon the outside of their Garments the signe of a Crosse, whereby that Order was distinguished and noted from others by the name of Crouched or Crossed-Friers. But whence or howeuer the name arose, among all the Germanes there were none in reputation for millicane deeds comparable vnto these Saxons: neither had any aduentured by Sea and Land so farre to purchase renowne and praise, or perhaps (and that more likely) to supply their owne wants; ranging often from place to place, as men alwaies ready to enter any action: and in Germanie to this day a great Duke doth retaineth from them the name of Saxen.

(9) The Guta (no doubt the Saxen) Ptolemy likewise placeth in the Iland Scythia, lying very neere the Coasts of Germanie, vpon whose vttermoost Promontorie (as such an ancient Manuscript) the Isles did for certaine inhabite, which vnto this day of the Danes is called Island. These Isles, Gutes, Gotes, or Goths (or as Beda calles them) Fries, gaue names to those parts of Britaine which they inhabited, as to this day the Isle of Hyshe beareth their impression. This variety of names we will no further inforce, then that these Guthes were not the same that had passed Ister by Pontus Euxinus, and ouer-rannc Europe, who were also called the Guta by Isidore. Their name, as Perisgion will haue it, was taken from their agilitie, or swiftnesse of foot: and some of them (as Sebastian Manfrier declareth) went and inhabited among the Mountaines that diside Germanie from Italy, whereupon their name came to be called the Hill-Fries, which are now the Hemuntani.

(10) The Angles (by Fabius Ragufer Reliquarianus, an ancient Writer, and a Noble Person of the Saxons Royall Blood) are brought from Old Anglia, a Portion lying betwixt the Countreies of the Saxons and the Guts, as he wracth them, whose chiefe Towne was by them called Stefane, and of the Danes, Hastby: but (more particularly) it lay betwixt the Citie Flomburge and the Riuer Sty, which Countrey by Albertus Cranzius is called Anglia. From hence (saith Henricus Ranzianus) the Saxons, who were also called the Anglo-Saxons, went to aid the Britanics. And as this day there is a litle Province in the Kingdom of Dania, named Angel, beneath the Citie Flomburge, which Inde becometh called Little Anglia. Their site notwithstanding is placed by most Authors in Westphalia, where the Citie Engers standeth, and where Tacitus and Ptolemy rangeth them among the Saxonijs; which in their times might very well be. Others would haue them in Pomerania, where the Towne Engelen doth somewhat found their name: so doth Engelwin, Engleburg, and Engelwin, places in Germanie, beare witness, and are prynces of their footing among the Langobards and Serians. But the most glorious remembrance of that their name hath bene for these many ages in this Kingdom of England: though Saxa Grammaticus (as erst we touched, Lib. 3. Cap. 2) will needs haue Anglia named from Angul the horne of Humblot, and Giant-like brother of Danua the first King of Denemarke. But Albertus Cranzius being offended at his folly, telleth him that England had the name of Britannia many hundred yeeres after that Angul was dead. Others there are that deriue the name England from the manner of this Ilands situation, being narrow in the West and North, for that Eng in the ancient Tentank Tungoe, as well as in the moderne, doth signifie Narrow, Strait, or a Neeke; and to that purpose doth produce this verbe of a Portugall allusion:

Anglia terra exat et fertilis Angulus Orbis, Infula praelux, quatenus exat orbe

*A fruitful Angles, England then, another world art said:
An Island reeb, and hast no need of other countries aid.*

(11) Calliopine without prooffe deriueth the Name frō Queene Angula: but as weake a ground as those who will fetch it from their Angel-like faces, alluded vnto by Pope Gregory the Great. Or that of Gouepius, from the Angle or Pishing-hook, becaufe, saith he, they hooked all things to themselves, and might verie well therefore be called Good Anglers: a very meane conceit in sooth. But howeuer, most certaine it is that these Angles stole the name of this blessed Iland from their elder brethren the Saxons (as Isidore did the birth-right from Efas) and called it after their owne; as we shall further shew when our Historie hath gotten to the age of the Saxons Monarchie.

(12) These all claime their descents from Prince Woden, called by our Antiquaries, as Otho bene said, from the eldest Sonne of the Patriarke Nash, and is accounted the most noble of all the Progenitors of the Saxon Kings, in so much as they, and especially the Anglo-Saxons, our Ancestors, haue (in their superstitious conceit of such widdon goddijmagined Woden to be their principall God of Bardell) whose Wife named Frea, was by the like fancie held a Goddess, of whom more hereafter.

(13) Their head issue between them sundry Sons, and from sue of them, all the Monarchs of the English-men haue claimed to haue bene descended. It is the first being reported to be the Progenitor to the Kings of the Kentishmen: Cafer the second, to the Kings of the East-Angles: Wihelme the third, to the Kings of the Mercians: Wegde the fourth, to the Kings of the Dierians: and Beldy the fifth, to the Kings of the

This may suffice for the Originals of these three people; who, as Cæsar affirmeth, retained still the same manners after they were seated in Europe, as they had formerly done in Asia. And what those were, let vs heare the reports of Tacitus, and other ancient Authors, who together with the Germans (among whom they dwelled) doe thus describe them.

Op.

THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT SAXONS.

CHAPTER III.

These Germans, and among them the Catti and Saxonians, (our Ancestors according to Albertus Cranzius) were a people (saith Tacitus) well set, fierce of countenance, tall of stature, gray eyed, and of a fierce aspect, and their haire yellow.

Vnto whom, Witchindus the Monke addeth and saith, that They were faire of complexion, cheerful of countenance, very comely of stature, and their limbes to their bodies well proportioned, bold of courage, hardy in fight, and very ambitious of glory: for which parts (saith he) the Franks had them in great admiration, and wondered at their new and strange attire, their armour, and their busbie lockes of haire, that from their heads over-spread their shoulders, but about all, at their constant resolution, and valiant courage. Their heads and beards they suffer (saith Tacitus) to grow at length, and never put off that curved ornament and band of colour, vntill they haue slain an Enemy: but then upon blood and spile, they vncouer their forehead, and say they haue paid backe the price of their birth, and thinke themselves worthy of their Country and parents. Their curled lockes (saith he) they binde up to knots, and standing on end, tie it in the crowne only, that is the humble care they haue of beautie, to seeme more terrible to the Enemy. And by Sidonius Apollinaris his testimony, they vied to haue off the haire of their heads, reseruing onely a tuft in the crowne, about which they wore a hooke or plate of copper, which caused the haire to stand vpright, as by this his verses appeareth.

*Illic Saxona cæruleum videmus, Adjectum anti sula filum timore:
Cum vertice extimus per aras,
Non contenta suis tenere moribus,
Alit lamina marginem comarum:
Et sic crinibus ad cultum recipi Decepsit caput, addidit, cultum.*

In English thus:

*There doe we see the Saxons clad in blew,
Bald on the Sea, but fearefull new on Land:
Their brightest tops upon their crownes that shew,
Are not content to hold their wonted band,
But raise in tufts, where all the rest, doth stand
Bare naked shew'd, and hath no haire at all,
Which makes full fed'd, but heads seeme passing small.*

(2) And that they were indeede bold vpon the Seas, Agrippinus witnesseth. The Saxons (saith hee) a most valiant kinde of men, exceed all others in Piracies, in imitation of whom, Isidore affirmeth, that for their

valour and nimblenes in seruice they had their name: a people (saith he) stout, hardie, and most valiant, and farre out-stripping all others in Piracies, formed most fearefull to live on Land, then at Sea. Whole intrusions and sudden violence both France and Britaine with great dammages felt: for in Gallie they seized into their possession the Countrey of a Bascaisse, as is to be seene in Gregorius Turonensis, who thence termeth them Saxones - Bascaisses: and in Britaine an Office of Charge was instituted to defend the Coasts from their irruptions, the Captaine whereof was commonly called the Count or Earle of the Saxon Shore: of whose Piracies and Savage Cruelties, let vs heare Sidonius in his Epistle to Nomantius complaine: So many Rovers as you see (saith he) so many Arch-Pirates thinke you behold, they all of them together so command, obey, teach and learne, to rob and steale. There is no enemy so cruel as this, that setteth upon others at unawares, and as occasion serues, as warily slips himselfe away. Her sister at night such an encounter him: hee brings her to nought, shee that take no heed of him: whom hee can feth, hee surely ouertaketh: when hee feth, he is sure to escape. To this seruice, Shipwracks are him, they terrifie him not. Be there a Trespasse, the same strength them, and to assaile others. They neuer wey, how Ancour upon the enemies Coasts, but with a resolution a-gaine to returne: and their manner is to kill every tenth Captaine with a lingering and dolorous torment: for to such Vowes they binde themselves, and with such Sacrifices they discharge their Vowes againe, being rendered not so much purified by such Sacrifices, as polluted with Sacrilege: and the bloody and abominable Murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a Prisoner vnto death, then to set him free for a Ransome.

But when wee shall heare these vnbomane and barbarous reports either of the old Brittaines or these savage Saxons our ancient Progenitors, let vs neither be offended at Gildas, or at the reports of these other forraign Writers, who spake thus of them as they were then Heathens, and knew not God: the time of whose ignorance seeing God regarded not, as the Apolline teacheth, let vs acknowledge with due thanks the goodness of a most gracious God, who hath brought vs to a holier conuersion, and hath made vs Iudges of those fables in them, that we might flie them in our selues.

(3) Their Apparell was much different from others, and seemed strange to the Gauls, as Witchindus hath told vs: and Tacitus declareth the manner thereof: which (saith he) was a kinde of Caske, called Sagum, clasped, or (for want of a cloffe) fastned with a thorne, binding otherwise no garments at all, but going stark naked. Nevertheless the richer sort were distinguished from others, by their garments: which were neither large nor wide, as the Sarmates and Partians use to wear them, but strait and shewing the proportion of euery part of their bodie: besides they wore Felts made of beastes skin.

The Men and Women attire differed in nothing, (saith he, saith) that the women of those Saxons trimmed and adorned with purple, and without fescs, their arms bare, and before naked and uncovered. Yet Paulus Dia-conus speaking of the Longobards, comparing them to the Saxons, saith that their Cafticks were large and were long, most of Linen, trimmed and set out with very broad Gar ds or wels purplif, and embordered with fupery colours, and the rakes set with Pearls: their haires bound up in a copper boope, fixed on rests upon the crown, the rest curled and falling down upon their shoulders: their boards they kept still open, till they had killed an enemy: and for another note of ignominy, they waft an Iron Ring, as a figne of bondage, till they had cast it from them by the Conquest of a Man. Great Knives, or rather broad bending swords, they trusted upon little Shields that warr their backes, from which (as we shewed) Engulfus acknowledged they had their appellation. He that abandoned or left this shield in battle (saith Tacitus) was abhorred from their publick Sacrifices and Assemblies, the greatest disgrace that could be: for very shame and griefe whereof, many many times hanged themselves. And upon these Shields their manner was to lift up their new elected Generall, and with acclamations to carrie him thro-row their Campe.

is gotten by the sweat of their browes, when it might have versitie (saith he) that the same men should so much love flesh, and hate quietnesse. It is with them a great shame for their Primer to be overcome in Palour, but for any one to returne alive from that Battell wherein the Primer is slain, a perpetuall infamie and reproach.

And that their resolutions were ever noble, and their courage not daunted in dalliesse or bondage, it well appeared by a whole band of them taken by Symonius, and designed for the Romans pallime of Sarras-plaier,
who the same morning that this spectacle was ex-

(6) Their Lawes were severe, and vices not lugh-ed at, and good Customs of greater authority among them, then otherwise were good Lawes: no temporizing for favour, nor clemency for game, but stoutness in hospitality, and liberality in gifts, accounting both due to be given and received, yea and that without thanks: no Nation free from adultery, or punishing that sinne more severely. For the women after, having first her haire cut off, was turned forth naked out of her Husbands house, and that in presence of her sune hundred, whence she was covered with whips thro-row the Towne, without regard of birth, beauty, age, or wealth, and never after could finde another Husband. Those that were commonly lewd of their bodies, their manner was to drawne them in filthy weed, and to cover them with hides. Yea and greater punishments then these the Pagan-Saxons executed upon such offenders, as by the Epistle of Boniface an Englishman, Arch-bishop of Magunze, which he wrote unto Ethelwald King of the Merians, in reproaching his adulterous life, is manifested. For (saith hee) in the ancient Country of the Saxons (where there was no knowledge of God) if either a Maide in her Father's house, or one having a husband, became a whore, shee should be strangled with her sune hundred cleaved to her mouth, and the Carrion should be hanged upon the Post whereon she was buried. If shee were not soyle, then her Garments being cut away deare from the Girle's selfe, the chaste Matrons did scourge and whip her, and did strike her with knives: and so was the first from Trewe to Trewe, where other frends and new frends did meet and earnest her unto death.

And their Severe Lawes a long time remaining in the daies of Christianitie, doe declare with what rigor (without regard of person) they both examined and punished this offence: whereof that of Queen Emma,
the mother of King Edward the Confessor, is a sufficient example, who being accused for incontinencie of body with Althys Bishop of Winchester, was inioined to passe over nine Plough-shares Iron: glowing red hot,
the being blind-fold and bare-footed, by which trial shee is said to have acquitted herselfe, inso much that having passed them all before shee knew it, cried and said: O good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation? This punishment beginning in their Pagans, and continuing vnto the yeere 750. Stephen the Second, and most pious Pope of Rome, did vetelically abolish, as too severe and over-rigorous for Christians to undergoe.

The Virgins of these Saxons were never to be married but once, that they might have no other thoughts, nor further desire but in case of matrimony:
neither had the men plurality, excepting great Personages, and they lived vnto in regard of procreation, for to be without Children, was to be without reputation.
So that the testimony of Salmasius, which lived among them, fitteth well our purpose, saying; Though the Saxons are outrageous in cruelty, yet for chastity they are to be honoured.

(7) But as in these vertues they out-stripped most Pagans: so in the Zeale of their heathenish superstitious and Idolatrous service, they equalled any of them: for besides the gods, the Mother-Earth, whom the Angles our ancestors accounted for a Goddess of Aide: they worshipped Mercurius vnder the name of

(1) Their fashion was to goe forth singing to the Warrs, for rather they especially are said to march to battle, whereas others are said to goe) carrying before them certaine Images taken out of their converted Woods. Their manner was before they joined Battle, to trie by single Combat (therein trying one of their own against some captiued enemy) what successe was to be expected: and this they kept as a Law violatour, that none might presume to beare Armes before hee was solemnly admitted, where in a frequent Assemblies a Shield was given him by his Parents or Kindred: and this was the pledge (as it were) of his first honour, he being till then reputed but a particular of a Familie, but thence-forward a member of the Common-wealth. They are very comely, wife, and considerate in their service, in preferring chiefe Captaines, in following their Leaders, in shewing their rankes, in taking the advantage and benefit of the day, and interchanging in the night, holding fast one another, but colour attracts certaine. Their weapons, as testifies, Iuanes Pa-marinus, were long Spears, broad Swords, and the Crafbow: these they held in chief esteeme, that with a horse furnished, Shield, Sword, and Lance, their Virgins were received in marriage, accounting them for the greatest bonds, and the very Patron-Gods of Matrimony: which custom might well be taken from their neighbours
the ancient Saracens, whose Maidens vntill presented to their husbands a Trent and a Speere, in way of Endowrie at the entrance of their Nuptials. And among these Germans those Martiall habitations were in such vfe, that they did meet neither at Festiues nor in Council, but in their Armour.

Woden for their principall God of Battle: after whose victories they usually sacrificed to him their Prisoners taken in warres, and of him named one of the weeke daies • Woden-day, wherein hee was chiefie worshipping: whose wife named Frea, was by the like foolerie held to bee Fenna a Goddess, vnto whom another of their weeke daies was assigned for name and service; which of vs is called Fride.

Is likewise with them was a Goddess of great account, so was Essex, vnto whom they sacrificed in the month of April; whence it cometh (saith Beda) that they called April Easter-Month: and we still name the feast of the Resurrection, Easter. The Images of all these they still bare before them in battle, repining no small confidence in their aides: and yet (saith Tacitus) they thought it unseemly to paint their Gods on the shape of men; hauing euen by Nature doublet written in their hearts, a regard to that demaund of the Lord: To whom will ye liken me that I should be like him, with the halie one I knowe? They gaue great heede also to the neighing of their Horses, and to the flight and singing of Birds, as ominous fore-shewers of future euenes.

(8) These Superstitions, Ethelward euen in his daies complained of: That they had respected the Danes, Normans and Saxons, with the worship of this God Woden; vnto whom these barbarous Nations offered sacrifices, that they might be victorious where they fought. And as Cranes recordeth, Herald the first of that name, and Norwich King, was so farre merged, that he sacrificed two of his Saxons vnto his Idols: that he might obtaine a tempest to disperse, and put backe the Armado, which Herald King of Denmark had prepared against him.

This general defecion of Gods true worship, Adam Bromwich maketh mention of in this manner: In a Temple, saith he, called in their vulgar and native speech Fylde, which is made altogether of Gold, the people worship the Statues of three Gods in such manner, as that Thor the mightiest of them hath only a Throne or Bed: an either hand of him Woden and Essex hold their places. And thus much they signifie: • Thor, say they, beareth rule in the Aire, and governeth the Thunder and Lightning, Windes, Showres, Faire weather, Ceres, and Fruits of the Earth. The second, which is Woden, that is, stronger, maketh Warres, and misseareth manly valour against Enemies. The third is Essex, bestowing largely upon martiall men, peace and pleasure, whose Image they deaife and pouerrey with a great circle member. Woden they enage armed, like as we use to cut and expresse Mars.

(9) Their controversies and doubtfull matters were decided by drawing of Lots, which they euer made of some fruit-bearing tree, and was performed after this manner: If there were publicke cause, the Priest of private, the Goodman of the house, or worthiest in the company take they fittes of paper, dyed in red with certaine markes that had bene scattered at hys backe-card upon a white garment: and after prayers and invocation on their God, with eyes fixed upon heauen, and three times lifting the same lots aloft, gaue their interpretations thereof according to the markes therein inscribed, which was received and believed for a most sure Oracle: as the like was obserued vpon other occasions, both by the inspections of Beasts intrals, and singings of Birds, after the accustomed manner of other Gentiles, that doted vpon the augurations for things of future successe.

(10) For the generall gouernment of their Country they ordained twelve Noblemen chosen from among others, for their worthiness and sufficiency: These in the time of peace rode their severall circuits to see inflame and good customes obserued, and they often of course at appointed times met together, to consult and giue order in publicke affaires: but euer in time of warre one of these twelve was chosen to be King, and so to remaine so long onely as the warres lasted: and that being ended, his name and dignitie of King also ceased, becoming againe as before. And this custome continued among them, vntill their wars with the Emperour Charles the Great: at which time Witkeind, one of the twelve aforesaid, a Nobleman of Angria in Westphalia, bore ouer the rest the name and authoritie of King, and he being afterward, by means of the said Emperour, converted to the faith of Christ, had by him his mutable Title of King turned into the enduring title and honour of Duke: and the eleven others were in like manner by the said Emperour advanced to the honourable Titles of Earles and Lords, with establishment for the continuall remaining of these Titles and Dignities vnto them and their heires. Of whose defects are since illud the greatest Princes at this present in Germanie. But though they obserued this last forme of gouernment elsewhere, yet heere in Britaine it was otherwise, as hereafter will appeare.

(11) And thus much out of my poore readings, I haue obserued of the original beginnings, the names, manners and customes of our ancient Progenitors, the worthy Saxons, without either amplying or impairing their glory: who being of all the Germans so much deuoted to warre, as that their only fame therein was many times sufficient to daunt the Enemy, were thought vpon by the downe-cast Brittaines as the fittest to support their ruined Estate, of whose Entrance Conquests, and Kingdomes, wee are now next addrested to speake.

CHAPTER III.

Am. Do. 450.

Then the state of Brittain was miserable torn by the calamities of civil Disunion, Famine, Death, and Robbery, the Romans returned, and their own Strength decayed, and their Afflictions daily augmented by their wanted Enemies
 the Saxs and Picts,
 despairing hearts, that they called to their aid, under the Conduct of brethren, entered Brittain

 in the reign of Theodosius
 the second, three Emperors
 of the year of Grace 401: Received as Angels from Heavens after the accustomed way appointed them the situation.

(2) Their Sacoes in short time made proof of their Manhood. For overcoming the Enemy even in Sealand it left, feared chemifurians in some part thereof so that their Conquest freened absolute, and the Britains freed from their former afflictions. Peace thus feded, and the Inhabitants freed, a friendly Composition was made betwix these Nations, wherein the Sacoes undertook to maintain the Field, and the Britains to sustain the Charge. In which league they abode long certain time, faith Witbesniden, making view of a civil sort of the Brits fraternizing but so some as they perceived the Country large, the Soile fertile, and the hands of the Inhabitants slow to praise stiles of Armes; and further considering with themselves, that themfelves and the greatest part of the Sacoes had no certain place of abode, they found fault with their poor and want of ornaments, making that their quarrell, as both too mean, and too little for their high deserts, threatening withall, as unkind Gheils, that shortly they would reckon without their Hofts; and thereupon finding more for more of their Nation, entered peace with the Scots & Picts, who all together rose against the Heute Brits.

(3) And Herself, that by the gift of Wisdom had got the whole possession of Knowledge, lent for more supply of Science unto his ayde, proceeding inplements of their service in other parts, but indeede to make through his owne designs: and these swarming daylie over into Wisdom got the strength of munition and command of military affairs without impeach: For the King holding himselfe now free from all interceptions, gave his immoderate senses scope to nourish more freely their sensuall pleasures, and committed more audaciously those vices, unto which his owne corrupt nature was naturally addicted. This Herself soone perceived, and to adde more matter fit for blame, fed still the humors of this vicious King, outwardly shewing his care and readinesse for the Land's defence, his counsell and love to the Nobles estate, and his courteous carriage to the Commons in generally, but to the King an overperforming diligence, and servile obedience: by all which, ere it was long, he gave fire to the traine, that blew vp the foundations of the British policie.

(A) For feasting the King in the Castle of Tanger, commanded his daughter, a Lady of passing beauty, to attend the banquet, whose excellent feature and feebly behaviour, blew the sparks of desire forth into Vorigens wanton eye, that they precluded kindled a flame in his lascivious heart : for in the midst of his cups, Arwena (so was the damoisell called) with a low reverence and pleasing grace, lured the King with a cup of gold full of sweet wine, incharming it with these words in her language : Wien heal blaggo Cyng, which is in our English, Be health Lord King : he demading the meaning, would be taught to anlyve to her owne understanding, and said, Dynch heal, that is, Drinke health ; whereof when hee had pledged her (as we speake) this bowle infected his senses with no selfe thoughtlesse, then that of Belus is said to doe Dido, when Cupid played the child of Aeneas betwixt Eris and her. And brought more hale to the Land, then afterwards did that which was presented to King Iohn at Switzfeld Abbey by Simon the poisoning Monk : for notwithstanding that hee had a Reverent living, (himselfe not young, having sinned as many estates, in profession a Christian, whose Religion alloweth neither polygamie nor adulterie) did importunate Hensell that Arwena might be his wife : which at first with some tere of excuse and unworthinesse of person, was denied, but lastly consented unto, and the Nuptials performed. And now Fortune calling occasion daily into Ensign lap, hee gave his aspiring thoughts no rest, till hee had got the Crowne from Vorigens head, and seized all vnder the Saxons power.

(1) Heags and Heags in their Language, as also in the ancient Teutonic Tongue, doe both of them signify a Heafe, who which beaſt the Saxons had great regard, and whose neighings (ſaith Tacitus) were their preſages, and being white, were implor'd in their ſacreligious ceremonies. Virgil alſo maketh the Heafe to bee a luckie Oſſe or foretolden ſucceſſe in Battle, as in this line verſe he doth intimate and write :

And Cranium telies vs, that it was a viual thing with the Pagan Germans, especially of their Noble-men, to take the names of Beasts, some from the Lion, some from the Beare, some from the Wolfe, and some from the Horse, as heere Hengist and Horsa are said to signify.

(6) Which beast they bare in their shields of Armes at their entrance of Brittaine, and was blazed, such as Verfeylen, in this manner: A Horse Argent Rampant in a Field Gules: which was the ancient Armes, as hee affirmeth, of the Princes and Dukes of Saxony. And albeit those Dukes have of latter yeeres changed that Crest by doth Henry Julius, now Duke of Brunfwicke; amongst ancient Saxon Princes, who sometimes bore the White Horse in a Red Field, beare the White Horse for his Crest, hauing for his chief Crest of Armes, the two Leopards, which by Richard Cordell King of England was given vnto his ancestor Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, who had married Matilda the said Kings sister, and by the Emperour Frederic Barbarossa had been benefitted of his Armes, and Titles of honour. Moreover, Charles Emmanuel the now Duke of Savoy, who is lineally descended from the ancient Princes of the chiefe house of Saxony, by Prince Bera, who came out of Saxony into Savoy in the yeere of our Lord 993. and was the third sonne of Hugh Duke of Saxony, which Hugh was brother vnto the Emperour Otter the Third, doth yet beare for one of his Coats the said Leaping Horse.

(7) This Hengist was doubtlesse a Prince of the chieft bloud and Nobilitie of the Saxons, and by birth, of Angria in westphale, wherein vnto this day a place retaineth the name of Hengist-holt. Hee with his brother were the sonnes of one Wibgisl, whose father was Witta, and his father Fella the eldest sonne of Fedra, as Beda writes him, of whose illuse many Kings of sundry Princes (saith he) had their originall.

Hee growne now into high fauour with the King, by the marriage of Rowena, and feared of the Nobility for his strength and policie, bare himselfe great among all, and his supplies daily arriuing, peised (if it not plagued) most parts of this Iland. For such Nimian and Beda, the riches of Britaine, and the ferilitie of the soyle, were such motives to their enuie and offering, that where they got footing, there they kept standing, and picked occasions where they were too strong. Among the that were sent for, by the aduise of Hengist, two principall Captaines, Otha and Kliffa were chiefe, who being embarked in forty Pinnaces, sailed about the Fildes Coasts, waiting the Isles that were called the Oradeis, and got many Countries from them beyond the Friish, whereby a further terrour was stricken into the Britaines hearts.

(8) The Nobilitie perceiving what was in working, and the marke whereto Hengist set his eye to come, complained to the King of their dangerous estate, shewing themselves agreed to bee dispossessed of Offices and Charge, (as Gunning the Earle or Lieutenant of Kent, by Hengist had bene) the Land pestred with strangers, that fought their subuersion; reprooing him much for his match with that Infidel Rowena, his owne carelesse government and adulterous life, and in such manner, that Padoe Archbishop of London a man of great sanctitie, feared not to tell him that thereby he had endangered both his soule and Crowne, which words by Foringer were so digested, that shortly it cost the good Archbishop his life. But hee still continuing in his lasciuious and carelesse idlenesse, was lastly taught by his wofull experience, what miserie wilfull rashnesse and neglected government do bring, for the Britaines his subjects no longer would be thus abused, to see themselves wouen into greater danger by shew of defense, then they formerly had bene by the hostilitie of the enemy; but forthwith disclaimed their obedience to the King, when he had raigned the space of six yeeres, and chose for their Governour his sonne Foringer.

(9) His Sonne hee was indeed by nature, but not his in conditions, who (besides the quarrell of his Queene mother for Rowena like reuiled) bare an inward looe to his native Country, and an outward hate to the strangers that daily fought the subuersion thereof, and presently encountered with them in a pitched Battell neere vnto Ailsford in Kent, wherein Catigern and Horsa, brethren to Foringer and Hengist, in single fight hand to hand slew each other.

In which place Catigern was buried, and a Monument in memory of him erected: the stones wherof to this day appeare, and stand vpon a great plaine in the Parish of Ailsford, and from Catigern as yet is corruptly called Catichurche. The like Monument the Saxons vsed for Horsa, which time hath now defaced, and wherof Beda maketh mention, who saith, that a towne bearing his name was in his daies to bee seene in the East part of Kent. The credit wherof is continued to this day, where the Village Horsed is reported to haue received that name from him, which standeth in the very same place where that Battell was fought, as the Inhabitants report.

(10) Three other Battles after this with variable success were fought betwixt the Britaines and the Saxons, one at Craford, another at Weppe-fleet, and the third vpon Casmore in which last the Britaines bare themselves so valiantly, that the Saxons were driuen into the Ile of Tauer (if not out of the seas) so that (small hope rested for them so long as this valiant Foringer lived, who had dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in Tauer, as Felgen saith. After this Victorie long hee liued not, but was made away by poison through the means of Rowena the mother of all this mischief, when he had late King the space of foure yeeres; and the father againe reestablished.

(11) Foringer now was no sooner restored, but that Hengist had notice thereof, who was then in building a Castle at Leiden in Holland, as their Annals doe witness, and Iohn Dausa in his verities specifie: where leauing all (as it were) at runtime, returned to follow his fortunes further in Britaine, and with a mighty Armie of his Saxons thought to land without impeachment: but the Britaines growne bold by their former victories, and their blood not cooled since it was heat in fight, admonished their reestablished King, who with them went to withstand his arriue. When Hengist therefore perceived their courage, and knew their hatreds to him and his Saxons, hee fought by smooth words to gaine the flower; and by some stratagem, his wiued desired: therefore pretending only to visit his daughter, yea and to rid the Land of her, if so he might haue leaue of the King and them; and therefore desired a conference in friendly manner: after which, his Saxons should depart the Land, and rest the like friends to the Britaines as they were when first they came in.

(12) This motion seemed reasonable to the Nobilitie, and the place and time appointed, which was the first of May, and vpon the Plaine of Ambry, now called Salisbury: whither vpon equal termes (as was thought) each partie repaired, and a while conferred with friendly semblances, but in the end the Saxons vrging their wrongs, fel from words vnto blowes, the watch-word first giuen by Hengist their Leader. The Britaine meant simply, and as no weapons, according to covenants; but the Saxons vnder their long Callocks had short Skines hid, with which, an sooner the words, Nem owt Saxons, were pronounced, but that each slew him with whom hee conferred, by which treason the Britaines lost three hundred of their diuine Nobilitie, onely Eldel Duke of Gloucester, as Randolph Higden declareth, with a Stake gotten from the hedge, slew seuenteene Saxons. The King they tooke prisoner; for whose ransom, the Countiees of Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Northfolke, were deliuered vnto these Infidels, who shortly defiled the beauty of Christianity with their Paganisme and heathenlike cruelties. Then (saith Beda) the first day vengeance was kindled by these wicked Conquerors, and rayed flit vpon those Countries next adioyning, and afterwards from the East Sea vnto the West, without resistance made to quench the same, publicke and private houses were overthrown and laid low with the ground, Prasies were plaine standing at the Altars, and Bishops with their flocks were murdered; neither was there any to bury the dead. And these are the things wherof we spake, and wherein the miserable Britaines abandoned the Land or hid themselves in caves, wherein they either perished for hunger, or redeemed their liues with perpetual slavery.

(13) Neither were their calamities greater in outward afflictions then their soules, polluted with the heresie of the Pelagian, brought by Agricola, the Son of Suetonius a Pelagian Bishop, that did foulesly corrupt the faith of the Britaines: to redresse which, Germanus Apostolicall, and Leolin Bishop of Treua in France, were by the brethren desired, and sent vnto their their thus troubled and declining estate. These pillars of Gods truth, after they had poured forth prayers, and convicted the Hereticks, lead an Armie of Britains against the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victorie; after which (like unto people that drew on Gods vengeance and their owne destructions) they fell to robberies and rapine, one Clide banding against another, and all kind walley by the Saxons and themselves. These miseries doth Gildas impute to have hapned to his Britains, because they tooke no care to preach the Gospel of Christ unto the Infidels the English-Saxons, that in their heathen cruelties fought the Lands destruction.

(14) For everie thus dispossessed, for his further securitie betooke himselfe into Wales, where among those vast Mountaines hee built a strong Castle; of whose foundation, Merlin the Welsh Wizard, with the future successe that should afterward follow the Britains, hane by way of prophesie vainly spoken. This Castle most of our Writers have said to bee in South-Wales, vpon a rockie and solitary mountaine called Bregh, or after others Clairie, in the West of that Province, not farre from Radnor, and neere vnto the River Gnana; but the inhabitants of North-Wales report (by the reports of their ancestors) that an old Bricklayer was that Castle, which Forrigern built, and is yet called Embris, from Merlin Embris, as they ascribe. And surely (besides the craggy and solitarynesse of the place, which seemed to mee rather an entrance into the shadow of death, then to be the Palace or Court of a King) the River Lymere runneth much, by which Forrigern his sonne, begotten of his owne daughter Reuma, is said to spend his life in continual priers.

(15) But whilest Forrigern was busied in building this Castle, and the Saxons making spoiles wherefoever they came, the Britains vnder the conduct of Arthurs Arthurs, began to receive some breath of hopes, and to free themselves out of their Caves. This Arthurs (saith Beda) was a gentle natured man, which only of all the band of the Romans remained then alive, his parents being Rome, which had borne the name of the King of the Country. Hee with his brother Pier, commonly called Pendragon, returning out of Britian Arthurs, where they had remained from the Tyranny of Forrigern, landed at Canterbury in the West of this land; vnto whom resorted great Troopes of Britains.

His first Expedition was against Forrigern the seuerge of his Country, and murderer of his King: whose Castle straightwaies bee besieged, and hye the inst reuenging hand of God, with wilde fire consumed, wherein those adulterous and incestuous persons were burnt to ashes.

(16) Next, following the common Enemie, hee gaue battle to the Saxons on the North of Humber, at a place called Atatwell, wherein Henry was discomfited, and in flight taken by Earle Edal of Gloucester, and beheld at Canterbury, saith he of Arthurs. Howbeit, Atatwell of Westminster maketh him fight another battle vpon the River Dan, in Anno 489, wherein, saith he, Henry was taken. And Polydore saith, that in the same battle Henry as the first anse was Rome, with many of his Germans: the fame of whose victorie (saith he) is had in memorie with the Inhabitants of these parts even unto this day. Yet Gildas, Beda, and Ethelward, Writers of those ancient times, and two of them Saxons, mention not the death of Henry, neither this great victorie of the Britains. And Arthurs the Scottish Monke seemeth to ascribe the contrarie, where he saith, that Henry reigned thirty yeeres in great glorie, and died peaceably, leaving his sonne Eike to succeed him in the Kingdome of Rome. With whom also Florentius the Monke of Worcester agreeth. Howsoever, sure it is, had not the diuine power of God otherwise determined, the waning estate of Britaine doubleles had recouered her former strength, both by the prayers of Bishop German, the prowess of this last spoken of Arthurs, the valorous attempts of Pier Pendragon, and the worthy industrius of the Christian King Arthur. The famous rebellances of this last mentioned Arthur, the Monke of Monmouth with such fables hath augmented, that his Acts and Trauels may bee compared to those of Heracles, or with the Conquests of Cesar himselfe; inso much that he hath bene accounted and ranged in the Catalogue of the worlds nine Worthies. And surely (hy the testimony of Arthurs) hee was a Prince of great worth, and did often adventure with his small power to meet the Saxons in the face and in Field.

But the Britains through daily decreasing, and new supplies of these Saxons daily arriving, brought the one in despair to enioy their owne right, and the other to triumph in their intrusions of wrongs. For continually inroaching forward, and enlarging their limits wherefoever they came, those the inhabitants before them from their wonned possessions, & flint themselves in the southern and best part of the Land, laying the stones (as it were) of those foundations, whereupon in short time they raised their most glorious buildings.

(17) For every severall Captaine or Commander accounting that part his owne, wherein he first entered or made conquest of, with full resolution determined to keepe what he had got, and (as an absolute King) commanded his Province, wherehy the Land became burdened with seven of them at the first: as Henry of Kent, Eda, of those parts now called Staffe and Surrey; Cherdit, of the West; Ethelmer, of the East; Ida of the North; Crida, of the Middle-land; Vffa, the parts now Middlesex and Essex; which Kingdomes thus beganne and erected, stood not long withouten by euill dissensions among themselves, each King enuying his equals greatness, and seeking to enlarge his owne Dominions vpon the next. In which conuulsions, few or none of them came to the graue in due time, but were either flaine in warres, or treacherously murdered in peace, or else enforced to leave their life a Monke, and resigne his Crowne to another. To speake of all these together, I bold would bring too great a confusion to our Historie, and a needlesse surcharge to the Readers memorie: To auoid which, I will briefly fit downe the Conquests, Circuits, Acts, and Descents, that in every severall Kingdome happened while they stood in their Heptarchie, before they were united to an absolute Monarchie; and then (according to my prefixed purpose) I continue the Succession of GREAT BRITAINES Monarchs.

(18) For albeit the Land was diuided into 7. severall Kingdomes, and each of them carrying a fouraine command within his owne limits, yet one of them cuer seemed to be supreme of the rehand that Prince who had the greatest power or successe in his warres, was cuer accounted and called The King of the English, as Venerable Beda in the fifth Chapter of his second Booke, and Histotie of England, euer termeth them.

(19) Such therefore as held the rest vnder, either by Armes or alliance, in amitie or subjection, forsooke the whole Monarchy, and were acknowledged as Supremes in power ouer therof, which succeeded no cuer in the same Familie, neither continued in one and the same Kingdome without reuerfement, but were carried vpon the Floods and Ebbs of variable successe, or as desime pleased to alter the chance: whereof each of them (saith the Engl-Saxons only) did attaine to the height of that gouernment, as to the haufen of their wished desires. See therefore (if you please) a general view of the whole, and afterwards the severall Histories of every Kingdome apart, before wee enter into the Succession of the English-Saxons Monarchs.

THE KINGDOME OF KENT BEGUN BY HENGIST THE SAXON, WITH THE SUCCESSION OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSUES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER V.

KENT, the first Dominion of the Saxons Hephtharchie, was formerly in the daies of Julius Cæsar, the Seat of foure severall petty Kings, yet never called a Kingdome, before that Hengist, the first Saxon Captaine, in favour of his Daughter Bruna, got it by the gift of King Vortigern, about the yeere of Grace 455. and in the leuenth yeere after his first arriuage, heere he first laid the foundation of those fortresses which the Saxons his Nation in this Land afterwards attained vnto: for haniing possessed the same with Vitorie and Wealth the space of thirty one yeeres, (some adde three more) he left it in peace to his sonne Esk; and the rest of the Land so weakened by his meanes, that others of his Nation were shortly planted in other parts thereof. It contained the Continent that lieth betwixt our East-Sea and the Riuer Thames, being bounded vpon the West with Suffolke and Surrey.

Esk, the second King of Kent, is reported to bee the second sonne of King Hengist, who accompanying his fither into this Land, made proofe of his great valour in all his Battles fought against the Britaines, and in one of them (as Geffrey of Monmouth reporteth) being taken prisoner, was for a time retained in Turke, but thence escaping, hee aided his fither in the Battle of Crynsford; and after his decease, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, from whom those Inhabitantes (saith Beda) were called Eskings, amongst whom he peaceably reigned about twentie yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord 512.

Otha the sonne of Esk began his reigne ouer his Fathers Dominions, the yeere of Christs Incarnation 512. and reigned twenty two yeeres, without mention of any memorable Act.

Merth, the sonne of Esk, and the fourth King of Kent, reigned twenty five yeeres, saith Steu; twentie nine, saith Saul in his Table collected from our English Writers. He had issue, Ethelbert the first Christian King of Kent, and a daughter named Rekell, married to Shedda the second King of the East-Saxons, the mother of Selbert and Seegbold.

Ethelbert, the sonne of Merth, in the yeere of grace 561. succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, who by reason of his young yeeres, was fore molested by his neighbour Princes, that sought to enlarge their Provinces vpon him for now the Saxons hauing made full Conquest of the Britaines, fell at variance among themselues, taking all occasions to supplant each other, as Conquerours commonly can endure no equals, and prosperitie euer is looked at with an enuious eye; wherevpon Chlotin King of the West-Saxons, proud of his victorious successes ouer the Britaines, beganne to disdain all amitie with his owne neighbour Saxons, invaded the Territories of this young Prince, and in a first Battle slew Oslaur and Carleban, two of his Dukes, discomfited the King, and wonne the day. This field was fought at Wiphandun, in the yeere of our Redemption 567. and is noted to bee the first Battle betwixt the Saxons themselues since their first entrance into Britaine.

But young Ethelbert growne vnto yeeres; repaired his losses with the enlargement of his Kingdome to the banks of Humber, and was the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen, as after we shall heare. His first Wife was Berta, the daughter of Chelperic, King of France, by whom he had Edibald, Ethelburg, and Edburg: a second Wife he had vaworthy of name, for her incestuous and abominable act, in marrying her selfe in marriage with her Husbands Sonne, a finer (saith the Apollie) was to be named among the Gentiles. Of this King, as also of all the rest that attaiued vnto the glorie, to bee entituled (per excellenciam) the Soternaigne Kings of the Englishmen, I purpose to bee sparing in their particular Kingdomes, and to referre the larger relation of their Acts, Matches, Issues, and continuance, to the times of their severall Monarchies, whereby a more historical course may be carried, through the successions of the English-Saxon Monarches, and a needlesse repetition of the same things avoided, which otherwise of necessity would follow. Hee reigned in great glory fiftie six yeeres, and was the first Saxon King that received and established the Gospel. He died the foure and twentieth day of February, the yeere of Christ 616. after he had reigned 56. yeeres, and was buried at Canterbury, with this inscription vpon his Tombe:

Rex Ethelbertus hic claudius in Polindora, Fana pians Christo meat adhuc Meandre.

Ethelbert, the sonne of King Ethelbert, in the yeere of Christ 617. assumed the Government of Kent; who no sooner, saith Beda, had gotten from vnder the awe of his father, but he refused to entertaine the Doctrine of Christ, and so polluted himselfe with the foule sinne of fornication, as that hee married his Mother in Law, the late Wife to his owne Father: which two heinous faults gaue his subjects both occasion and impunity to returne to their former idolatry, who vnder his Father, for sinour, or for feare, had yielded to the Lawes of the Christian Faith. But the

the scourge of God & vengeance from Heaven wanted not to the punishment of this vassallfull King: for he was plagued for a season with often phrensic of minde, and raging fury of an vncleane Spirit; but by Laurence Archbishop of Cantuarby, he was at length converted from his Idolatry and incestuous Marri-mony, and being baptized, endeavoured to maintaine the state of the Gospell. He married Emme, the daughter of Thredbert, King of Asstru, now Lorraine, by whom he had issue a Daughter named Enfrith, who died a Virgin at Falkesbur, a Religious House in Kent of her Fathers foundation; and two Sonnes, whereof Ermenred the elder died before his Father, and left issue Dunpuna, who was married to a Mercian Prince Ermenberg that died a vailliant Virgin, Ermenberg a mention; and Ethelbert, both murdered by their Cousin-german, King Egbert. His younger Sonne was Dreombert that succeeded him in the Kingdome. This Ethelbold built a Chapel within the Monastery of Saint Peter and Paul at Cantuarby, in honour of Mary the blessed Mother of God, endowing that Church with sufficient maintenance; wherein, after the continuance of twentyfour yeeres raigne, he was buried nere to King Ethelbert his Father, Anno 640.

Ercreombert, the Son of Ethelbold by Emme his Wife, succeeded his Father in the Kingdome of Kent, in the yeere of grace 641. He was a vertuous, religious, and Christian King: for the Temples of the Heathen Idols he suppressed, and commanded the fall of Kent to be observed. His Wife was Seaxburg, the daughter of Aena King of the East-Angles, by whom he had issue Egbert and Lathare, both Kings of Kent after him; Ermenald, Wife to Wulfere King of Mercia, and Ethengode a pious Nanne in the Monastery of Saint Brigets in France, where she died, and was interred in the Church of Saint Stephen. In his daies the state of the Church growing to a well settled forme of government, the Prouince of Kent was diuided into Parishes by Maurice the Archbishop, as testifie the Records of Christ Church in Cantuarby. This King having reigned twentyfour yeeres and odde moneths, died in the yeere of our Lord 664.

Egbert, the elder Sonne of King Dreombert, in the monage of his yong Nephewes, Ethelred and Ethelbert, (the Sonnes of his Vncle Ermenred) obtained the Rule of Kent, and had not their murder much blamed his peaceable Governement, hee might well have held place with the worthiest of those Kings: but thirsting after an absolute soveraigne, and fearing lest his owne power should diminish by their groweth and rightfull successions, he set his mind on that bloody, traitorous, and vnusurall attempt, and with the assistance of one Thurme, found fit place and opportunite to worke that diabolish designe, calling their bodies into a Riner, that so their Murthers might not be knowne. But God (saith Malmebury) that searcheth the heart, revealed the act, by casting vp their bodies on the shore, and to the open view of the next Inhabitants, who with great reverence there buried them, and built a small Chapel over their Moniment, whose bones afterwards were removed, and new interred in the Abby of Ramsay in Huntingdon. The Lady Dunpuna their Sister, and next Heire to the Crowne, that was married to Merwald, a Prince of West-Mercia, and bore him foure Children, founded the Abby of Mauler in Kent: Wherein, saith Stowe, she became the first Abbess her selfe, and Mildred her daughter succeeded her therein, saith Capgrave. This King in great quietnesse reigned nine yeeres, and died in the yeere of grace 673. in the month of Iuly: leaving issue Edric and Wigred, both Kings of Kent, succeeding after Lathare.

Lathare the brother of Egbert, by strong hand obtained the government of Kent. For now withstanding Egbert left issue Edric and Wigred, (as is said) yet Lathare taking the advantage of their minorities, and the example of his brothers intrusions, made himselfe King against his, as he had done against the Sonnes of Ermenred, but did not enjoy the same with the like peace as he had done. For not onely Ethelred the Mercian warred strongly against him, but also Edric by the assistance of the South-Saxons continually fought to recover his right, whereby the peace of the Kentish was much molested: and lastly, in a bloody battell was Lathare thorow with a dart, whereof he died, vnder his Thurgesson hand, the sixth day of February, in the yeere of Christ 685. after hee had reigned eleuen yeeres and seuen moneths. The punishment of the Murder committed by his brother Egbert, was on him repaid, saith Malmebury, who deluded and made icits at the lamentations for yong Ethelred and Ethelbert, that were by the people held and accounted Martyrs. His body was buried with his Predecessors, Kings of Kent, in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul in Cantuarby, Anno 685.

Edric, the Sonne of King Egbert, having slain his Vncle Lathare in battell, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, wherein he reace only two yeeres, and those in continuall wages with his subiects; in which ciuill broiles lastly hee was slain, leaving the Kentish Kingdome so torne with dissensions, that it became a pray to many Vsurpers, and gave occasion to Ceadwalla the West-Saxon, to seek the annexation thereof to his owne Kingdome, who with his brother Melle entered Kent, and with fire and sword made waste where they came. To meet the, the Kentish assembled, and getting the advantage, burned Melle to death: in whose reuenge Ceadwalla perished, and waited the most part of that Prouince before he departed: so that after for six yeeres continuance no King reigned in Kent, but the Country lay exposed to the tyrannies of oppressors.

Wigred or Wihred, seven yeeres after the death of his Brother, tooke vpon him the government of Kent, which he purchased with the good opinion that his subiects conceived, and with a great summe of money paid to King Ina for his peace. He entered his Kingdome the yeere of Mans Redemption 693. the eleuenth of November, and two hundred and five yeeres, after the death of Hengist the first Saxon. With him reigned one Swiborda, in Rede declared; but without mention from whom, or vpon what occasion. He founded the Priore of S. Martin at Dover, and behauid himselfe worthily both in Warre and Peace: his raigne was thirty yeeres; thirty three, saith Rede; and death in Anno 725. leaving issue Edbert, Ethelbert, and Alrick, all three succeeding successively in the Kingdome.

Egbert, the first Sonne of Wihred, succeeded his Father in his Kingdome, vertues, & valours, whereby a peaceable government is allotted him by all Writers of these affaires, for the continuance of twentie three yeeres, without relation of any notable accident peculiar to himselfe and Kingdome: besides the appearances of two fearefull Comets, in Anno 729. and fourth of his raigne: the one arising immediately before the Sonne in the morning, and the other shewing his fierie beames presently vpon the Sonnes left, both of the m striking their gleames into the North, and by West, foretelling (it may be) the scourge and desolation that the Pagans intended, who were at that instant entered into France and Spain.

Ethelbert, the second Sonne of King Wihred, and Brother to the last King Egbert, began his Raigne over the Kingdome of Kent, the yeere of Mans Salvation 749. and reigned without any memorable act either of his, or of his Kingdomes affaires, the space of eleuen yeeres, leaving this life in Anno 759. and was buried, say some, in the Monastery of Peter and Paul in Cantuarby, without issue of his body to succeed him: bowbeit the Annales of Cantuarby affirms him to be buried at Reambers, in the Ile of Tant, whose Moniment is shewed at the vpper end of the South Ile in the Church, and is mounted with two Spires, if there be nota mistaking of him for Ethelbert his Successor.

death of his brother Ethelbert, obtained the kingdom of Kent, the yeere of Christs Incarnation 760. no other glory attending his affaires (saith Malmebury) besides his vnfortunate fight at Osteford against Offa King of the Mercians, wherein it seemed some honor (though with his overthrow) to withstand so puissant and impugnable anemie. Hee is the last King of Kent that held the scepter in a lineall succession: the rest that followed, both got and enioied it by tyranny and viurpation. This King is said to reigne thurty foure yeeres, and to die in the yeere of grace, seven hundred ninety three.

Ethelbert, surnamed Frea, viurped the Title and Authoritie over the Kentish Dominions, when that Province was fore oppressed with the inuasion of the Mercian Kenulfe, whole warres against Kent, by succession from Offa, were continued with such rigour and valour, that the Countrey lay desolate where hee had bene, and the people distressed whither he came. This Frea, Kenulfe tooke prisoner, and lead away with him into Mercia: but at the dedication of a Church that be had then founded at Wincheombe, in presence of ten Dukes and thirteene Bishops, hereleased him at the High Altar, without euer inreatie or ranfome of redemption. The King returning againe into Kent, could not there bee received, his place either being supplied by another, or himselfe so disliked, as not worthy any longer to reigne: and having had experience of the worlds mutabilitie, is left againe to his pri-uate fortunes, from whence hee had stepped, having held his estate but for three yeeres continuance.

Cuthred, saith Malmebury, was made King of Kent by Kenulfe King of Mercia, when hee had overcome and captivated Ethelbert: notwithstanding hee is accounted for an usurper, and bare the title of King the tearme of eight yeeres, without any other act worthy of remembrance; inheriting his predecessors euill happe and calamitie, through factions and ciuill discords.

Baldred, after the death of this Cuthred, tooke vpon him the princely dignitie of Kent, about the yeere of Christs Natuaitie 805. But now the heauenlie providence determining to bring againe together that which the Saxons had diuided, raised from exile little Egbert, to make him the Great Monarch of the English-men. His first wars were against Bernulfe King of Mercia, and his second against this Baldred, King of Kent, whom in Battle he vanquished, and forced him out of his Kingdom, after he had late on that princelie Throne the space of eighteen yeeres. This Baldred is said to haue fled ouer Thames, and to leaue Kent to the will of his Conquerour, whither againe he neuer returned, neither yet was heard of after his ouertrow. This Kingdom then that was erected by Hengst, the yeere of mans happinesse 455. continued her government 372. and ended her glorie in the yeere 827. being made a Province vnto the West-Saxons.

SOUTH SAXONS KINGDOME. THE CIRCVIT AND CONTIN- VANCE, THEIR KINGS, SVCCES- SIONS, ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER VI.

THE Kingdome of the South-Saxons, containing the Countreies of Sussex and Surrey, had on the East side Kent; on the South, the Sea and Ile of Wight; vpon the West, Hants-shire, and the North side inuerged with the riuer Thames. This Kingdome was erected by Elia a Saxon-Captaine, that in the second yeere of Hengsts entrance, as some lay, brought a supply of his Saxons into Britaine, with whom came his three sonnes, Kymen, Plenehog, and Cissa, these landing at a place which from Kymen was afterwards called Kymen-shore, and discomfiting the Inhabitantes, that made resistance, became himselfe King of those Southerne parts. But doubtlesse there are many opinions of this mans first entrance and new erected estate: for some (as M. Sautie in his Table) set it in the second yeere of Hengsts first arrivall, Anno 452.

Others in the second of Aurelius, and no less then thirty yeeres after that, Anno 482. Harrison will haue it forty three yeeres after the Saxons first entrance, and fourth yeere after King Hengst his death, Anno 492. And M. Ferris in his Succession of the English Monarches, placeth it in the three and twentieth yeere of King Hengsts Kingdom, and in the fifth after his owne arrivall, the yeere of our Redemption 488. Of such vncertaintie is the beginning of this South-Saxons Kingdom, whole Continuance and Successions are nothing clearer; inasmuch that Malmebury making severall Chapters vpon the other six, omitteth only this of the South-Saxons: and therefore as wee finde them, let vs haue leave to relate them, and for the present to leaue Elia as hee was King, till wee come to a fit place where more shall be spoken of him as he was Monarch; whose raigne is set by Stow to bee thirty six yeeres; by Sir Henry Sautie, twenty foure; and by M. Henry Ferris, thirty two, and to haue died in the yeere 514.

then onely living at his fathers death, succeeded him in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, (leaving the Monarchie to Cherdik king of the West-Saxons, who had planted his kingdome between him and the Brittains, having taken the charge of warre against them, for maintenance whereof, Cissa yielded him a yearly contribution) and living himselfe in long rest and peace, founded Chichester and Chisbury, the one a Citie for relief of his people, the other a place of repose for himselfe; which last he fortified about with a strong Trench, for a further defense against all dangers. Of any other his actions, little is recorded by Writers: onely in this they concur, that hee was a man of great age and small acts, some affirming that hee reigned the space of seventy six yeeres.

Eadwarch (by some called Ethelwulf and Athelwold) succeeded King Cissa in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, and was the first Christian of that Nation converted by Bishop Wulfred, as some conceive out of Beda: yet Beda saith expressly, that the King was baptized before *Wulfred*s coming. And the History of S. Southsaur saith, it was done by S. Berinus, Bishop of Durchester, who usually preaching the Gospel in the kingdome of the Mercians, in the Citie of Oxford, and presence of Walperus King of Mercia, it happened that King Athelwold, then a Pagan, was present, who by the inducement of Walperus, and instruction of Berinus received the lawes of Christianisme, whom also Walperus received at the Font for his God-father, and in signe of that adoption gave unto him two Provinces, to be annexed to his former kingdome, that is to say, the Isle of Wight, and the Province of Manures in the West of England; at which time also Berinus by *King Athelwold*s permission, baptized the chiefe Dukes and Nobles of that Province. His Queene Etha was baptized in her owne Re, the Province of the Pictians, being the daughter of Eanfride, who was brother to Eanbert, and both of them Christians. But

It is generally held, that King Eadwarch gave unto Wulfred the Peninsula (so the Latines speake) of Souther, now Selsey in the West, with the demaynes of eightie seven Tenements, wherein he built the Monastery, that bare the same name, and was his owne Episcopall See. Against this Eadwarch, Ceadwold a valiant young Prince, of the Blood-royall of the West-Saxons, being banished his Countrey, making head with the assistance of friends and followers, recovered his Territories with an impetuous incursion, and slew the King as he made resistance, when hee had reigned twentie five yeeres: in whose raigne and Countrey raged such an extreme Famine, that both men and women in great flocks and companies cast themselves from the Rockes into the Sea.

(4) Berinus and Anthus, two Dukes of the South-Saxons, maintained the Warres and defence of their Countrey against Ceadwold, and by manly valour forced him to retire. These Captaines bewixt them held the dominion of that Province, untill such time as Ceadwold had gotten the Kingdome of the West-Saxons; who bearing in mind the remembrance of his former proceedings, and thinking to enlarge his owne Kingdome with the subjection of the South-Saxons, entered againe that Province, and in Battell slew Duke Berinus, harrying the Countrey miserably before him. Which State, vnable to withstand the West-Saxons puissance, was by Juc, the next King succeeding, made a subiected Province, their Government thence forward resting vnder his Successors; after it had stood one hundred and thirteene yeeres: and ended in the yeere of Christ 601. by ordinary computation. But whosoever shall compare the times of the foresaid Kings, Walperus and Athelwold together, will easily finde, that it is not easie to finde the certaine concurrence of times, in affaires so clouded in obscurity, and so farre remote from our present times.

conquered by the Britanes, under the conduct of Natanlanda Brigis Prince, whose Country was then called after his name, whom he slew in Battle, with five thousand more of his Britanes: the fortune of which field gave resolutions and hopes of better success; it was fought there unto a Brooke upon that event called Cherdels-ford, now by contraction Cherd-ford. Hereupon establishing his new erected Kingdom, (which contained Cornwall, Dorsetshire, Dorchester, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hants, Berkshire, &c.) he enlarged the same with the conquest of the Isle of Wight, the government whereof was by him given to Staffe and Wihiger his Nephewes, which later slew the Britanes there inhabiting, and named the place of his victory Wihigerburg, assuming the name of King, and was buried at his City Wihiger, in the time of Albion. About seven yeeres after Cherdels entrance, Portia Saxon, with his two Sonnes, Megla and Teda, landed in the West, at the place from him called Portsmouth, whole and with Kent and Wessex, assisted Cherd in his Conquests. His reign is let to be thirty three yeeres, and his death in the yeere of grace five hundred thirtie five: having had two Sonnes, Canut and Chelwulf, the one of which died before his Father; and the other succeeded him in his Kingdom. Chelwulf had issue Cuthbert, whose sonne was Kenfrida, and his sonne Kenly, the Father of King Ethelric, who was the Successor of King Kenwulf and predecessor of King Kentwin, in the Kingdom of the West-Saxons.

Kentwin, the eldest Sonne of King Cherd, having formerly made proofe of his prowess in the assistance of his Father, was after his death also verie fortunate in obtaining two victories over the Britanes, the one at Searesberge, and the other at Brennberg, whose reigns beginning Anno 534, continued twenty six yeeres ending in the yeere of our Redemption five hundred fifty. He had issue three Sonnes, of which Chelwin the eldest succeeded him in his Kingdom, Cuthwulf the second assisted his Brother in his Warres, and was partner with him of his victories, who died Anno 672, leaving issue one only Sonne, named Chell, or Ceorbe, who proved nothing so vertuous and dutifull a Subject as his Father had bene: for he rose in rebellion against his Vncle, and by strong hand expelled him his Kingdom.

The third Son of King Kentwin was Cuth, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe: for hee had three Sonnes, of which Chelwulf the eldest, was King of the West-Saxons (as shall be declared) Chell the second, was father to Kingly the first (and last Christian) King of the West-Saxons, and Grandfather to Kenwulf and Kentwin, the seventh and ninth Kings of that Kingdom: and Chel the youngest, was father of Kentbert, Grandfather to Chelwulf the most renowned King of the West-Saxons, of whom we are presently to speake, and of them all in the succession of the English Saxons Memorials: and now to returne againe to the issue of King Kentwin.

Chelwin his first King, entered upon the government over the West-Saxons Anno 561. and even at the first began to disturb the quiet peace of his neighbour Princes, taking advantage at the young yeeres of Ethelbert, who was made King of Kent in the same yeere that Chelwin was, whom he discomfited, and slew his two Captaines, Duke Osulf and Duke Cuthbert, at Widdan, as we have said. Other Victories he obtained over the Britanes, both at Bedford, Derham, Gleesford, Cirencester, and Bathnesser. But the fortunes of warres being always variable, at length his success altered, and at Winton he was overthrowne, and dispossessed of his kingdom by Canute his brother Cuthwulf's sonne, when he had reigned thirty three yeeres. Hee had issue, Cuth and Cuthwin: the former served valiantly in the warres under his father at Winton in Surrey, where King Ethelbert of Kent was chafed, and his soldiers slaine: and with the like valour and victorie hee fought at Ferthungh against the Britanes, notwithstanding that therein he lost his life, the yeere of our Lord 585, and the five and twentieth of his fathers reign. Cuthwin his younger brother survived his father, but succeeded not in his Kingdom, being then (by reason of his young yeeres) vnable to recover his right. He had two Sonnes, Kenwald and Cuth, the latter of which was father to Chelwulf, whose son Kenwald had issue, the eleventh King of the West-Saxons, and Ingulf his brother, whose sonne was Eppa the father of Rafa, whose sonne was Alenwald, the father of Egbert the eighteenth King of the West-Saxons, who reduced the Saxons divided Heptarchy into an absolute Monarchie.

Canute the sonne of Cuthwulf, who was brother to this last King, succeeded in the kingdom by the election of his People, and was the fourth King of the West-Saxons. He began his reign in the yeere of our Redemption 592, and continued it the terme of six yeeres, without any memorable act by him achieved besides his Treason spoken of before.

Chelwulf the sonne of Cuth, the sonne of Kentwin, and Colen german to Canute the preceding King, began his reign over the West-Saxons the yeere 598, on whose first entrance, this province of the West-Saxons was invaded both by the Britanes, and also by the Saxons and Picts: and the East-Angles likewise molested his peace, under the conduct of Redwald at that time Monarch of the Englishmen. But hee wading thorow these troubles, learned the Promise of the South-Saxons with insinuations and calamities, in the prosecution whereof he died, leaving the pursuit of his warres and possession of his kingdom to Kingly his Nephew, that immediately succeeded him, after he had reigned the space of fourteen yeeres.

Kingly the Sonne of Chelwulf, who was Brother to King Chelwulf, succeeding his Vncle in the kingdom of the West-Saxons, in the yeere six hundred and twelve, in his third yeere associated unto him in his Government Quinchine his Sonne, who jointly managed the West-Saxons affaires both of warre and peace. And fighting with victorie against the Britanes at Beandone, they there slew of them one thousand forty six persons, and after that against Penda King of Mercia, nere unto Cornwall, about the fifth yeere of his reign, where lastly they came to a conclusion of peace. This King at the preaching of Bertram (an Italian Divine) altered and repared for a Saxons and by the persuasions of Osward the most Christian King of Northumberland, (who was a sister to become his Son in Law, by the marriage of Kentwin's daughter, and was made his Godfather by receiving him at the Font) received the Word of Life, and became the first Christian King of all the West-Saxons: in witness whereof, he gave the City Dorchester, nere unto Oxford, to his Converter, who therein erected his Episcopall See. He reigned the space of thirty one yeeres, some say but seven and twenty and had issue (besides Quinchine, who reigned with him, and died before him) Kentwin and Kenwulf, that succeeded him, and Kentwin his Daughter married to Osward, as is said. Quinchine had a Sonne named Cuthbert, that was baptizd with his Father at Dorchester, and is said by Stowe, to have reigned after the death of Kingly: but I take it rather to be Kentwin, whom some suppose to be his Fathers Associate the terme of foure yeeres, but never sole King himselfe.

Kenwald, whom Beda calleth Sennwald, succeeded his Father Kingly in the kingdom of the West-Saxons. His beginnings by Matthew of Westminster are compared to be with the worst, and his endings with the best of those Kings. At his first entrance he fought with victorie against the Britanes at Penmon, whereof he became most insolate, and refused not only to receive the Christian Faith, but also put from him his law full wife Seaxburg, the sister of Penda King of Mercia, whereby hee became hateful to his owne Subjects, and sore assaulted by the Mercian King, who followed the reuenge so farre, that he forced Kenwald out of his kingdom, who being driven to extremity, sought succour at the mercie of Anna the Christian King

He founded the Cathedral of Worcester, and the Abby of Malmesbury; and when he had raigned thirty one yeeres gave place unto nature in the yeere 673. leaving no issue of his body to succede him: whereupon Seigburg his wife tooke upon her the government of the West-Saxons, the same yeere that Lathair was made King of Kent, there being a woman of great spirit and vnderstanding, and sufficiently worthy to haue managed the Kingdome, had not bene prevented by death, or rather (as some write) by a religious deuotion, that the affaires of this present life might not hinder her zealous meditations of the future, in desire whereof, she abandoned her Regence, and built a house of deuotion in the Ile of Shepey, wherein her selfe became a Nunne, and a cloister Abbess of 40. | nature her selfe was thereon offered, and hee at last as much lamented: in repentance whereof, after hee had raigned in great stoutnes the space of two yeeres, in a zealous deuotion went to Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Easter Euen (saith Bede, the yeere of our Redemption 689.) by the name of Peter, and wearing as yet the white Robes of innocencie, put (as the rite then was) vpon him at his last of Napsines, fell sick, and the twentieth day of April following died, having had neither wife nor childe that we read of. He was buried in Saint Peters Church in Rome, vnder a faire Monument, with this inscription thereon engrauen: Henric Cedual, otherwise named Peter, King of the West-Saxons, is buried, who died the twentieth of April, in the second Indiction, and liued thirty yeeres or thereabouts, when that noble and mighty Prince Iustinian was Emperour of Rome, and had reigned foure yeeres in the Emperour, and Sergius a true pastore of the Apostles, had sat two yeeres in Peters Seat. His first attempts were against the Kentish-Saxons, in reuenge of his coles Malmes death, whose wrath Wulfere pacified by the payment of thirty thousand Markes, with William of Malmesbury. In the yeere of Grace seven hundred and eight, and twenty one of his owne raigne (as Matthew of Westminster hath obserued) he fought with the Brittaines vnder their Capitaine Gerast, whom he victoriously subdued: and in his twenty sixth yeere, against Cherdik King of Mercia, with a doubtful victorie, at the place then called Waldenbury and in his thirty sixth, invaded the South-Saxons with such successe, that hee reduced the same Kingdome into a Prouince, and annexed it in subiection to the West-Saxons: and manifesting his good desires both to the administration of Justice, and the aduancement of Diuine Piety, hee ordained many good Lawes for the amendment of manners in his people, which are yet extant written in the Saxon Tongue, and translated into Latine by the learned M. gave rich ornaments thereto, as Altar, Chalice, Censer, Candlesticks, Basin and holy water, Buckets, Images, and Pale for the Altar, of an incredible value: for the gold trechupon belov'd, amounted to three hundred thirty three pound weight, and the silver to two thousand eight hundred thirty five pound, beside precious Gemmes, embroch'd in the Celebrating Vestures. Hee instructed also a certaine yeerly payment to the See of Exeter, assigning every one of his subjects that possided in his house of one kinde of goods to the value of twenty pence, that he should pay a penny to the Pope yeerly upon Lemmas day: which at first was contributed vnder the name of The Kings Almes, but afterwards was called and challenged by the name of Peter-pence. At length, by the insigation and earnest perswasion of Ethelburga his Queene, hee renounced the glittering glorie of his present and princely estate, wherein hee had in great prosperitie reigned thirty seven yeeres and odder moneths; and professing a voluntarie penitencie, (so great was the zeale, and so little the knowledge of that age) went to Rome, where in the habit of a Religious Man he ended his life in poore estate; and Ethelburga his wife became a veiled Nunne, and was made Abbesse of Barking nexe London, wherein she ended her life. The brethren of this line, were Kent, whose sonne was Adelme Abbot of Malmesbury and Bishop of Sherborne, and Inge that was the progenitor of Egbert the first Saxon Monarch of the whole land; and his sister Cuthberga, married into Northumberland, sued a divorce against Offa her King and husband, and in the habit of a Nunne ended her daies at Winchester in the Countie of Dorset.

Ethelard the kinsman of King Ina (whom hee ordained his successour at his departure to Alfred) was the sonne of Offa, and he of Ethelwald the sonne of Kinbold, the brother of Cuth, and both of them the sonnes of Cuthwin, the sonne of Cheswin, the sonne of King Kennil, the sonne of Cherdik, the first West-Saxon King. He began his reign the same yeere that King Edgar did his ower the Kingdome of Kent, and with him was terrified by the dreadfull appearance of two Blazing Starres: of whole Acts, no other mention is recorded, saving that at his entrance into regal estate, Offa a Norman of the West-Saxon blood, emulated his glorie, and troubled the quiet peace of his prosperous beginning: but not able to winne fortune to favour his proceedings, hee quite abandoned his native Country, and so left Ethelard to rule the Kingdome in peace, who therein quietly reigned the space of fourteene yeeres, without any mention of wife or issue.

Cuthred, cozen to King Ethelard, succeeded him in his Dominions, and was much disquised by Edith the King of Merca, both by open warre and priuie practices: but these two Kings coming to a conclusion of peace, ioined both their Powers against the over-borne Brittaines, and in a bloody battle gaue them a great overthrow. In this time, faith Beda, the bodies of the dead were permitted to be buried within the walles of their Cities, which thing before was not lawfull, but their corpes were interred without in the Fields; many of whose Tombes as yet are witness to vs, that daily find them in the digging of the grounds adjoining, and refferre them for sight, or other necessarie vse.

The peace of this King was molested by his owne subject, an Earle named Adelme, who boldly encountered his Soueraigne in Battle, and fought it out euen to the point of victorie, but failing thereof, and forced to flee, his life was pardoned. And hee made General against the Mercians & Danish, Cuthreds ancient foe, wherein by his valiant prowesse, with the flight and discomfure of the Enemie, hee made a wortheu amends for guerdon of his life, and was euer after held in great fauour and honour. This King reigned in great fame and victorie the space of fourteene yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lords Passion 751. Hee had issue one onely son, whose name was Kennil, a valiant young Prince, who in the ninth yeere of his Fathers reign was kildiously slaine in his Armie, for bearing himselfe (as it may seeme) over-rigorous towards the Souldiers.

Sigbert obtaining the Principallie of the West-Saxons, reigned therein no long time, and that without all honour or fame. His parentage is obscure and vnkowne, but his vices were made apparant and manifest; for hee wallowing in all sensuall pleasures, added exactions and cruelties vpon his Subjects, setting aside all lawes and rules of true pietie; from which vicious life, when hee was loudly admonished by his most faithfull Counsellor a worthy Earle called Cuthberga, so farre was his minde from abandoning his impious courses, as that hee caused that Noble Personage to be cruelly slaine; whereupon the rest of the Peeres seeing their State and liues were every day in danger, and the common subjects, whose Lawes were thus violated, being incited into furie, they rebelliously rose vp in Armes against him, and would acknowledge him no longer their Soueraigne. Sigbert by nature so fearefull as hee was audacious vnto vice, fledde into the woods as his only safegard, where like a forlorne person he wandered in the day, and in caves and denes lodged in the night, till lastly hee was met with by a Swine-herd that was seruant to Cuthberga, and of him knowne to be Sigbert, was presently slaine in reuenge of his matters death, in the wood that was then called Andreds Wald, when hee had reigned not fully two yeeres.

Kennilse, sprung from the blood-Royall of the West-Saxons, after the death of wicked Sigbert was made King of that Prouince, and a peeling some tumults that were stirred for Sigbert, obtained many victories against the overmailed Brittaines: but hee did not the like success against Offa King of the Mercians, who at Benningham gaue him a great overthrow. He founded the Cathedral Church of S. Andrewes at Wells, which afterwards was an Episcopall See, and in great honour reigned for the space of twenty foure yeeres; but then Fortune turning her face away from him, the rest of his reign did not fare to that which was spent: for hee giuing himselfe to pleasure and securitie, banished Kennil, the brother of his Predecessor Sigbert, who dissembling his wrong, gaue place vnto time, and occasion being offered, made his vengeance. For Kennilse coming to Merton to visit his Paramour, was there vpon and slaine, and his body conuieyed and buried at Winchester, after hee had reigned twenty nine yeeres, leaving no memorial either of Wife or Children.

Dunelm, lineally descended from Cherdik the first King of the West-Saxons, a man of a soft and quiet disposition, succeeded Kennilse in that Principallie, in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 754. He married Ethelburga, the daughter of great Offa the Mercian King, by whose power he expelled Egbert that ruled a Lordship in his Prouince vnder him, whose fame increasing through his feares of wayes, draue many iacobines into King Brutarchs head, and the more by the instigation of Ethelburga his Queene, who bearing her selfe great, because of her parentage, practised the downfall and destruction of them whom she hated, and by her suggestions thus Egbert was banished on suspicion of conspiracie. It afterward chanced, that these preparing poison to make an end of one of the Kings Mitions, wrought thereby (though without intending) the Kings death: for he by taking the confection, ended his life, after hee had reigned the space of firsteene yeeres. Wherein, the fearing the iust reuenge of his subjects, fled into France, by Charles then King, was so countrously entertained, as that for her great beauty there was offered her the choice of him or his sonne. But in her youthfull and lustfull humor, choosing the sonne, was debarred from boile, and thrust into a Monastery, in the habit (not the affection) of a Nunne, where not long after she abused her body by committing of adultery, and was shortly expelled, and in beggerly misery ended her life as by German that so farre hee was heard reported, Cuth a German mine Author. whereby was procured the murder of her Husband, the West-Saxons ordained a Law, to the great prejudice of all their Queenes succeeding; that none of them should have either title, maiesty, or place of foi-alitie; which was severely executed for many yeeres after.

In the daies of this Brihtberic, many prodigies appeared, and more perhaps then will be beleecued. For it is reported, that in his third yeere a shower of blood rained from heauen, and bloody gosses fell vpon mens garments as they walked abroad. And in his

Which wonders, sometooke to be preiages of the miseries following, both by the Inuasions of the Pagan Danes, that in these times were first seene to arise in this Island, and the extreme Famine that afterwards happened; howloer, sure it is that the Hierarchy now beganne to set in the West, and the rising Monarchy to appeare in King Egbert, whose acts and issue shall be further rehearsed, when wee shall come to the time of his succession among the Kingly Monarchs.

THE EAST-SAXONS KINGDOME. THE CIRCVIT, SVCCESIONS OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSVES, AND KING- DOMES CONTINVANCE.

CHAPTER VIII.

The site of the East-Saxon Kingdom, was the Countrey of Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire, and the Circuit so far as the Diocesse of London now extendeth. It was bounded on the East with the Ocean; on the South with the Thames; on the West with the Colne, and on the North with the River Stowe. The Kings thereof claime their descent from Prince Woden, not as all the rest of the Saxon Kings, but onely by a collateral line; and Egbert became the first King, which notwithstanding he held as Frederick to the Kings of Kent. For which cause, it seemeth that Malmesbury mentioneth him not in the Catalogue of those Kings, but maketh his sonne Sledda the first, and tenth in descent from Woden.

Egbert, is said to bee the Sonne of Offa, the sonne of Beda, the sonne of Sigefrid, the son of Snoepa, the sonne of Ampas, the sonne of Sapi, the sonne of Seaxond, from whom all these Kings feuch their original: His Kingdome began about the yeere of grace 527, and in the fifteenth of Eke the second King of Kent; and his raigne long, but yet without any memorable acts; dying in the yeere 586. and leauing his sonne to succede in his place.

Sledda the sonne of Egbert, succeeding in the East-Saxon Kingdome, raigned peaceable without mention of any warres; for having married Ricula the daughter of Imetrik King of Kent, was thereby the more fauoured of them, and feared of others; and nothing left (besides his quiet raigne) to be recorded to posterities; neither are many yeeres of successions numbred, but as they are gathered from the Computations of other princes, with whom they either liued, or were linked in action. This Sledda died about the yeere of our Redemption 596. and left issue by his wife Reorne Ricula, Sebert, who succeeded him in the Kingdome, and Sigebald his brother whole Sons afterward were Kings of that Prouince.

Sebert the sonne of Sledda and of Reorne Ricula, beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Christi Incarnation 596. and in the thirte six yeere of the raigne of King Ethelbert of Kent, his mothers brother, at that time Monarch of the Englissh-men; who in Seberts chiefe citie London, a Princetie Mart Towne, (saith Beda) of many people arising thither both by sea and land; so built a Church, making it the Cathedral of Essex Miletr, and so wrought with King Sebert, that hee conuerted him to Christianitie; and assisted him in that Foundation, where formerly (say some) had stood the Temple of Diana. This Church these new Conuersers and Saxon King, but new reared or enlarged for the honour and seruice of God, and dedicated vnder the name of Saint Paul: which worke Ethelbert further confirmed with sufficient maintenance, as by this his Charter is seene, containing these words: Ethelbert Rex. Deo iussu ante pro anima sua remedio dedit Episcopus Athleta totum quo appellatur Tillingham, ad Monasterium sine solutione seruitus S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Ethelbert ita foimter concedo tibi Praefato Monasterio possessionem cum hominibus et possessionibus, ut in perpetuum in Monasterio quiete permaneat, &c. And that this was the Temple of Diana, some haue further confirmed vnto vs by the incredible number of Ox-heads there digged vp in the daies of King Edward the First, when the east-end of that Church was enlarged; which were supposed to be of those Beasts that were there sacrificed to this Goddess Diana. These Kings likewise founded the Church of S. Peter in the West of London, at a place called Thorney, where sometimes stood the Temple of Apollo, as Salsardus affirmeth; which being overthrowne thrown by an Earthquake, King Loth new built for the celebration of Gods service; and that again being decayed, those Kings restored it to a greater beauty, where Sigbert, after thirteen yeeres raigne, (as some write) with Wulfegode his Queene were buried: whose bodies in the daies of Richard the Second (saith Wulfegode) were translated from the old Church to the new, and there interred. Hee had issue by the said Queene, Seread, Seward, and Sigebert, whose issues and deaths were as followeth.

Seread, Seward, and Sigebert, the sonnes of King Sigbert, raigne as it seemeth together in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, all three wicked irreligious men, and deadly enemies to the Christian Religion. These conculmously prefuming to the Lords Table, and holy Sacrament of his Body and Blood, were prohibited by Bishop Miletus, because they were Idolaters and voluptuaries: which repulse they tooke so offensively, that they expelled Miletus, who thereupon fled into France. But their impiety was not long unrewarded for fighting against King Ed, and Sigebertus his sonne, (Kings of the West-Saxons) were by them overcome, and in battle slain about the yeere of Grace 621. as by the learned Sir Henry Spelman is calculated, whose account for these times I altogether follow.

Sigebert the little, the sonne of Seward, the second sonne of King Sigbert, entred his raigne over the kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of Christ 621, of whose affaires, little manner is left vs to relate, sining that hee having both a Brother and a Sonne, yet his Kingdome was succeeded by neither, but by one Sigebert, his Cousin-German once removed.

Sigebert, the sonne of Segebold, the brother of Sigbert, the sonne of King Sheldra, and of Reada his Queene, succeeded his kinsman in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons. This Sigebert reduced againe his Province vnto the embracing of the Christian Faith, being daily inhabited thereunto by Osfric King of Northumberland, and received Baptisme himselfe at the hands of Bishop Finan, and at the place called The Wall, procured vertuous Celibacy to be his sinister for the plantation of the Gospel in his Kingdome. He was murdered by two of his kinsmen, who, as Reada saith, were Brethren, no other cause mouing them, but his overmuch lenitie and clemencie. He raigne by the foresaid account, thirtene yeeres, leauing issue a young sonne named Seread, that succeeded Sigebert in that Kingdome.

Wulfhelm succeeded his brother in the Province of the East-Saxons, nothing being mentioned of his life or raigne, besides his Baptisme by Bishop Cedd, and that his God-father at the Fort-Bane was Eadwald King of the East-Angles.

Sigebert, the sonne of Sigebert the little, entred his raigne over the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of our Lord 664. and was the eighth King of that Province, in part whereof Seldra his nephew raigne, with better commendations then Sigebert at his beginning had done; for Reada reporteth, that vpon a great mortallitie and plague, to scape the wrath of his Gods, Sigebert became an Aspeticke, and forsooke the faith of Christ, whereas Seldra continued constant with those in that Province vnder his Iurisdiction: yet by the diligent care of Wulfere King of the Mercians, Sigebert and his people were reclaimed, throwing downe the Temples and Altars erected to Idolatry, and opening againe the Christian Churches for the Saints assemblies, that so (saith hee) they might rather die in hope of the Resurrection, then wallow in sinne, and live in Idolatry. His wife was Ofenith the daughter of Eadfrith, King of Northumberland, whom Coppe maketh a Saint, and Abbot of Werke decease London, even in the daies of her husband.

Seldra, the Brother of Sigebert the little, and Sonne of Seward, (as we haue said) succeeded as sole King in the Province of the East-Saxons, and with much equitie and administration of Iustice raigne therein thirty yeeres: towards the end whereof, the better to prepare his mind for contemplation, hee relinquished his Princely Robes, and put on the Habie of Religious Profecion in the Monastery of S. Pauls in London; as Radolphus de Diceto, with others affirmeth. Wherein this penitent King bruing a while in fasting and prayers, died the yeere of Christ 693; whose body was intombd in a Coffin of Gray Marble the Couer copped, and lay standing in the North wall of the Chancel of the same Church.

A miracle thereof Reada reporteth, needlesse either then to be wrought, or now of vs repeated, were it not to point at the blindness wherein men good men then led; and thus it is: They hauing prepared a Tombe-stone, to lay his body in, found it too short by the quantitie of an hands breadth, and heauing it longer, yet would not serue: therefore they minding to bowe vp the knees, laid the body therein, and suddenly it lengthened of its selfe with more then was sufficient. But surely howeuer this tombe was then set on this Monkish tenter, it is now fine shrunke againe in the standing, and exceeds now in measure five foot in length. His wife (but vnnamed) hee likewise intligated to leaue the momentanie pleasures of princely State, for that which is permanent: which thing with much adoe hee lastly obtained, leauing her to follow him in his vertuous deuotions, and his two sonnes to succeed him in his kingdome.

Sigebert, the Sonne of King Seldra, whom Reada maketh a Monke with his Father, followed him also in the succession of the East-Saxons Kingdome; the time of whose entrance is set in the yeere of Christ Incarnation 694. and his death in 701. no other mention being made either of Acts, Wife, or Issue.

Seread, the Sonne of King Seldra, and Brother to King Sigebert, either ioyntly raigne with him, or successiually after him, of whom I finde nothing mentioned worthy inferring, hauing had neither Wife nor issue that are recorded.

Ofenith, the Sonne of Sigebert, and of Queene Ofenith his Wife, a man noted for his comely feature and sweet countenance, succeeded King Seread in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of grace 701. He both enlarged with buildings, and enriched with lands the goodly and beautiful Church of Winton, but after hee had ruled eight yeeres, being moued with a supposed religious deuotion, hee abandoned King with his wife (the daughter of Penda the Mercian King) his lands, kinne, and Country, and with Kenred King of Mercia, and Eadwine Bishop of Worcester, went to Rome, where hee was thorne a Monke, and in that habit died, leauing his Cousen Seread to succeed in his kingdome. His wife King with after his departure, (with the like penance) vowed her selfe a vailed Nunne in the Abbey of Kewburg, whereof his father was Abbe, who had beene wife to Afrith King of Northumberland.

Seread, the Sonne of Sigebert the Good, who was murdered for his overmuch clemencie, attained to the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, in the yeere of grace 709. His raigne was long, though his acts are little spoken of, either that others worther affaires filled the pens of those Story-writers, or that his time was so peaceable and vniuersally spent, that his misdeeds not matter whereof to indite. Hee raigne 38. yeeres, and died Anno 746. without relation either of Wife or Children.

Seread, after the slaughter of Seread, was made King of the East-Saxons, which title hee retained, untill that Robert King of the West-Saxons, taking Armes against him, expelled him out of that Kingdome as also the same yeere hee did Eadred of Kent, which was in the yeere of Christ Incarnation 827. and made it a Province annexed vnto the West-Saxons, after it had stood in state of a Kingdome 281. yeeres.

THE KINGDOME OF NORTHVMBERLAND, CIRCVIT AND CONTINVANCE, WITH THE SVCCESIONS AND ISSVES OF THOSE KINGS, VNTO THE LAST SVBVERSION THEREOF

By KING EGERT.

CHAPTER IX.

His Kingdome of Northumberland consisted at first of two distinct Provinces; whereof the one was called Deira, and the other Bernicia, and were governed sometimes by their Kings severally, and sometimes vnder one, as successe of warre, or other casualties incident did afford. The royall descentes of whole Kinns are brought by Florentius both from the Fourth and Fifth Sonnes of Prince Woden, after this manner. Ella, vnder whom the Kingdome of Deira beganne, was the sonne of Jiff, who was the sonne of Wastfrea, the sonne of Wulfis, the sonne of Wefur-welone, the sonne of Strome, the sonne of Sucaris, the sonne of Sapere, the sonne of Seabald, the sonne of Siggeat, the sonne of Sandley, the sonne of Siggar, the sonne of Wialey, the fourth sonne of Woden. And the descent of Ida, the raier of the Bernician kingdome, is brought from Bealdag the fifth sonne of Woden; for Bealdag was father to Brand, whose sonnes were Bern and Frederick, the latter of which twaine was the progenitor of Cherdit the first West-Saxon King: and his brother Bern begat another Bern also, and hee veigbrand the father of Ingerland, whose sonne was Algis, the father of Augengrat, and this mans sonne Ingerat the father of Athelbryht, whose sonne Osf begat Eappa the father of this Ida, the first King of Bernicia.

The six Saxon Captaines Ella and Ida, about sixtie yeeres after the death of King Hengist, changed the title of this Province from a Dukedome to a Kingdome. For Hengist having given the possession of those North parts vnto Oluf his Brother, and to Ethelstan his sonne, their Successors held it, with many hostile irruptions the space of 92. yeeres. But now the Brittaines subyaged, and no resistance made, those Captaines diuide the Province into two parts, intitling either by the name of a Kingdome, the first Deira, was possessed by Ella, which stretcheth from Tyne, to the River Humber; and the second Bernicia, enjoyed by Ida, whose Countie lay betwixt the Tyne and the Frith of Eldonburgh. These together contained the Counties of Westmerland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Torkshire, Lancaster, and Durham, and was bounded on the West with the Irish Seas, on the North with the Wall of Souern, on the East with the German Ocean, and on the South with the Rivers Mersey and Humber. Ida, saith Malmesbury, reigned fourteene yeeres: and Ella by Matthew of Westmster, is said to succeed him for thirty yeeres. The issue of Ida legitimate, as Matting in recordeth, were Adda, Beadrik, Theodrik, Ethelrik, Osmar, and Theodred; illegitimate, Oga, Ecca, Oswald, Adrik, Sagar, and Sagatier. These (saith Matthew of Westmster) arrived at Flemish with forty Ships, and assisted their father in manie of his enterprises. The issue of Ella, by Florentius has record, were Acce, Wife of Ethelfrid, King of Bernicia, and mother to the most Christian Oswald, Monarch of the Englishmen, and Eadwine the Monarch and first Christian King of Northumberland. Ida is said to beginne his reign Anno 547. And Ella in the yeere 559. No other particulars ascribed vnto either, besides the building of Bamburgh Castle.

With Ella reigned the two sonnes of Ida, namely Adda and Theodrik, with three others, Elaepas, Theodwald, and Frestulf, sprung from Eappa the father of Ida, all five his subliques over the Bernicians; but because there is no other mention of them besides their names and reignes, I will leaue as I finde them, and proceed to the more worthy of recital.

Ethelrik the sonne of King Ida, hauing outrun his youth in pernicious obduracy, attained in his old yeeres to the government of both the Provinces, and whole Kingdome of Northumberland, where in his time was so spent (saith Malmesbury) that had not his sonne in the glasse of his owne worth shewed the face of his fathers remembrance, his acts and reign might easily haue beene forgotten. His issue were Ethelred that succeeded him, and Theobald slaine in Battle against the Scots. He reigned five yeeres, and died, An. 591.

Ethelfrid, a man very valiant, and thirstie for renowne, succeeded his father in the Northumberland Kingdome. Him Beda compares to King Saul in Israel, excepting only in the knowledge of Gods true Religion: to whom (saith he) might be applied the saying of Isaiah touching Beniamin, that like a rauening Wolfe he deuoured his prey in the morning, and diuided the spoile thereof in the evening. For he made greater Conquests ouer the daily afflicted Brittaines, then all the Kings of the Angles had done; and compelling their possessions with his Saxons, held the right owners vnder subiection and tribute. This his prospérité, Eadweden King of the Scots greatly enuied, and attempting to crosse it, and to plant himselfe vpon the the root of like honour, hee assembled a great and strong Armie against him, and at the place called Deffeld brooke Battle with him, wherein notwithstanding he was overthrowne, and his seats discomfited, yet with such loose to King Ethelfrid, that Therold his brother, with the part of the Armie whereof he was General, were all vanquished and destroyed. This battle went so King against the Seath Britains, that (saith Beda) no King of that Nation durst attempt to meet the English in the field for a long time after. And the Fortune of the day did so much augment both his fame, and also his haughty spirit, that presently hee reconfirmed his power against the Britains, that were at Caerlegun, where of them hee made a most lamentable slaughter, and that not only of the Souldiers prepared for fight, but also of those religious and harmless Monks, there assembled for prayer.

These Monks were of the Monastery of Batter in North-wales, famous for antiquity, forme of discipline and spacious circuit. It was situated in the fruitful valley now called the English Meadows upon the Banckes of the River Don, where it extend it selfe as in the circuit of a walled Citie, containing within it the quantitie of a mile and a halfe of ground: two of whose Gates may at this day easilie be discerned, the one of them called Port Hagen, lying by North, and the other Port Clais, situate on the South; the River Don having now changed his Channell, runneth thorough the middle betwixt both the Gates, which stand asunder five hundred paces. This Monastery, saith Cheremonius, was the Mother of all others in the World; who in memory of the Seven Churches of Asia, did distribute into seven portions their Monks, every one numbering three hundred soules, and all of them (as Beda saith) lazing by the labour of their own hands. Many of these assembling at Caerlegun, to assist their Brethren Britains with their supplications unto God against this Ethelfrid, furnished the Wilde, and his fierce Souldiers the Infidell Saxons with three daies fast spent their time in continual prayers. But King Ethelfrid beholding their manner, demanded the cause; and understanding that they called for assistance of their God against him and his Army, set first upon their Guarder Brimwal, a man of Armes, who to save his own life, left all theirs to the sword, where in perished one thousand and two hundred Christian Monks, besides the discomfiture of the Britains Host. Many of these were interred in their owne Monasteries, whose bodies, saith Englad, have been found in the memory of man, in the rotten weeds wherein they were slaine. But as his fame increased daily abroad, so were his feares augmented continually at home. For Edwine the sonne of Ella, and third King of Deira, a gallant young Prince, and newly seated in his Fathers Kingdom, wrought many suspicions in Ethelfrid his head; and though he was brother to his Wife Acce, yet the neerenesse of that alliance, no whit diminished his zealous conceits, whom therefore by private conspiracies and apparent pursuits hee so daily molested, that he was forced to save his life by avoiding the Country, and rosted in exile from place to place, was lastly received and succoured by Redwald, King of the East-Angles, who in his quarrell forthwith assembled his forces, and meeting Ethelfrid in the field, slew him neere the River Idle, after hee had reigned twenty three yeeres, in the yeere of Christ his Incarnation 617. He had issue by his Wife Acce, (the daughter of Ella) Ethelfrith King of Berwicke, Offa, and Offald King of Northumberland, Offa, and Offa, with two Daughters canonized for Saints, Ofenb and Ella the Nunne; as also by his Concubine, Ofenb, the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

Edwine thus assisted by the helpe of King Redwald, returned to his Country, and was of the Inhabitantes made King of Northumberland, and afterward Monarch of the Englishmen; as in their succession shall be declared. Beda (somewhat too much addicted to fabulous miracles) of him reporteth this storie: That whilst hee lay banished in King Redwalds Court, Ethelfrid indigested his recovery, by promises to take away his life; if he refused, threatened him wailes: for feare whereof, Redwald, partly inclining to his wicked purpose, revealed the time to the Quene his wife, which a friend of Edwine hearing, told him of his danger, and witheld him to die. Edwine thus perplexed, with troubled thoughts in the dead of the night, late solitary vnder a tree in dumps, musing what was best to be done to succure it, and fix from Redwald, that had honoured him so much, he held it a wrong, and to thinke himselfe life in other Provinces against so powerful pursuers, he thought it was vaine. Thus distracted in casting what way might be safest, suddenly approached a nite unto him, vterly unknowne, who after salutation, demanded the cause why hee late at so vnseasonable a time, in so vncomforth a place, and penurie manner? Edwine thinking him to be his death-man, resolutely answered; It nothing concerned him at all, either to aske, or to know his estate. Oh Edwine (saith he) thinke not but that I know thy sorrow, and the cause of thy sitting thus upon that stone; thy death is pretended, and caught by hand: but what wouldst thou give to rid thee of that danger, and to make King Redwald thy assured persecutor? Any thing, quoth Edwine, which is in my power. But what shall be his reward (saith the other) that shall see thee vpon the throne of thy Kingdom, and that with such glory, as none of thy Progenitors euer attained vnto? I would be thankful to that man, said Edwine, in all things, and at all times; as reason required, and of right I ought. But tell me Edwine, saith he, what if the same man shew thee a more safe way to preserve the life of thy Soule, then either thou at this present knowest, or any of thy Parents euer heard of, wilt thou consent and embrace his counsell? Yea, said Edwine, God forbid that I should not be ruled by him, that hath so kindly free me from this present danger, let me vpon the throne of a Kingdom, and after these great fauours, should also teach mee the way to an eternall life. Vpon this answer, laying his right hand on Edwine head, he said vnto him; When these things shall in order come to passe, then call to minde this time, and what thou hast promised, and so vanished from his presence. The young Prince thus left betwixt hope and despair, his friends that had forewarned him of his death, came hastily to him with a more cheerfull countenance, Come in Edwine (quoth he) and successe thy cares, for the Quene hath not onely changed Redwalds mind to save thy life, but hee also hath granted to maine line thy right against Ethelfrid thine enemy. Which shortly hee did, and slew him, as we haue said.

Edwine thus placed vpon the Princely Throne, his first Wife Queenburg being dead in his exile, received in marriage Ethelburga, furnished Tara, (a fit name for a woman) the Daughter of King Ethelbert, and Sister to Redwald King of Kent, a most chaste and vertuous Christian Lady, whose teacher was Paulinus and both of them Gods instruments for the Couergion of the Northumbrians to the imbracement of Christian Religion. But because we shall haue occasion to speake of this Edwine as he was Monarch of the Englishmen, we will reuerse his Alfreds, and Ragnes, to bee further related in the course of his Succession. Hee was slaine in battell against Cadwall King of the Britaines and Penda King of the Mercians, when he had prosperously reigned fiftene yeeres, the twelfth of October, Anno 633; and was buried in Saint Peters Church at Streatham, after called Wharfe. Vpon whose death, the Kingdom of Northumberland was againe diuided.

Strike the Sonne of Affrid (Edwine Vnde) succeeding in the Province of Deira, and Ethelfrid the Sonne of Ethelfrid the Wilde, in the Province of the Berwicenses; theiue, with the rest of Ethelfrids Children, for the continuance of Edwine Raigne, had in banishment beene persecuted among the Seats and Redbanks, and there had received the Sacrament of Baptisme: but after the death of their Enemy, these Princes returned to their owne Countrey, and former superstitions, renouncing againe the profession of Christ. Yet this their Apostasie (saith Beda) remained not long unpunished: For Cadwallader King of the Brittaines, with wicked force, but with worthy vengeance slew them both the next Summer ensuing. Of which vengeance, and his whole Army perished in the suburbs of their owne Citie, he miserably starved, and possessing the Province of the Northumbrians, not as a King or Conqueror, but rather like an outrageous Tyrant, delirious and rent in tragical manner, all things before him. Eanfirth unadvisedly with twelve chosen persons comming to Cadwallader to impart upon peace, were cruelly put to death. This yeere (saith he) continueth unhappy and hateful even unto this day, as will for thougthfulnes of these English Kings, as also for the Brittaines furious tyranny. Wherefore the Historiographers of that time have thought it best, that the memory of these Apostate Kings being utterly forgotten, the successive yeere should be assigned to the Empire of the next following King, Oswald, a man dearly beloved of God.

Oswald, the sonne of Wild Ethelfrid, and brother to King Eanfirth, begane his reigne over the Northumbrians Anno 642. having first embraced Christianity, and received Baptisme in Scotland, wherein hee was secured all the reigne of King Eadwold, and had withall learned some experience in warre. Hee comming unlooked for with a small Armie, hee fensed (saith Beda) with the Faith of Christ, obtained against Cedwald King of the Brittaines a great victory: the manner whereof, with his other acts achieved, wee will further declare in his succession among the Monarchs of the English-men, whereof hee was the ninth from Christ.

He sent for Aidan, a Scottish Divine, to teach his people the Doctrine of Christ, enlarged his Kingdome, and reconciled the Deirians and Bernicians, who were at mortall enmities. Hee was faine, and cruelly rent in peeces by the unmercifull Pagan Penda the Mercian, at Oswaldsire in Sherburne, quints August, the yeere of our Lord 642. when hee had reigned nine yeeres, and was buried at Bardsey in Lancashire. His wife was Kenelme, the daughter of Kinga King of the West-Saxons, and his sonne Ethelwald, young at his death, and therefore defaced of his Kingdome by Osfrith his Uncle, the Natural Sonne of King Ethelfrid the Wild. Notwithstanding when Osfrith King of Deira was murdered by this Osfrith of Mercia, and he not past sixteen yeeres of age, entred by force vpon Deira, and kept the same Province by strong hand so long as hee lived; and dying, left it to his sonne Alfrith, the Natural Sonne of the last King Osfrith.

Osfrith the illegitimate sonne of Ethelfrid the Wild, at thirty yeeres of age succeeded King Oswald his brother in the Kingdome of the Bernicians; at whose entrance, Osfrith the sonne of Osfrith, that had denied the Faith, and was slaine of King Cedwald, reigned in Deira. This Osfrith was slaine by King Osfrith: after whose death, kizing all Northumberland, he spread his terror further into other parts, and was the tenth Monarch of the English-men, as in his succession we will further speak. His wife was Eanfirth, daughter to Edwin King of Northumberland, by whom hee had many children. His reigne was 28. yeeres, and death the fiftieth day of February, in the yeere of grace 670. and of his age 58.

Eofrid, the eldest sonne of King Osfrith by Queene Eanfirth, had bene Hegele in the Kingdome of Mercia, and after his father was made King of Northumberland, in the yeere of Christ 671. Hee wanted, but with great losse, against Edred King of Mercia, nere unto the River of Trent, wherein his younger brother Elfrith was unfortunately slaine, to the great griefe of both the Kings, the one being his owne brother, and the other his brother in law by marriage: whereupon peace and reconciliation was made. But Eofrid being by nature of a disquiet disposition, incensed the Irish, and destroyed those himselfe and filly people, which (as Beda saith) had bene great friends to the English. Their resistance consisted chiefly in curres and imprecations for revenge, which though they could not open heaven, yet (saith hee) it is to be believed, that for their cause he was cut off the next yeere ensuing by the Pict or Red-Bushes, against whom he prepared, contrary to the advice of his Counsell, and by them was slaine among the firs and welle mountains, 20. May of the yeere of mans felicitie 685. and of his age fortye, after hee had reigned fiftene yeeres. His wife was Ethelred the daughter of Anna King of the East-Angles: shee was both Wise and pious; first married to Tostig a Noble man that ruled the Gyrns, a people inhabiting the Fenny Countreys of Norfolk, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Cambridgeshire; and after him also in virginique continued twelve yeeres with her husband King Eofrid, contrary to his minde, and the Apostles precept, that forbiddeth such defrauding either man or woman, except it be with consent for a time; and to the preparation of priesterflaming elsewhere, that Marriage is honourable, and the bed thereof sanctified, wherein the woman doth redeem her transgression, through faith, love, holmesse, and modestie, by bearing of children: This notwithstanding, shee obtained licence to depart his Court, and got her to Coldingham Abby, where shee was professed a Nunne under Ebbas the daughter of King Ethelfrid. Then went shee to Ely, and new built a Monastery, whereof shee was made Abbess, and wherein with great reverence shee was intombd: whole vertues and remembrance remaind to posterities by the name of S. Andrew, she being canonized among the Catalogue of English Saints.

Alfrith, the legitimate sonne of King Osfrith, in the reigne of his halfe-brother King Eofrid, whether willingly, or by violence constrained, lived like a banished man in Ireland, where applying himselfe to studie, hee became an excellent Philosopher, and (as Beda saith) was very courteous and learned in the Holy Scriptures, and therefore was made King over the Northumbrians: where with great wilidome, though not with so large bounds as others had enioied, hee worthily did recover the decayed estate of that Province, ruling the same twenty yeeres and odd months, and departed this life, Anno 705. His Wife was Kenelme, the daughter of Penda King of the Mercians, and by her hee had issue only one sonne, that succeeded him in his Kingdome.

Oswald, a child of eight yeeres in age, for the hopes conceived from the vertues of his father, was made King over the Northumbrians; whose steps hee so wayes trod in, but rather in filthie abuse of his person and place, wallowed in all voluptuous pleasures and sensuall delight, violating the bodie of veiled Nunnas, and other religious holy women: wherein when hee had spent eleven yeeres more to his age, his kinsmen Eofred and Osfrith conspired against him, and in battell by his daughter made an end of this impious life. His wife was Kenelme, the sister of Ines King of the West-Saxons, as by the time may be gathered, from the computation of Marston, and the Angles of the English-Saxons; who vpon a loathing wastefull wedlocke, sued out a divorce from her husband, and built a Nunnery at Winchester in Dorsetshire, where in a religious habit shee ended her life, and hee by Eofred and Osfrith, leaving his Kingdome to them that wrought his death.

Kenelme, the sonne of Cuthbert, whose father was Eadwald the sonne of Egrwald, and his father Adelm, the sonne of Oga, the natural sonne of Ida, the first King of Deira, after the death of Osfrith reigned two yeeres, no other remembrance left of him, besides the murder of his Soueraigne Lord and King.

Osfrith, after the death of Kenelme, obtained the Kingdome of Northumberland, and reigned therein the space of eleven yeeres, leaving to the world his name slained with blood in the murder of young Osfrith, no other mention of parentage, wife, or issue of him remaining; for want whereof, hee adopted Crelmolph, brother to his predecessor Eofred, and died unlamented the yeere of Grace seven hundred twentie nine.

Cenwalph, the brother of Kenned, after the death of King Eboric, was made King of the Northumbrians; which Province hee governed with great peace and victorie the space of eight yeeres: but then forsaking the Royall Estate and Robes of Maistie, put on the habit of a Monke in the Ile of Londesey or Holy Island.

These were the daies (saith Bede) wherein the acceptable time of grace and quietnes was embraced among the Northumbrians, who now laid their armies aside, and applied themselves to the reading of holy Scriptures; more desirous to be professed in religious busines, then to exercise feats of warre, or of armes. For not only Priests and Lay men vowed and performed Pilgrimages to Rome, but Kings, Queens and Bishops also did the like: so great (so blind was their light) a devotion was in their hearts, and so long a patience held they of the place. Vnto this King Cenwalph, the said Venerable Bede (a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul at Weremouth neer vnto Darham) a great Clerke, and Writer of the English Historie, dedicated the same his Worke, which he continued till the yeere four hundred thirty one, and from the first entrance of the Saxons, containing: 87. yeeres, according to his owne account.

Egbert, the sonne of Eata, who was brother to King Kenned, succeeded his vnckle Cenwalph in the Kingdom of Northumberland, and ruled the same with the like peace and quietnes, the time of twenty yeeres; and then following his example, also forsooke the world, and shrou himselfe a Monke, as diders other Kings in those daies had done, whereof Some Deuout men writers, and next their number to bee eight: as Iuas King of the West-Saxons, Ethelred and Kenned Kings of Mercas, Segebert King of the East-Angles, Sebbi and Offa Kings of the East-Saxons, and Cenwalph and this Egbert Kings of the Northumbrians. These forsaking the world (as they tooke it) left the Charge that God vpon them had imposed, whose authoritie in earth they forgoe, and wherein they might much more haue aduanced Gods glory and Christs Gospell, then for a more euill and priuate life, not warranted by his word, but rather dullicked, and perhaps forswere by those heavenly creatures the Sonne and Moone, which in those daies were fearfully darkened, and for a time seemed to haue lost their light: for Anno 733.

Decemb.* the Moone being in her full, appeared both darke and bloody; for a Scarre (though there be none lower then the Moone) seemed to follow her, and to deprime her of light: but passing before her, shee againe recovered her former brightness. This King Egbert had a brother that bore the same name, and was installed Arch-bishop of York, where he erected a beautiful Librerie (a worke well befitting a Noble Prelate) and plentifully stored it with an infinite number of learned bookes. His sonne was Offawalpe, that succeeded in the Kingdom.

Offawalpe, when his father Egbert had put off the Robes of Maistie, and clad himselfe with a Monkes Cowe, ascended the Throne of Northumberland, and late therein only one yeere: for before hee had made attempt of any memorable act, he was traitorously murdered by his own seruantes at Milbvingtan, the ninth Kalends of August, leaving the Crown vndisposed of vntill the Nones of the same month in the next yeere.

Eadwald on Melle was then made King of Northumberland, and with great valiance defended his Subjects. Some say, that at the end of six yeeres hee resigned his government; yet others affirme his reign to be eleven yeeres, and lastly that hee was slaine by Alfred his Successor.

Alfred, the murderer of his Lord and Master, beganne his raigne ouer the kingdom of Northumberland, the yeere of Christs Incarnation seven hundred thirty five, and continued the same with such dislikes, that hee lastly was expelled out of the Province by his own Subjects, & enforced to abandon the same. He was the son of Tanwin, the son of Bambert, the son of Asa, the son of Adricke, the natural son of Ida, the full King of Bernicia. And the sonnes of this Alfred were Ofred, afterwards King of Northumberland, and Almund, slaine by the Danes, and canonized a Saint.

Ethelred, the sonne of Melle, was advanced to the Regiment of Northumberland, and in the fifth yeere of his raigne, was driven out of the same by Edelwald and Hercbert, two Dukes that warred against him; who hauing overcome and slaine his Generall and souldiers in a fierce battell, so weakened the hopes of King Ethelred, that he fled his Country, and left the Kingdom in a miserable estate, through the dissension of those ambitious Princes.

Alfred the brother of the foresaid King Alfred, aspiring to the Souerainety of the Northumbrians, ruled the same in great Justice, to his worthy commendations: notwithstanding the wickedness of his people was such, that without all guilt he was traitorously murdered by the conspircie of Siga, 23. Sept. the yeere of Christs Incarnation, seven hundred eighty eight, after hee had reigned eleven yeeres, and his body buried at Hesbam. His sonnes were Alfius and Alfrin, both slaine by King Ethelred.

Ofred the sonne of King Alfred, tooke vpon him the Rule of Northumberland, the yeere of grace seven hundred eighty nine, and the same yeere finished his government thereof, being expelled by his Subjects, and deposed of all kingly authority.

Ethelred the sonne of Melle, reuenged from exile wherein hee had liued the space of twelue yeeres, was againe restored to the Crowne; but hee finding the injuries that his Lords had formerly done him, sought the reuenge by their deaths, as also to establish his Throne the surer, slew Alfius and Alfrin, the sons of Alfred, as wee haue said, the right heires to the Crowne, and inticing Ofred the former deposed King into his danger, commanded him to be put to death at Caulbage, the fourteenth of September, and yeere of Christs Incarnation eighty two. And to strengthen himselfe the more against all his opposites, the same yeere he married Lady Eldfa, the second Daughter to great Offa King of Merca, forsaking his former Wife without any iust cause giuen on her part.

These things done to appease the hearts of his Subjects, that after seven yeeres from his second establishment, they rebelliously rose in Armes, and at Colce miserably slew him the eighteenth day of April, the yeere of Christs Iesus 794.

After whose death, the Northumbrians were sore molested with many intruders, or rather Tyrants, that bandied for the soverainety the space of thirty yeeres. The first whereof was Ofwald, that held the title of King only twenty eight daies, & then was forced to saue his life by flight vnto the King of the Picts. Next, Alfius a Duke, renoked from exile: then Alfred, Eadwald, Ethelred, Redulph, Osbert, and Ellie, slaine by the Danes in Turke as a place, for Ellie his slaughter called to the day Ellie-Croffe, and the Kingdom yielded to the protection of Egbert King of the West-Saxons, who was now become Englands first absolute Monarch, (as holding all the rest of the Kings no longer for his Associates, but his Subjects) in the yeere nine hundred twentie six, after it had stood in forme of a Kingdom three hundred leuenty nine yeeres, and was made a Province and ioined with the rest vnto the English Monarchie.

THE CIRCVIT AND SVCCESSORS OF THE MERCIAN KINGDOME, VN- TILL IT WAS SVBIECTED TO THE WEST-SAXONS.

CHAPTER X.

His Kingdom of Mercia contained more Counties, and the parts of that royall Reigne were spread with a wider compasse then any of the rest in the Saxons Heptarchie: for in the middelt of the Island that Kingdome was seated, and from the verge of Northumberland touched some part of Middlesex, which was the possession of the East-Saxons: the North thereof was bounded with Humber and Mersey; the East was inclosed with the German Ocean; the West extended to Severne and Dee; and the South part neerly touched the River of Thames, containing the Counties now known by these names, of Cheshire, Derbyshire, Nottingham, Stafford, and Shropshire, Northampton, Leicestershire, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Rutland-shires; Warwick, Worcester, Oxford, and Gloucestershire; Buckingham, Bedford, and part of Hertfordshire. The first ruler of that Title and name of a Kingdome, was Crida, the sonne of Kennald, who was the sonne of Cutha, the sonne of Icel, the sonne of Eomer, the sonne of Eugegaur, the sonne of Offa, the sonne of Wergund, the sonne of Wubbe, the sonne of Waga, the sonne of Werhelgote, the third of the five sonnes of Prince Eden. This man, without more fame of his further acts, is said to have reigned the space of ten yeeres, and to have died Anno 594. His issue was Wende that succeeded him in his Kingdome, and a daughter named Seaburge, matched in marriage with Edwa afterwards King of Northumberland, with whom he lived in the Court of King Redwald in the time of his troubles, and died before him in that his banishment. She bore him two sonnes, Eofrid and Eadwige, as in the succession of Saxon Monarchy shall be shewed: notwithstanding Bede reporteth this Seaburge to be daughter of Conlethe third King of Mercia, and grand-child to this first Crida.

Wende the sonne of King Crida, not onely held his dominions by intrusion upon the weak Britanes. His issue was Wende, Kennald, and Eoppa, all three Progenitors of Kings afterwards in that kingdome, with a daughter named Seaburge, married to Kennald, King of the West-Saxons, whom he without just cause divorced from him; for which cause great troubles afterwards ensued, as in the reigns of those Kings we have said. He in great honour reigned twenty yeeres, and giving place vnto nature, left his kingdome to be inioined by another.

But, not the son, but the Nephew of King Wende, succeeded in the dominions of the Mercians, about the yeere of grace six hundred and fourteenth. He was sonne to Kennald, the brother of Wende, the younger sonne of King Crida, who was the first King of that kingdome. His reign is set to be ten yeeres, without mention either of Act or Issue.

Penda, the sonne of Wende, beganne his reign over the Mercians the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred twenty six, & continued the same the space of thirty yeeres. He was a man violeat in action, and mercuritic in condition, cruel and variat in blood: he shooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the Saxon-Kings, more then any other in that Heptarchie before him had done. Against Kings and Quenebeline, King together of the West-Saxons, he joined battell neere vnto the Citie Eboraceshire, where both the parties fought it out to the vrmolt, with the effusion of much Saxon blood: but those coming to concord, he with Cadwalla King of the Britanes, slew in battell Edwine and Oswald, Kings of Northumberland, Sigbert, Egfrid, and Anna, Kings of the East-Angles, and forced Kennald King of the West-Saxons out of his Country, in quarrell of his Sister. Of these his properties he became so proud, that hee thought nothing impossible for his achievements; and therefore threatening the destruction of the Northumbrians, prepared his Army for that expedition. Oswy then reigning King of that Country, profited great summes of money, and most precious Jewels to purchase his peace: which being refused, and the battell joined, more by the hand of God, then power of man, this Tyrant was slaine, and his whole Army discomfined.

His Wife was Kimfrith, and issue by her Penda, who after him was King: Ylfere and Egbert, both Monarchs of the English; Eadric, a man famous for his great holinesse, and Meruold that gouerned some part of Mercia, whose Wife was Edwige, the foundresse of Minster in Taunt, and daughter to Egbert King of Kent, by whom he had issue Meruold, a man of noted deuotion, Althar, and Mildred, both holy Virgins, and Mildred also Abbess of Taunt, all foure canonized for Saints. The daughters of King Penda, were Kimburg, the Wife of Althar, King of Northumberland, afterward a Votarie in Kimerburg Abbey, and Kimfrith, who married Offa King of the East-Angles, and became also a Nunne with her sister Kimburg.

Penda, the sonne of King Penda, in the daies of his father, and with his permission, had gouerned the middle part of Mercia, and after his death, by the gift of Oswy of Northumberland, all the South of that kingdome kingdome from the River Trent, upon copolition to marrie his daughter, and to embrace Christianity, which thing this Penda performed, and was the first Christian King of the Mercians. His Baptisme received to himselfe the first fruits of his profession, hee laid the foundation of a faire Church at Medeshamsted, now called Peterborough, but lined not to finish the same, for that he was slaine by the treason of Aldred his wife in the celebration of Edith, (as Beda saith) having had no issue by her. But Robert de Swinhom (an Author of good antiquity, who law the stones of that foundation to be so huge, as that eight yoke of Oxen could hardly draw one of them) saith, that Penda was brought to his end by the practise of his Mother, and not of his Wife; as in these his times is manifest. Penda (saith he) laid the foundation of a Monastery at Medeshamsted, in the Girvants or Fen-Country, which he could not finish, for that by the wicked practise of his Mother, hee was made away. Whereby this blot is taken from this Christian Lady, and brands the face of her that most detructu at. This King reigning as his successor to King Offa of Northumberland aforesaid, by some is not accounted for a Mercian King, his regiment resting under the command of another.

Vulfhere, the Brother of murthered Penda, set up by the Mercians against King Offa, proved a Prince most valiant and fortunate. For hee expelled the Northumbrians Lieutenants forth of those dominions; fought victoriously against Kennel King of the West-Saxons; conquered the Isle of Wight; and attained to be sole Monarch of the Englismen: whereof more shall be laid when we come to the times and successions of their reignes.

This Vulfhere is said to reign in great honour for seventene yeeres, and his body to bee horied in the Monastierie of Peterborough, which he had founded. His Queene Ermenschild after his death, became a Nunne at Ely; under her Mother Saxburg and there died. His children were Kenned, Wulfald, and Egfrin, with a daughter, named Werburga Nunne in the Monastierie of Ely.

Ethelred the third sonne of King Penda, in the charge of young Kenned the sonne of Vulfhere, (who in his tender yeeres rather desired a private life then any publike authority in the Common-weale) succeeded his brother both in the Kingdome of Mercia, and Monarchy of the Englismen. But when hee had reigned thrie yeeres, gave over the Crowne to his Nephew the said Kenned, and became a Monke in the Monastierie of Braiden-Pin Lincolne-shire, where hee died Anno 716. His Wife was Offgyde, Daughter to Offgyr King of Northumberland; and issue, Chalred, that succeeded Kenned in the Mercian kingdome.

Kenned the sonne of Vulfhere, (his Uncle Ethelred changing his Princely Crowne for a Monks Coule) beganne his Raigne over the Mercians, and his Monarchy over the Engliss, Anno 704. wherein he reigned the space of foure yeeres, and then with like deuotion of those times, addicted to an easie and quiet Religion, abandoned both Crowne and Country, and went to Rome, where of Pope Constatine hee receiued the tooillure and habit of a Monke at the Apples-Tower, and entering a Monastierie, therio spent other foure yeeres of his life to the day of his death, which was Anno 708. having had neither wife nor issue to reuise his name, or to rule his kingdome.

Chalred receiuing the resignation of Kenned his Colingerman when he went to Rome, and of sufficient yeeres and discretion to haue succeeded Ethelred his Father, what time the said Kenned was ordained King, reigned with great valour over the Mercians, and was likewise Monarch over the Englismen. His peace was disquieted by Ina & his West-Saxons, who for seven yeeres continuance invaded his kingdome. His Wife was Werburga, faith Marianus and Florantius the Monke, who ascribe to her a long life, and to die without Children. This Chalred reigned the space of eight yeeres, and died the yeere of grace seven hundred and fiftenth: whose body was horied in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield.

Ethelred, after the death of Chalred, was made King of the Mercians, and Monarch of the Engliss, the yeere of Christs Incarnation seven hundred sixtenth. He was a Prince giuen to peace, but withall a most inlicitious Adulterer: in somuch that Bosface Archbishop of Metz wrote his Epistle vnto him in reprehension of the same, which tooke such effect, that in repentance of his foule faults, hee founded the Monastierie of Croiland, dringing in mighty Piles of Oake into that moonish ground, whereon hee had a great and goodly building of stone. He was the son of Alay, the elder sonne of Egga, the second sonne of King Wihha, the brother of King Penda: and reigned forie two yeeres, in the end whereof he was slaine in a battell fought against Cuthred King of the West-Saxons, at Secundane, three miles from Tamworth, the yeere of Christ, seven hundred fiftie six, and was buried at Repton in Darby-shire, having had neither Wife nor Children.

Offa slaying Repton the murtherer of King Ethelred, eured upon the government of the Mercians, and the Monarchy of the Saxons, An. 718. He enlarged his dominion vpon the Britains, overcame the Kraeths in a battell, put to flight the Northumbrians, and vanquished the West-Saxons: the East-Angles also hee scised vpon, after he had murthered Ethelbert their King. He reigned thirti nine yeeres, and did at Offy, the nine and twenty day of July, the yeere of our Lord seven hundred ninetie foure, and was buried without the Town of Bedford, in a Chappell, now swallowed vp by the River Ouse. He was the son of Thangfyrd, the sonne of Eamulf, whose Father Ofmund was the sonne of Egga, the brother of King Penda, and loo of King Wihha, whose Father was Craide, the first King of the Mercians. His Wife was Quendred, and children many, of whom, and of them we will further speake when we come to the time of his Monarchy.

Offgyde, the sonne of great Offa, was by him made King at his returne from Rome, being the only ioy of his paternes, and heire apparant to the Saxons Monarchy, vpon which hee eured the day after his fathers death, and liued himselfe but a hundred and foure daies after, deceasing the thirteenth of December, in the yeere of our Lord God seven hundred ninetie six, having had neither wife nor issue that wee read of, and his body honourably interred in the Church of the Monastierie of Saint Albans, founded by Offa.

Kennulf, the colen (as farre off) to King Ethelred deceased, and both of them remoued in blood no lesse then six descents from Wihha the second Mercian King, was the sonne of Cuthbert, (as the Monke of Winchester deriues him) the sonne of Bassa, the sonne of Kennard, the sonne of Kennard, the sonne of Kennard, the sonne of Kennard aforesaid, and succeeded King Egfrid in his Dominions. But of this Mercian Monarch more shall be written in the succession and time of that his government. Hee reigned two and twentie yeeres, and deceased the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and nineteen, and his bodie interred in the Monastierie of Winchcombe in the Countie of Gloucester, being of his owne foundation. His wife was Queene Elfyde, the daughter (as some suppose) of Offa, who had beene betrothed to Ethelbert King of the Engliss, slaine by her father: by whom hee had issue, Kennel, Quendred, and Burgenchild, of whom more followeth.

Kennel, the sonne of King Kennulf, a childe of seven yeeres old, succeeded in the Kingdome of Mercia, but not in the Marches, as his fathers had done, Rebert the West-Saxon at that time being grown great in his fortunes. This young King Kennel reigned only five moneths, and then by the ambitious desire of Quendred his sister, who seeking the government by the shedding of his guiltlesse blood, insigated one Aethelric his instructor, by promises of great preferments and rich rewards, to make him away, who only stood (as he thought) in her way to the Crowne. This wicked practise was forthwith as impiously performed: for having him forth vnder pretence of hunting, he slew the innocent King, whose virtuous inclination promised great hopes, and whose harmless yeeres had not attained to any worldly guile. His bodie here secretly buried under a bush, and (if we will believe the Golden Legend, where his life is described) was thus found out: A white Dove (which belike had seen the deed done) and had got it ingroffed in a scrole of parchment, posted therewith to S. Peter in Rome, and upon the High Altar laid it to bee read, where in the Saxon characters thus it was found: In Cheneles had Kenselme Kinsgar his wifes thorne, becomen becomen: that is, At Cheneles in a Cave pasture Kenselme the King's childer both beheaded under a thorne. But most true it is, that an obscure sepulcher the body had at the first, and howsoever found out, was afterwards with great honour and ceremony translated to the Monasterie of Winchester, which his father had founded. The marvellous Quembridge, for griefe and shame of so wicked a snail, ended her life, without the attaining of her ambitious desire, and hath left her name indelible stained with his innocent blood.

Centulwulf, the brother of Kenselwulf, and vncle to this murdered young King, as his neere in blood was elected their Gouernour by the Mercians: but his glory was not great, nor his raigne long, being still disquieted by Bernulf, that sought his Crowne; and after some yeeres Regiment was expelled by his people, and left the flame to his purtier, abandoning the Countrey for the safety of his life. One daughter hee had, named Ethelfleda, who was the wife of Ingward, the sonne of Witthke, the substitute King of Mercia, and himselfe the last that held the Mercian Kingdome in a lineall succession.

Bernulf obtaining what hee so long desired, made himselfe King when Centulwulf was gone, and was the more approved for his valour in Armes, and the lesse resisted for his ancient descent, being sprung from Offa, a man reputed to be of the Mercian royall blood. But Bernulf perceiving the fortunes of Eghert, accounted those his happy successes to bee his owne shame, and by defiance challenged the West-Saxons to the field: which Eghert accepted, and upon Ellendun joined Battle with the Mercians, which was fought to the much losse of both their bloods. Notwithstanding at last the West-Saxons prevailed, Bernulf being forced to flee with shame. The Raſt-Angles that then had yielded to Eghert, and but lately before had felt the fury of Bernulf, thought the time fit to repay him againe, and therefore in warlike manner assaulted his Territories, where hee, in defending his Countrey against their attempts, was in a skirmish slaine, after he had reigned not fully three yeeres.

Ludecan then was chosen King of the Mercians, whose blood was not downe since their last losse, neither reuenge forgotten against the Raſt-Angles; and therefore the yeere following made strength (sufficient to their seeming) to meet these their enemies. But the State of Heptarchie now drawne to the period, and the supporters thereof weakened by their own diuisions, the fland declined to a present alteration, and gave place to a more absolute kind of Monarchy, that in Eghert the West-Saxon was now begun: who aiding the Raſt-Angles against the Mercians, Ludecan their King fought with no better successe then Bernulf before him had done; whose raigne lasted not fully 2. yeeres, nor his memoriall retained either in wife or issue.

Witthke, the sonne of Offa, the sonne of Offa, of the Mercian blood-royall, intruding himselfe (as it seemeth) into the gouernment of Mercia, was unexpectedly vanquished by Eghert the Mercian that had assumed from Bernulf that Kingdome before: him hee made his Substitute and Tributarie, who so continued to Eghert and his sonne the time of thirteene yeeres, leauing no other relation of his acts. His issue was Wegmund, the husband of Lady Ethelfleda, the daughter of Centulwulf King of Mercia, the parents of Wulfstan the Martyr, and of Lady Ethelburg, married to one Ethelred an Earle in the Province of Lincolne.

Bernulf upon the like composition of Tribute, and in the like termes of subjection to the West-Saxon soveraigntie, held the Kingdome of Mercia as a Substitute, and without any notable reports of his Acts, so reigned the space of thirteene yeeres. At this time the Sea rovers out of Denmarke, that had often infested this fland with their many lursions, got the head so strong, and wing so farre, euen to the middle part thereof, (as this of Mercia was) that they filled with terror the hearts of the Inhabitants, and stained the soile with the blood of their sides, which in a most barbarous crueltie daily they shed; whose rage was so great, and murders so vninfinite, that Bernulf was enforced to forsake the Countrey, and in a more private estate to secure his owne life. He had a sonne named Berfred, who was the cause of Saet Wyllam martyrdome.

Berfred, the last Mercian King, was thereunto deputed by Ethelwulf the West-Saxon Monarch, as a shield of defence against the raging Danes, that made desolations where they came. In continuall implemments against them he spent his time, and that with such noble resolutions and manhood, that Ethelwulf held him worthy of his alliance, and made him his sonne in law, by giving him Lady Ethelfleda his daughter to wife, the marriage being solemnized at Chapbam in Wiltshire, with great estate. This Berfred with Ethelwulf, warred against the Britannes with victorie, and he with Alfred compelled the Danes vnder the conduct of Hanger and Fihla, to dislodge from Nottingham, and depart the Province. Yet lastly after twenty two yeeres raigne, hee was so overlad with their daily importunities, that three of their Kings (as our Writers terme them) whose names were Gudrun, Ethelred, and Amund, winned at Reignodon, and fore wasted his Kingdome.

King Berfred at that time distressed, and himselfe notable to withstand their rage, with his wife Queene Ethelfleda fled the Realme, and the same yeere in Rome ended his life, and was buried in the Church of our Lady belonging to the English College there erected. His Queene in the habit of a Nunne, fiftene yeeres after his death, died at Padua in Italie, and was there honourably buried, the yeere of our Lord eight hundred eightie nine. And now the fallall circle of this Kingdome drawse to the full compassse, staid the hand of all glorious motion from proceeding any further, and with the losse of the rest fell vnder the gouernment of the West-Saxon after one yeeres usurpation of the Danes, when it had stood in state of a Kingdome the space of two hundred and two yeeres, and ended in title and regall authority, the yeere of Christi Incarnation eight hundred eighty six.

THE KINGDOME OF THE EAST-ANGLE, THE CIRCVIT OF THAT PROVINCE, WITH THE SVCCESION AND ACTS OF, THEIR KINGS, SO LONG AS IT STOOD IN THAT REGALL ESTATE, AND VNTILL IT WAS VNITED TO THE WEST-SAXONS.

CHAPTER XI.

The circvit of this Province.

he Counties (as we now call them) that were subiect to this East-Angles Kingdome, were Suffolke, Norfoke, Cambridge-shire, and the Ile of Ely. The bounds wherof were limited in this manner: the East and North sides were confined by the Ocean, the West, with Saint Edmonds Ditch, and the South altogether with Essex, and some part of Hertfordshire.

The first ruler of the title and State of this Kingdome, was a Saxon Captaine named Pfissa, about the yeere of Christs incarnation five hundred threentie yeere, whose renoume was such, that he gaue name not onely to that his aspired Dominion, but also from him, the Subiects thereof were a long time after called Pfissians: though lastly, it was reduced into the name and Kingdome of the East-Angles. This Pfissa (as Florentius the Monke of Worcester hath laid downe) was the sonne of Witelm, and he the sonne of Hripin, the sonne of Retimund, the sonne of Trigilt, the sonne of Tithen, the sonne of Cafer, the second sonne of Prince Woden. His reign is accounted only seven yeeres, without any mention of further matter, worthy the recording, and his death to haue hapned in the yeere five hundred eighty one.

Titalus, the second King of the East-Angles, and onely sonne of Pfissa that is read of, beganne his reign the yeere of Christs Incarnation, five hundred eighty three, & continued the same for the space of twenty yeeres. And although the Writers of these times haue made no further mention of his Acts, yet may we well suppose that his daies were not altogether so quietly spent, both in the infancy of that newly erected kingdom, and when such wars were commenced for the obtaining the whole land. His issue was Redwald, that immediately succeeded him, & from whom other Kings of that kingdom were lineally descended.

Redwald, the greatest of all the East-Angles Kings, succeeded his father Titalus in the Dominions of the East-Angles, and Ethelbert of Kent in the Monarchie of the Saxons. He received and favoured in his Court Edwyn with his wife in their Exiles, and assisted him against Relisfrid King of Northumberland, that sought his life, as before we haue shewed, and hereafter in the succession of his Monarchy wee shall haue further occasion. He reigned Monarch eight yeeres, and King of the East-Angles thirty one (by the account and computation of the Table annexed to Adamsbury, and others of our English Writers) and died the yeere of our Saluation six hundred twenty three.

Egbert, the younger sonne of King Redwald, (whereby his elder brother being slaine in battell by Relisfrid, in the quarrell of distressed Edwine) succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of the East-Angles, the yeere of our Lord God six hundred twenty foure. He was the first King of that Province, that publickly professed the Christian Faith, which hee received at the friendly motion and zealous exhortation of King Edwine of Northumberland; but so much to the discontentment & grudge of the people, as thereupon they secretly entred into conspiracy to practise his death, which a Pagan Ruffian named Richenbert, not long after most traitorously executed. His reign is placed in the foresaid Table of our Writers, (as it is compared with the other Kings of those times) to extend twelue yeeres; after whose death, those people returned to their woored Idolatry, and for three yeeres continuance embraced their former Gostly, from which they were reclaimed by Sigbert his brother in law, who succeeded him in his Throne, hee hauing no issue, to whom it might be left.

Sigbert, the sonne of the second wife to Redwald, and by her born to a former husband, whose name is vnkowne, was greatly mistrusted by his Father in law, King Redwald, that he went about to aspire his Crowne: the motives of which suspicion, notwithstanding all the endeauours of innocent Sigbert, were still followed with an enuious eye, and his subiective semblances, as noyes of popularity, were euer conceiued to aime at the supreme authority: which blot of ielousie, when it could no otherwise bee wiped out, he abandoned the Court of the King, and Country of his birth, and in France as an exile, at the time of Redwald the Father, and likewise the reign of Egbert, the sonne, spent his time in study of good Literature, & contemplative exercises, where learning the truth of Christs Doctrine, and hauing received the lauer of Baptisme, after the death of this said Egbert, his allied Brother, returned, and was made King of the East-Angles.

France, brought the light of the Gospel into his Dominions, and by the assistance of Edelweith Bishop of Dunwich, for a more firme plantation thereof, built a Schoole for the education of children, appointing them Schoole-masters and Teachers after the manner of the Kentish-men, who are supposed to have at that time the Liberal Sciences professed among them, in their Metropolitane City Canterbury, which was the pattern (saith that Countryes Perambulator) that this Sigbert followed in the erection of his; but whether at Cambridge or elsewhere, he leameth for Doctor Caim of Cambridge, and M. Key of Oxford, to be dispersed of. And indeed Edelweith notwithstanding the place for this foundation, nor once nameth Cambridge, unless you will say, that out of the ruins of Græstæfer, an ancient Cite decayed in his daies, the same arose, and whereof he maketh mention in his fourth Booke, upon this occasion as followeth.

Queene Ethelred (saith he) that had been a Virgin, wife to Egfrid King of Northumberland the twelfth of twelve yeeres, and Abbesse of Ely for sixteen more, for her reputed holinesse after her death and buriall, was thought worthy by Queen Seckburg her sister (who had beene wife to Egbert King of Kent, and succeeded her Abbesse in the same Monastery) to be removed out of her wooden Tombe & meane place of buriall, into the Church and richer Moniment: but for want of stone, which was scarce in those parts, certaine brethren were sent to find some for that use, who coming to Winton, a little City left desolate and uninhabited, found by the walls a Tombe of white marble vaine faire, and covered with a like stone. This they thought to be found not without miracle, and therefore mooved to iourne the corps, which accordingly they did. But that this had beene the place of Sigbert Schoole, he mentioneth not. But whether by him or no, we know it now the other University of England, a feed-plot of all divine and humane Literature, and one of those Springs whence issue the wholesome waters that doe bedewe both the Church & Common-wealth, both, famous for the Artis for Building, and Reverences, as their like is not to be found in Europe (saith Peter Martyr) and that most truly. But to returne: Sigbert being wearied with the weighty affairs of this world, laid the burden thereof upon Egfrid his kinsman, and thore himselfe a Monk in the Abby of Canterbury, which himselfe had built, & wherein he lived, until that wicked Penda, the Mercean King, with his heathenish cruelty molested the peace of the East-Angles so long, that resistance, finding themselves too weak, besought Sigbert, for the better encouragement of their soldiers, to leue himselfe in field; which when he refused, by constraint (saith Beda) they drew him forth, where in the midst of them hee was slain in battle, vining no other weapon for defence, saving only a white wand; when hee had raigned only three yeeres, and left no issue to suruiue him, that is any where recorded.

Egbert, cousin to King Sigbert, and by him made King, as we have said, was fore molested by the continual inuasions of Penda, the cruell King of Merca, who laist in a few battles slew him with Sigbert, about the yeere of Christ his incarnation six hundred fifty two. And when himselfe had raigned 4. yeeres, deceased, without mentio either of wife or child, that is read of, further to reume his memory to posterities.

Anna succeeded King Egbert in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of grace six hundred fortie two, as the next in blood to Egbert, being the sonne of Guada, saith Beda, the sonne of Euf, saith Malmsbury, who was brother to great Redwald; and both of them the sons of Witow, the second King of that Province. This King, as the other two former had done, felt the fury of raging Penda, with his mercelless Mercean, that fore assaulted his Territories with rapine and spoile. To withstand whose further proceedings, King Anna drew the strength of his East-Angles against them, and encountered Penda in a great and mortall battle, wherein they were all diucom-

ted and himselfe among them slain, when hee had raigned in continual trouble the space of thirteene yeeres. His issue were many, and those of great holinesse or sanctity of life. Whereof Ferment the eldest, and heire apparent, was slain by Penda in the same battle with his Father, and was with him buried in Bildirburgh, now Bildirburgh, but afterwards removed to S. Edmundsbury. His other sonne was Erkmund, Abbot of Chertside, and Bishoppe of London, that lieth buried in the South Ile, about the Quire in S. Pauls Church, where to this day remaineth a memoriall of him. His daughters were three; Ethelred the eldest, was first married to a Nobleman, whom Beda nameth Tumbert, Governor of the Fenny Countreies of Notthfolke, Huntingdon, Lincolne, and Cambridge-shires; and after his death remaining a virgin, she was married to Egfrid King of Northumberland, with whom likewise she lived in perfect virginity the space of twelue yeeres, notwithstanding his intreaty and allurement to the contrary. From whom lastly, she was released, and had licence to depart his Coniugate, vnto the Abbey of Coldingham, where first she was vailed a Nunne vnder Abbesse Etha, and thence departing, she lived at Ely, and became her selfe Abbesse thereof, wherein lastly she died, and was interred; remembered vnto posterities by the name of S. Andree. His second daughter was Seckburg, who married Egbert, King of Kent, vnto whom she bare two sons, and two daughters, as we in that Kingdome succession have said: after whose death, she took the habit of a Nunne, and succeeded her sister Ethelred, Abbesse of Ely, wherein she died and was interred; and their youngest sister Witwith, was likewise a Mercean with them in the same Monastery, and all of them canonized for Saintes. Ethelburg his third daughter was made Abbesse of Reyking, neere London, built by her brother Bishop Erkmund, wherein she lived, and lastly died. A natural daughter likewise he had, whose name was Edelweith, that with Seckburg the daughter of his wife, were both of them professed Nunnnes, and succeeded each other Abbesse in the Monastery of S. Briggis in France. Such a reputed holinesse it was held in those daies, not only to be separated from the accompanying with men, wherunto women by God were created, but also to abandon the Country of their nativity, and as strangers in forraigne Lands, to spend the continuance of their liues.

Ethelred, the brother of Anna, the yeere of Christ his incarnation six hundred fifty foure, was made King of the East-Angles: the which it seemeth hee had attempted in the reign of his brother, for that hee had assisted Penda in his warres against him; and was the motive (saith Beda) of the warres against Offa King of Northumberland, in wherin siding with the heathen Penda, hee was worthily slain, the fifteenth day of November, when hee had raigned only two yeeres, leaving his name to the blot of infamy, and his Crowne to be possessed by his younger brother. His wife was Herefrith sister of Hilda, the famous learned Abbesse of Streaneshale, and great grand-child to Edwyn King of Northumberland, who bare vnto him Aladulf, Ethelweith, and Egbert, all three succeeding Ethelred in the Kingdome of the East-Angles.

Edwald the brother of Ethelred entered his government of the East-Angles the yeere of our Lord six hundred fifty sixe, and continued the same the space of nine yeeres, without either mention of any other memorable act: from whom (as is supposed) issued Ethelred that succeeded King after Thorn.

Aladulf, the eldest sonne of Ethelred and Queene Herefrith, after the death of his vncle King Edwald, obtained the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and therein raigned without any honour or honourable action by him performed: onely his name and time of his raigne, which was nineteene yeeres, is left of him by Writers: and affordeth no further relation of vs here to be inserted, besides his Coine here set.

A CATALOGVE OF SVCH BRITISH PRINCES AS WITHSTOOD THE SAXONS IN THEIR CONQUESTS FROM VORTIGERNE THEIR FIRST MAINTAINER, VNTO CADWALLADER THEIR LAST RESISTER.

CHAPTER XII.

Historie the Roman Empire.

The British Opinions.

Refusers of the Saxons.

NOW we have spoken of every fourth Saxon King, that assumed vnto, and held possession of any part in the East & South of this Island, vntill such time as their Crowns were worn by their Conquerors, and the tenfold diuided Heptarchy, vnited into an absolute Monarchy: so by order of History it is required, that their opposers (the Britains) so long as they kept their ground, and stood in defence of their owne rightful inheritance, should be shewed: who with as great a dilaine, and valorous resistance, vnder-went the yoke of the Saxons subiections, as their ancient Ancestors had endeuoured to cleere themselves from the chaines of the Romans captivity. And vntill God and destiny withdrew from them the hand of defence, they meted the Saxons in all their designs. For albeit that the Romans had robbed the Land of her strength, and the aspiring Vortigern, called in these Strangers for his defence: yet their purposes being wisely perceived, the execution thereof was as presently practised, and as eagerly pursued, whilst the pillars (that supported the frame of their gouernment) stood vpon their owne Basis. But the ground-work failing, and those props not many, the weight of all, fell vpon some few, whose acts and manly resistance (Christ assisting) shall further be related, as time shall bring them to the yeeres of their aduentures, and carry our History throuow the affaires of their times. Meane while, as we haue recorded the names of their Ancestors, and worthy fore-runners, the resisters of the Romans: so now if you please, behold the Catalogue of their Kings, from the forefaid Vortigern (the last subdued by their Saxons) vnto Cadwallader the last of those British Princes, who left to them his Land, and went himself to Rome: whose times & stories, according to those Guides that lead vs, wee will declare, referring the credit thereof to our British Historians, against whom howsoever some exceptions are, and may be fully taken, yet are they not altogether to be cast off, as the affaires of these ensuing Princes, especially Osbert and Ninian, who liued in, and presently after the times of those resisters. Neither is it to be doubted, but that many others there were of that Nation, no lesse carefull for transferring the remembrance of their Ancestors actions to posteritie, (no Nation haing being more zealouslly deuoiced in that kinde,) though their writings haue in Times runnes bene buried, and their remembrances preferred onely by perpetuall of traditions, and although wee haue shewed the ancient Councels of the Brittains, and obscured a series throuow the Romans succession: yet be not offended, that I leaue onely Blanks for these latter Princes, as also the first Saxons, wanting the Monies of their owne severall Mintes.

Such therefore as I haue found of any Kings stamp, reigning whilst the Land was diuided and enioied vnto them, I haue in the margent of their remembrances affixed, with the Armes attributed to euerie severall kingdom: and hence will obserue the same order, without any inuention or fained inscription: which howsoever wee want to furnish their successions, yet this am I sure of, no Nation in Europe can shew the like, or can come to so true a series of their Soueraignes Coines, as England is able at this day to doe.

Vortigern the last and Cadwallader the last resister of the Saxons.

A Succession Series of Great Brittain Coines.

VORTIGERN. I.

Vortigern among the many molestations of the Saxons and Picts, was ordained the supreme Gouernor of these affairs; and to that end, with the Brittains full consent was elected their King. For as touching that Monkish

Monkith Constantine, the sonne of Constantius, who is said to be the brother of Alderman, King of Little Britaine in France, sent for and made King by these Britons, whose simplicitie this Portiger is said to abuse, and lally to cause his murther and death; I rather thinke the storie to be the same that happened about fortie yeeres before, in the daies of Marinus the Emperour; wher Constantine among other Conspirators, was raised vpon a hopefull expectation conceived in his name.

This Constantius indeed had a sonne that bare his name, a man of a lost spirit, and no deepe reach, and therefore in his youth was made a Monk. But his Father risen to his aspiring honour, created him first his Cesar, and next Augustus, till Fortune turned those smiles into frownes, and stained their purple robes in both their own bloods. For not only the same names is doone this doubt, but the place, which was Winchester, and Abbey Ampleforth, where this Imperiall Monk was borne, doth not a little confirme the same; the remains of which Colledge, by that strong and thicke wall standing to this day at the West gate of that Cathedral Church, doth not a little confirme. But wanting better directions to our proceedings, we must follow for these times men of later yeeres, and not without some suspight of vncertaintie. The rather, for that the Saxons as then the chiefe Actors in this Land, have purposely concealed all Victors and victories against themselves; neither but sparingly have recorded their owne.

This Portiger, howeouer attaining the Crowne, was over-awed (with Ninus) by the Pells Or-Sons, blood-seare of the Roman forces, and detrad much the returne of Aurelius Ambrosius, with his brother Pter, famed Pendragon; and therefore wanting strenght of his owne to maintaine his standing, sent for the Saxons, as wee have said. He (with the British Story) was Earle of Cornwall, of an honourable Familie and noble descent, his Lady every way answerable to both; by whom hee had three sonnes, Portimer, Catigern, and Pastentus. His second wife, or rather Concubine, (having call off this first) was Armenia, the daughter of Blengis, which Pagan marriage proued not only the bane of the Land, but so ruined the Church of Christianity, that a Prouinciall Councell of the Britaines was assembled in Ann. 470, to repaire those things that this marriage had decayed.

By this Heathen Dumofell he had a daughter, who (against the law of God and Nature) was his third wife, that Kings (as he pretended, so excuse his meell) might be descended from the right issue of Kings, vpon whom he begot his sad lamenting sonne Fangine, a vertuous Impe of those impious parents, that spent his life in a solitarie place neere to the Riuer Lhyterrenny, as wee haue said; who abandoning the companie of men, among those mountains serued God in continual teares and prayers, for remission of the fault committed in his incestuous generation, for the recalling of his parents to a better life, and for the restitution of his Country to her former libertie.

This Portiger reigned first sixtene yeeres, and then depouled for his fauours to the Saxons, was retained in durance all the raigne of Portimer his sonne, after whole death reestablished, but oppressed by his Saxons and purified by Aurelius he withdrew himselfe into Wales, and among those vast mountaines built a Cattle by Mertion direction, wherof we haue spoken, and more we would speake, were those fantastick fictions vnderlet with any props of likelihood or truth, which Rand, of Chester in his daies vicerly reiected.

In this Cattle, Portiger with his incestuous wife, after hee had secondly reigned the space of six yeeres, was conlamed to ashet, by the iust reuenging hand of God, by fire from heauen, as some haue written; or else kindled by Aurelius and Pter, as his Ministers to execute his wrath.

VORTIMER. 2.

Vortimer, the eldest son of King Portiger, through the abuse of his fathers government, for which he was depouled by his owne subjects, was erected King of the Britaines the yeere from Christs birth 454. a man of great valour, which altogether bee imployed for the redresse of his Country, according to the testimonie of William Malmesbury, whose words are these: Vortimer (with hee) thinking not good to dissemble the matter, for that hee saw himselfe and Countrie daily surprisid by the craft of the English, for his full purpose to drine them out, and from the fourth yeere after their first entrance, for twenty yeeres continuance fought many Battles with them, and saued of them with great paine. Since in open field, in the first whereof, they departed with like fortune, and losse of the Generalls brethren Harfa and Catigern: in the other three the Britaines went away with victorie, and so long until Vortimer was taken away by fatal death.

Huntington, Monmouth, Randolph, and Falces, name both the places and success of those Battles: The first was in Kent, and vpon the Plaine neere vnto Aldford, where the memorall of Catigern to this day remaineth, & Harfa fled doch as yet reliks of Harfa there interred. The second Battle was fought likewise in Kent at Croasford, now Craford, where many perished as well Britaines as Saxons. The third was at Weppe's Fleet, with great losse to the Britaines: and the fourth vpon Calanor, where many of the Saxons, after long and fore fight, were slaine, and more drowned in flight, and lally druen into the Ile of Taney, their first

But destiny going forward for the downfall of Brit- tain, remooed these rubbes out of her way: for Ravenna, the mother of the Brittaines mischief, and the maintainer of the Saxons residence, found the means to make this worthy Portimer away, and by poison crossed the end of his life, after hee had valiantly raigned the space of foure yeeres, all which time, by the testimonie of an old Chronicle that Fabian had scene, Portimer the father remained in durance, and vnder assigned Keepers to the Cite Caerlegyn, now Chester, and so demeaned himselfe towards his sonne (then his Sonneraigne) in dutifull obedience and faith-full counsell, that hee worne againe the hearts of the Brittaines, and was againe re-established their King.

It is recorded by Ninias, that after his last victorie over the Saxons, he caused his Monument to be erected at the entrance into Taneset, and in the same place of that great overthrow, which by the said Author is called Lapis Tituli, of vs the Stemar, where for certaine it seemes hath been an haue. In this Monument hee commanded his body to be buried, to the further terror of the Saxons, that in beholding this his Trophy, their spirits might bee daunted at the remembrance of their great overthrow. As Scipio Afri- cane conceived the like, who commanded his Sepulchre to be so fer, that it might overlooke Africa, (supposing that his very Tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. But how that desire of Portimer was performed, I finde not, but rather the contrary: for an old Manuscript I haue, that confidently affirmeth him to be buried in London: yet others from Ninias the disciple of Elandugus, hold the place to bee Lincolne.

But howsoever his graue is forgotten, yet let this bee remembered, that Sigebertus hath written of him, that is, after he had vanquished the Saxons (saith he) whose drift was not only to ouer-runne the Land with violence, but also to erect there some Lawes without clemencie, he reflected the Christian Religion then sorely decayed, and new built the Churches that those enemies had destroyed.

Avrelivus Ambrosius, verily descended of that Can- stantine who in the fourth Consallship of Theodosius
the younger, was elected here in Britaine, onely in hope of this lucke name, succeeded Portimer the Father in the Government of Britaine, and Portimer the sonne, in affection and defence of his Country. He with Vier (saith Geoffrey Meremouth) when their brother Constantine was murdered by Vortigern, fled into France, where they remained the yeeres of his first raigne; whose returne (as we haue heard from Ninias)
he greatly feared, and whose force in his last he felt to his limar. For haniog againe resumed his Crowne, he liued in his old sinnes, and suffered the Saxons to be Lords of his Land: to prevent which (saith Beda from Gylden) the Brittaines by little and little beganne to take strength, and with some courage to come forth of their Cakes, who with one confessement, called to God for his heavenly help. They had (saith he) for their Captaine a Roman called Ambrosius Aurelianus, a gentle natured man, whose moety of all the blood of the Romans remained then alive, his parents being Slaves, which bore the name of King of the Country. This man being their Leader, provoked the Victors to the fight, and through Gods assistance obtained the victory. From that day forward now the Brittaines now the Saxons did preuaile, until the yeere that Batho was besieged, which was fiftie foure yeeres after their first coming into the Isle.

His first expedition (as our British Historians report) was against Vortigern, and his Caste in Wales, wherein that inscruetious King was confumed to ashes

by lightning from heuena as we haue said: and then following the Saxons made toward Tyrke, & at Mas- bel beyond Humber, encountering Hamfrid, became his Victor: vnto whose mercy (say they) his sonne Ossa yielded himselfe, and obtained in free gift the Country in Galloway in Scotland for him and his Saxons. But these his affaires thus prospering against the common Enemie, was enuied at by Pascentius, the youngest son of King Vortigern, who not able eather to mate the Saxons, or after his Brethrens deaths to recouer the Kingdome to himselfe, ambitiously fought to prefer his base humor before the recovery of his Countries libertie, which then lay gored in her owne blood. For hauiog gotten the aid of Gildmare King of Ireland, whether hee had fled vpon the death of his Father,
and now returned into the west of Wales, first damaged the Cite of S. Davids, and thence proceeded with fire and sword. Aurelius then sicke in the Cite of Winchester, lent his brother Vier to withstand his force, who slew both Pascentius and the Irish King his partner, in a fer & fore battell fought betwix them.
But before this battell, Pascentius had sent a Saxon, whose name was Epa, in shew a Britaine, and in habit
a Physician, to minister poison in stead of phylicke, which according was effected with Ambrosius his death.

Vnto this Aurelius Ambrosius is ascribed the cression of that rare and admirable monumene, now called Stanhenge, in the same place where the Brittaines had been treacherously slaughtered and iscerred, whose manner and forme in our draught of Wiltshire wee have inferred. The matter being Stones of a great and huge bignesse, so that some of them continue twelve tunne in waighe, and twenty eight foote or more in length, their breadth seven, and compass sixteene. These are set in the ground of a good depth, and stand in a round circle by two and two, having a third stone somewhat of lesse quantitie laid gate-wise overthwart on their toppes, fastned with reasens and mortises, the one into the other; which to some seeme so dangerous, as they may not safely be passed vader, the rather for that many of them are fallen downe, and the rest suspected of no sure foundation: notwithstanding, at my being there, I neither saw cause of such feare, nor uncertaintie in accounting of their numbers, as is said to be. The stones are gray, but not marbled, wherein great holes are bitten even by force of weather, that serve for Ravens and other birds to build in, and bring forth their young. The ground-plot containeth about three hundred foote in compass, in forme almost round, or rather like unto a horse-shoe, with an entrance vpon the east-side. Three rowes of stones seeme formerly to have bene pitched, the largest outwards, and the least inwards; many whereof are now fallen downe: but those that stand, shew so faire an aspect, and that so farre off, that they seeme to the beholders to bee some Fortresse or strong Castle. A Trench also is about them, which hath bene much deeper; and vpon the plaines adjoining, many round copped hills, without any fack trench, (as it were cast vp out of the earth) stand like great hay-cockes in a plaine meadow: In these, and thereabouts, by digging have bene found peeces of ancient fashioned armour, with the bones of men, whose bodies were thus conected with earth that was brought thither by their well-willers and friends, even in their head-peeces, a token of love that then was used, as some imagine.

This Trophey, Aurelius Ambrosius (in memoriall of the Britains massacre) erected, and is worthily accounted for one of the Wonders of this Island, and are in the verses of Alexander Neckam called The Giants Danee, wherein this Ambrosius was inserted after hee had raygned thirte two yeeres, and wherof the towne Ambrosbury beares the name. Others report, that the Britains erected this most lately Sepulcher over the body of Ambrosius there slaine by the sword of his enemies, that his Countreys loue, in such a costly peece of worke, might remaine vnto posterities in this, the Altar of his vertue and manhood: for Paulus Diaconus saith, that this man, in succouring his decayed Countreys, took upon him the Imperiall Robe, and against the violent rage of those German enemies, six times overthrew their puissant armies, but was lastly slaine by them vpon the Plaines of Salisbury. I cannot with silence let passe the ridiculous reports of the bringing of the Stones out of Africke into Ireland, and from thence, vnder the conduct of Pter the brother of Ambrosius, vnto this Plan, by the industrious meynes of Merlin, surnamed Ambrosius, borne in the ancient City Aberdyn and as Humphrey Lloyd saith, of a noble virgin, whose father, for his skill in the Mathematicks, and wonderful knowledge in all other kinde of learning, was by the rude common people reputed to be the sonne of an Incubus, or a male Diuell, which in the similitude and likeness of men doe use carnally to compass with women. But how this may agree with his diuine mouth, that telleth vs the Spirits haue neither flesh nor bones; and the whole Scriptures, that man is carnally begotten, conceived and borne, I leave for others further to dispute. Only I know, that such begettings as Asterlines is reported to be, without father, and Simon Magus also, that before him would needs be the sonne of a Virgin, doe not a little contradict our Christian Profession, who acknowledge onely the conception of Christ to be conceived without the seed of man, or of sinne. But to our purpose: Ambrosius Aurelius (by Passenus accounted the last Emperour of the British blood) is said to raygne in Britaine thirty two yeeres, and to die in that of Christs Incarnation foure hundred ninety seven.

Vter, surnamed Pendragon, the brother of Ambrosius succeeded him both in valour, and in the Government of Britaine. His entrance was with troubles against the Saxons, who vnder the leading of Eike and Olla, the sonnes of King Henrich, had passed with spoile to the Cisre Yorke, whither this new-made Generall presently repaired, and gining them battell, with the discomfiture of the whole Army, tooke both the brethren prisoners, and committed them to safe custodie.

But the Britains (saith Baronius) becoming disloyall to their Prince, seldom assisted him with preuenting counsell: and the Prince enamored vpon the Duke of Cornwall Wife, consulted more with Asterline to transforme himselfe from himselfe, then to giue direction against the common enemy. For coming to Tindagel Castle in Cornwall, possessed by Gorlois, Duke of that Province, beheld (in his eye) the Pendragon of Nature, which was Lady Igron, his Dutchesse and wife. Pter, whose thoughts till then had bin free, and from his childhood had euer followed Chloris in the field, was now surprised so far with her love, that his Shield and Armes were both neglected and vnworne, and all his thoughts set on worke to purchase his most wished desire; which lastly, by Merline and Magick was effected, and that after this manner (if we

but as it seemeth, not any of ancient credit, so many toies and tales hee every where interlatcht out of his owne braine, where with hee was charged while himselfe lived, in so much as he is now ranged among those Writers whom the Roman Church hath censured to be forbidden.

This hurt therefore those over-zealous Monks
have done to the Subiect whereof they wrote, that through an over-much conceived opinion, with the virtue and fame of the person, they have mingled such matters as may justly be reected, whereby their worths are not only deprived of their truly-deserved honours, but which more is, even their persons suspected to be bought else but fictions, as Hercules in Ovid, or Heitor in Homer. And so hath Geffrey done by this most worthy Prince Arthur, whose warres against the Saxons for defense of this Island he hath enlarged with the Conquests of other Kingdoms and Countries, wherein he neuer came: which hath made not onely his Acts to be doubted of, but even his person to be called in question, whether any such Arthur ever ruled in Britaine. Yet with better regard to the Reverend of his spreading fame, we grant both the man, and many honorable parts in him, though not in the like manner as they have laid them downe. Neither are we straid so farre from the steps of credulitie, that we can beleue no more then wee see, or that seeing, bee fore-balled with a preiudicate opinion: for though we confent not to the fables of Homer, neither to the inventions that Esopides and Sophocles made vpon the Battles of Troy, yet we denie not but that there were warres and Battles at Troy, wherein many Martiall acts vndoubtedly were performed: neither doubt wee of his person, as Senecca seemeth to doe of Epistates, but acknowledge it with reverence for truth, yet with this reservation, that all is not Gospell which is written in Greece. And had there not bene a truth of things whereupon Poets made their fables, there had bene at this day no fables of Poets in the world. And as Geffrey wondreth that neither Gylden nor Beda doe mention Arthur nor his great deeds, so faith Randolphus, may we as Geffrey, that hath augmented them about the pitch of credulitie. But for the truth of this Prince, besides a Charter exemplified vnder the seale of King Edward the Third, wherein mention is made of King Arthur, to have bene a great Benefactor to the Abbey of Glastenbury, who as Isabel Bayle reporteth, had giuen Three hundred and other Demaines, to the value of five hundred Markes yearly, to the said Monas-terie. His Armes (being an Efpee and horne, whereon a Crosse, with the Virgin Mary bearing Christ in her armes) cut in stone, and standing ouer the first Gate of entrance as yet, is said to be the Armes of that Abbey. And Is-op, the iudicious Monke of Exeter, who followed King Richard the First in his warre for the Conquest of the Holy Land, in his poeticall verses extolleth Arthur with Alexander, Cesar, and Hercules; yea and Nimus, farre his ancient, calleth Arthur an Iron Man all that both bruised and brake the Lions iawes asunder.

Therefore of his person we make no doubt, though his acts have bene written with too laith a pen: neither confent we with those Hijian that naturalize him for a Britaine, seeing that Ninus, Beda, Malmesbury, and himselfe seeme to speake the contrarie: for Ambrosius being the brother of Vter Pendragon, as we already from Beda have shewed, was a Captaine descended from the blood of the Romans, whose parents faith Ninus, had worne the Purple Robe, and both of them the Coronet of Constantine, whose father in Brit-taine against Henricus the Emperour had put on the said Robe. And by his naturall descent from the Ra-mans, Arthur not only denied them Tribute, but also threatened to haue a Tribute from Rome: for in his Letters to that end faine vnto the Senate, thus in an old Manuscript we finde it indited: I desire and among you of Rome, that I am King Arthur of Britaine, and freely at hand, and shall send, and at Rome highly will be, not to give you tribute, but to haue tribute of you: for Constantine that was an Emperour, and other of mine Ancestors con- quered Rome, and thereof were Emperours, and that they had and held I shall haue your Goddes grace. Whereby is manifest his blood was from the Romans. Let not therefore any of our Britaines take exceptions against me for this, neither that I enlarge not his family, by the enlargement of his Empire in Rusles, Lapland, and in making Norway his Chamber of Britaine, as if that Kingdome and Title should be giuen him by the Pope, that indeed cuts large thongs out of other mens Leather: his Conquests of thirty Kingdomes, and killing of Dracabus the huge Spanish Giant, & his combat with Frula Governor of France, and with Lucius Hibernus the Roman Legate, whose blaine body hee beat to the Senate for the tribute of Britaine by them demanded: seeing that others before mee, farre more ripe Historians, haue made both doubts and obiections against them. And therefore I conclude with this Arthur, as Saint Augustine with the Athenians, whose men (saith he) were more greater in fame then in deeds. And with Ninus will end with his saying, Arthurus pugnabat contra illos in debui illis: & loci multi ipsi nobilitatis essent, ipse tamen audieritis Dux belis fuit, Victique bellorum: Arthurus made warre against them in those daies: and though many were more nobilitates bey, yet was hee twelve times General in the Field, and reuerend Conquerour. But more constant is the memorie of his death, and place of his burill, both which are reported vpon warrantable credit: for Matthew the sonne of Lutke, whereof wee haue spoken, affecting the Crown, vpon a pretence of right from King Peter, and supposed balladise of Arthur, gaue many attempts, through the aid of his Pitts, and assistance of the Saxons, to dispossesse him of that wherein he was seated: and lastly at Kamblen or Cambula in Cornuall (which Ireland) this Brish Heitor encountering Maried, slew him out-right, and reuenged of him his owne death wound. The witness of this Field as yet are those peeces of Armour, horse-harness, and other habilli-mentes of Warre, which are daily digged vp in tillage of the ground: vnlesse those reliques of Battle bee the seales of that fight which Marianus writeth to haue bene in this place betwixt the Britainers and Saxons, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and twenty.

If then it bee true that Arthur here died, this place we may say seemeth to be consecrated vnto Mars: for Tandagell aslie, standing hard by, first brought into the world this glorious Prince, for one of her nine Warthies, and Cambula againe receiued his last blood.
But from this place he was carried vnto Glastenbury;
in Summer floure, where he died the one and twentieth of May, in the yeere of our Saluation five hundred forty and two, after he had most victoriously reigned twenty six yeeres. His body was there buried, and six hundred yeeres after was taken vp, and found vpon this occasion: When Henry the second, and first Histagenes had swaied the English Scepter to the last of his raigne, it chanced him at Penobroke to beare sing to the Harpe certaine Ditties of the worthy exploits and acts of this Arthur, (by a Welsh Bard, as they were termed, whose costume was to record and sing at their Feasts the noble deeds of their Ancestours) wherein mention was made of his death, and place of burill, designing it to be in the Church-yard of Glastenbury,
and that betwixt two Pyramides therein standing:
whereupon King Henry gaue the ground to be dig-ged, and at seven foot depth was found a huge broad stone, wherein a ladden Crosse was filled, and in that side that lay downward, in rude and barbarous letters (as rudely set and contrived) this inscription written vpon that side of the Lead that was towards the stone:

HIC IACET SEPULTVS REX AR-THVRVS IN INSULA AVALONIA.

Here lieth King Arthur buried in the Ile of Avalonia.
And digging nine foot deeper, his body was found in the trunk of a Tree, the bones of great bignesse, and in his skull perceiued ten wounds, the last very great, and plainly seene. His Queene Gineuore, that had theſter, whither Conſtantine purſued them, they taking Sanctuaries in the Churches, and not farre from the Altars he ſlew them : for which deede, the Prieſt Gyltas, that flouriſhed in thoſe daies, in his much more reprehendiſh thus writeth : Britaine hath Kings (ſaith hee) but they are Tyrants : I judge it hath, but they are wicked, killing and burning the innocent people, wronging and defending, but whom ? Such as be guilty and robbers. They have many wives, yet breake they wedlocke : many times ſwearing, yet perjure themſelves : viewing but for the moſt part with diſſembliſh lies : warring, but ſtill maintaining civill and civil broiles : abroad purſuing themes, and yet at home overthrowing them, even at their own Tables, and ſometimes alſo reward them. They gave large almes indeed, yet heape they up ſinnes high as the Mountains. They ſit in the Seat of judgement, yet ſeldome ſeeke the rule of right judgement, deſpiſing the humble and innocent people, and exalting up to Heaven proud and bloudey Jewes, Thieves, and Adulterers, yea and if it would permit them, the very enemies of God. At any they keepe in priſon, and load them with wrongs, more to ſerve their own purpoſes, then for any guilt in the perſon taking ſolemn Oaths before God upon the Altars, and yet deſpiſe they the Altars, as altogether vile, and but ſtrike ſinners.

Of this heinous and wicked offence, Conſtantine, the true amical whelpe of the Lionneſſe of Deuonſhire is not ignorant, who this yeere, after the recovery of his dreadfull

Oath, whereby he bound himſelfe, that in no wife he ſhould hurt his Subjects, (God firſt, and then his Oath, with the company of Saints, and his own mother being preſent, did manfully ſtanding in the reverend lap of both his Mothers, the Church, and her by nature, and that under the veſture of an holy Abbat, denounce with ſword and ſpate, in ſtead of ſtrech, the tender ſides and the entrails of two children of noble and Kingly race, and likewiſe of their two Governours, yea and that (as I ſaid) before the ſacred Altars : the Armes of which Perſons ſuſtained, not ſtreched forth to defend themſelves with weapons (which few in thoſe daies handled more valiantly then they) but ſtreched forth to God, and to his Altar, on the day of judgement ſhall ſet up the reverend empires of their patience and faith as the Gates of the City of Chriſt, which ſo have covered the ſeat of the Celeſtiall Sacrifice, as it were with the red Mantle of their clattered blood.

Theſe things hee did not after any good deeds done by him deſerving praife : for many yeeres before were come with the often and changeable ſinns of adulterie, as I ſaying his lawfull wife (contrary to the Law of God) became not lawfull from the ſauces of his former ſinnes, hee increaſeth the new with the old. Thus ſaw Gyltas, for this time, and for the raigne of Conſtantine, whole life being no better, was cut off in battell by Aurelius Cananus, when he had raigned fully three yeeres, and without illuſe was buried at Stonebury.

Aurelius Cananus, the Nephew of King Arthur, after he had ſlain his Cole Conſtantine in battell, was made King over the Brittaines in the yeere after Chriſti Natiuite five hundred thirtiſe five. He was of diſpoſition free and liberal, but therewithall of a light credit, and very ſuſpicious, cheriſhing them that accuſed others, without reſpect of right or wrong, putting ſome to death, and retaining others in perpetuall priſon, among whom his own Vnkle was one, whole two ſons he cauſed to be ſlain, no cauſes objected, but that theſe three were in raigne betwixt him & the Crowne: for which, and other the like impious parts, the ſaid Gyltas continueth the terrors of his vehement reprehension in this manner. And thou Lions whelpe (as ſpeaketh the Prophet) Aurelius Cananus, what doſt thou? art thou not ſuſtained up in the filthy mire of murdering thy Kingſmen, of committing fornications and adulteries, like to the others before mentioned, if not more deadly, as it were with the waves and furres of the direfull Sea, now whelming thee with her commodious rage? doſt thou not in hating the peace of thy Countrey, as a deadly Serpent, and thirſting after civill warres and ſqualls (ſeven times more by gotten) ſhut up againſt thy ſoule the Gates of celeſtiall peace? Thou being left alone, as a withering tree in the middle of a field, call to remembrance (I pray thee) the vaine yearfull fantaſie, and our timely deaths of thy Fathers and thy Brethren : ſhalt thou being ſet apart, and choſen forth of all thy lineage for thy godly deſires, be referred to live an hundred yeeres, or reſcued on earth till thou be as old as Methuſelah? nothing leſſe. And thus with exhortations for his amendment, turneth his ſpeech to his Succeſſor.

The raigne of this King, among the uncertainties of other proceedings, is ranged by our owne Hiſtorians, as uncertainly, is ranged by our owne Hiſtorians, as uncertainly. For ſome hold him to rule onely two yeeres, and no more, being then cut off by the juſt reuenging hand of God for his ſinnes : others allow three yeeres for his raigne, wherein, as they ſay, moſt viciously hee liued : and yet Matthew of Weſtmiſter will have him continue in government no leſſe then thirty yeeres; and John Stow addeth three more : ſuch extremes are we driven vnto, that haue our relations onlie from them.

VORTIPORVS. 8.

An. Do. 578.

Vortiporus, after the death of Aurelius, succeeded him in the Kingdome of the Britaines, which then was much scantied by the intrusions of the Saxons whom in many battels (as faith the British Historians) he vanquished, and valiantly defended his Land and Subjects, from the danger of them and of their Allies: notwithstanding these reported actions thus honorably attested, yea and his Parentage with succession of government, may be both suspected and justly called in question, as by the words of Gyldas is manifest; who suffered not this King also to passe untouched in his Inuention and lamentable passions. And thou (saith he) Vortiporus the Tyrant of South-wales, like to the Panther in manners and wickedness, diversly spotted, as it were with many colours, with thy haire head in the T brane full of deceipts, grafts, and wiles, and defiled even from the lowest part of thy body to the Crowne of thy head, with diuers and sundry murders committed on thine own kin, and filly adulteries, thus proving the unworthy sonne of a good King, as Manasse was to Isaacus; how then canst it that the vilest of sinners, which thou swallowest up like pleasant wine, or rather art swallowed up by this (the end of thy life by little & little now drawing neere) cannot yet sacrifice thee what meanest thou, that with fornication, of all evils as it were the full heap, thou own wife being put away, with her death, which thou wroughtest, dost oppress thy soule with a certain burthen that cannot be avoided?

By this testimony of Gyldas, this Vortiporus could not be the sonne of bad Canus, as Geffrey Monmouth and Matthew of Westminster affirme him: his Father being compared to goodly Ezechias King of Iudah, and him self continuing his government, as is said the space of foure yeeres, ended his life without issue to succeed him.

MALGO CANONVS. 9.

An. D. 531.
Malgo Canonus.

Malgo Canonus, the Nephew of Aurelius Canonus, as some write, succeeded Vortiporus in the Kingdome of Britaine, a man of a most seemly presence, but withall, charged with many vnbecoming and foole finnes, by ancient Gyldas, the oonly recorder of the Actions in these times; who calleth him the Dragon of the Isles, greater in power then many, but exceeding all in mischief and malice; a large giuer, but more lauish and prodigall in all finnes and leuitiousness: in Armes and dominions more strong and greater then any other British Monarch; but stronger in the destruction of his owne soule, in committing the grand abhorred sinne of Sodomie.

In his youthfull daies, with sword and fire he brought to destruction his Father by the mothers side (being then king) together with many others, and after vpon a shew-ferme remorse of Conscience, vowed the profession and life of a Monk, but returned shortly after to his owne crimes, and became worse then he was before: for despoiling his first marriage, he became enamoured vpon the wife of his brothers sonne, whiles he was living; and after that he had kept her a certaine time, murdered them both. In these finnes he continued the terme of five yeeres, and dying without issue, left his Crowne to another.

By these reprehensions of Gyldas it should rather seeme

seeme that these Princes liued all together at one and the same time, vnto whom hee spake personally, and mouth to mouth, which could not be, if such successions and such yeeres had beene expired, as heere is laiddowne. And therefore not without cause some haue affirmed, that these Captaines vsurped authoritie together in diuers parts of the Iland, and not successiually one after another; neither indeed as Kings, but rather Tyrantes, polluted with these greuous sinnes, as you haue heard, and are so termed by their own Historian, that bringeth 'one more to tyrannize, whom neither Mormuth nor bee of Westmynster hath spoken of, which is Canneglasur, whom hee calleth, a Lion tawney Butcher, a Beare, a scourge of Religion, an Oppressour of the Clergie, that fought against God with his many greuous sinnes, and warred vpon men with his martiall weapons. Hee (saith hee) did put away his lawfull wife, promiscued the gally with many concubines, was proudly conceited of his owne wisdom, and set his whole hope in concertaine riches. If then the head was so sick, could the body be sound, that (as Beda saith) were so set to breake all orders of truth and iustice, that scant any taken or remembered thereof remained? And for witness against them, calleth their owne Historian Gyldas, that accused them of many impieties, and this not the least, that those Brittaines neglected the preaching of the Gospel to the Saxons.

For these sinnes assuredly, God gaue their Land to another Nation, and themselves to exile, or to the sword of their enemies. Howsoever, some later Britaine hath rather excused their sinnes by the ouerrash zeale of Gyldas, whom he tearmeth a Palpable Priest (but no perfect Historian) that beat down sinnes with an ouer-thurpe censur of the sinners, as the manner of many Preachers is at this day. But (saith hee) let the true renewer of the Brittaines appeare to the world: and surely so shall it doe for me. And againe I returne to my intended purpose.

CARETICVS. 10.

An. Do. 586.

Careticus succeeded Malso in the gouernment of Britaine, as destitute of vertue and fluent in vice, as any of these his preceeding Kings: for it is recorded that hee was a nourisher of dissensions, and sowed ciuill warres among his subiects; a sinne odible to God and Man, and vnto the vncoustant Brittaines gaue occasion of his hatred: which when the Saxons perceived, was further infligated, and with the assistance of Gormund an Arch-pirate, and Captaine of the Norwegians, followed against the King, who notable to resist them, fled into the Towne of Chechester for safety, but by the deuice of his pursuers, certaine sparrows being caught, and fire fastned to their feet, were let flie into the Towne, where lighting vpon straw and other matter fit for flaming, burnt in short space the whole Citie, and Careticus flying beyond Seuorne, secured himselfe among the Mountains of Wales, wherein he died, after he had vnprofitably reigned three yeeres: and from that time forth (saith Randolphus) the Brittaines lost their whole Kingdome in the East part of the Iland, and were confined in the West by the Riuer Seuorne and Doe.

they had forgone their Country, and betaken themselves to thole vau, but securing Mountains of a Ruler

Ruler only of North-wales, was made Gouverneur of all those parts, a man deterring well before hee came to that estate, and being risen, maintained himselfe and subjects in great honour and peace. His first affaires against the Saxons, was to revenge the deaths of his Britaines, and harmelesse Monks of Bangor, slaine (as we haue said) by wild Ethelfrid, the mighty King of Northumberland, who in Field had assembled all their powers, wherein the fallall end either of the Britaines or North-wales must needs haue ensued, had not the quarrell bene staid by the mediation of friends. These Kings, then, and there reconciled, embraced peace, with such true friendship, that they continued amitie together so long as they lived.

Harding saith, that this British King Cadwan, honourably received and worthily cherished Arca, whom this King Ethelfrid had put from his bed, for the loue he bare vnto his Concubine, but is deceiued in making her the mother of Edwin, that was his sister, and Cadwan to raigne but thirteen yeeres, whereas others allot him two and twentie.

John H. Angl.
Chap. 92.

Cadwall or Cadwallin, the sonne of Cadwan, was made King over the Britaines, the yeere of Christis Incarnation six hundred thirty five. He warred most strongly against the Saxons, and either by Conquest or Alliance iouined amitie with Penda the cruell King of the Mercians, a Pagan Idolater, himselfe by the report of Beda, although a Christian in name and profession, yet in minde and manners so rude and outrageous, that hee spared neither women nor childrens innocencie, but put all to death with greivous and bitter torments, so fulfild his cruell and vnmortall tyrannie, waiting a long time, and raging over the Provinces, purposed to exterminate out of the borders of Brittain the whole Nation of the English, and to extinguishe the very name of them. Neither did hee ought offeare any reuerence or homage to the Christian Religion, which those men embraced: so that when to this day (saith he) the Brittaines enquire it to be taught by the Faith or Religion of the Englishmen, neither will they communicate with them more then with Heathens or Pagans. These two cruell Kings slew the most Christian Edwin King of Northumberland, with his sonne Prince Osfride, in a great and bloody battle at Hatfield, the yeere of Christis incarnation six hundred thirty three: and the yeere following, with wicked force (saith Beda) but with worthy vengeance, Cadwall the Britaine slew Osfride and Edwin, Kings of Deira and Bermicia, that were become Apostates from their Christian Faith, and that with crueltie and lust of the Saxons, in their owne Wiltshire held it fit wittier to mention their names in their monasticall Calendar, nor register the yeere wherein they were slaine, in account of their governments, but assigne it vnto the raigne of their Successor King Osfride, which was so abhorred vnto his daies, so terrible was this worthy Cadwall, and odious the remembrance of the unfortunate Battle. And this cruell Captaine (saith he) ended not this felicitie long, for the said Osfride, to revenge his brothers death, came with a small power, but strongly fortified in the faith of Christ, and nere to the River Densie gave him battle, wherein himselfe and late-villanous Heph were all slaine and commended.

John H. Angl.

But we must remember that Beda was a Saxon, in whose behalfe his penne hath somewhat passed the bounds of equitie (if not veritie) in charging this most valiant Conqueror with tyranny, and his Martiall Sword with crueltie, that was drawne and strooke in defence of his native Country, wherein the Saxons claime stood only vpon vsult intrusion. So likewise himselfe being a Monke and Priest, bath euery where blamed the Brittaines for dissembling from the Roman Church, in celebration of Easter and other Ceremonies, whereas in doctrine they were as sincere, which is the true substance of the Gospell. But the Brittaines record that this valiant Cadwall died not in Heaven, neither by the hand of King Osfride, but that he raigned in great honour the space of eight and fortie yeeres, and in peace died a 20th of November in the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred seuentie seuen. His body the Brittaines buried in S. Marins Church in London, nere Ludgate; whose Image great and terrible, triumphantly riding on horsebacke, being artificially call of Brasse, they placed vpon the same VVitch gate, to the further feare and terror of the Saxons, as Forster before had commanded his at Stonor. But this relation, as also that he married the sister of King Penda, as my often named Manuscript reporteth, I leave to the best liking of my Reader.

About this time the most blasphemous doctrine of Mahomet began to infect all the Easterne World. For although himselfe liued some nine yeeres before the government of this Cadwall, yet presently after his death his doctrine was more publicly embraced. He was borne in Arabia, of a poore and base stocke, and being fatherlesse, was sold for a bondslave vnto an Ismaelite, whose name was Abdennaples, a man of exceeding great riches, and in great trade of merchandizing, and Mahomet for his subtiltie in wit, was his fix instrument, and greatly in his fauor. The Master dying, left Mahomet his chiefe Factor, who having great riches in his keeping, married his Maistris, and so became heire of all; with whom comforted one Sergius a Monke, which for heretie was fled into Arabia, who instructed Mahomet in the heresie of the Nestorians, and now for his wealth and Magicall Arts, wherewith hee bewitched the minds of the people, assumed affirmed to himselfe the name of the great Prophet of God, and began to be famoolly published for the doctrine which he taught: the which was none other but a confuted Chaos of all the heresies that had been before him; for with the Sabellians he denied the Trinitie; with the Manichees he affirmed but two persons to bee in the Deity; with Zenonius, hee denied the equalitye of the Father and the Sonne; and with Macdonus, taught that the Holy Ghost was a creature. He borrowed of the Jewes Circumcision; of the Nicholaites, pluralities of wives; and of the Gentiles, much

Superstition; and more to cloake his diuellish inuented fantasies, somewhat he tooke from the veritie of the Gospell. Of these he compounded he deuised a Law, and wrote this his Religion in the booke called his Aleatrum; and those his Professors he named Saracenes, from Sara the wife of Abraham.

Hee died of the falling sicknesse, which long time hee had dissembled, dying forthwith after his trances, that the Angell Gabriel had conference with him, the brightnesse of whose glorie hee could not behold.

CADWALLADER. 13.

13.
An. Do. 685.

Goffrey Mon.

Cadwallader, the sonne of Cadwallo, and last King of the Britaines, after the death of his Father, succeeded him in his dominions, and with great valour fought against the Saxons, as hee of Monmouth affirmeth, of whom here he speak in his owne words. Cadwallader (saith he) raising christians the time of twelve yeeres fell lastly into a dangerous sickness, with desire of recovery, and unable to govern. Much debate and strife arose among his great Lords, and others of high estate, insomuch that they warred each against others, to the no small annoyance and detriment of the whole Country. At which very time likewise, so great a dearth of corne and victuall raigned, that herbes and roots were the Commons chiefest sustenance: whole third calamitie was mortalitie and pestilence, raising so fore, and so suddenly, that in their eating, drinking, walking, and speaking, they were surprised with death, and in such number, that the living were scarce able to bury the dead; which miseries lasted no lesse then eleven yeeres continuance, whereby the Land became desolate, and brought forth no fruit at all, insomuch that the King and many of his Nobles were driven to forsake their native Country, and to seeke reliefe in forraigne parts. Cadwallader repaired to the Court of Alan his cousin, the King of Little Britaine in France, where he was honourably received and maintained.

But now the Angell of God sheathing his sword from blugher, and the earth answering man againe with her former abundance, those Saxons that were escaped, sent for more of their Nation to their further supplie, who replenished the Cities, and manored the Countrey, at this day called Lhoyger, containing all the Land that lay oo the East of Saewone and Dre, dispossessioning the poore Britaines of their rightfull inheritance, and diuiding their Lands vnto their owne vie. Cadwallader hearing of this daily attuage, and their vniuit intrusion vpon his home-bred subjects, minded their redresse by his precise retoutne, and to that end had wrought King Alan for his succour & assistance. But see how it chanced: He being now ready to imbarke his Host, and to hoist vp his laides for Britaine, and in the silent night much spent in prayer & supplication, that God would prosper with good successe these his great affaires, behold an Angell appeared to him, or at least wile to his seeming he heard a voice, that forbade him the enterprise, declaring that it was oot Gods will that hee should vndergoe that Voiage, or that the Britaines should rule their Land any longer; but contrariwise bade he him to Rome, and of Pope Sergius receive the habit of Religion, wherein hee should die, and rest in peace.

This dreame (for I hold it no other) being told vnto Alan, search was made into the Bookes of both the Merlines, as also into the speech of the Eagle at Shifisbury, pronounced eight hundred and eighty yeeres before the birth of our Sauour Christ (if wee doe beleue these to be true) wherein it was prophesied forthwith, that the Britaines should lose their Kingdome, and that the same should be possessed of others, vntill the time that the bones of Cadwallader should be brought from Rome. By such toyes and illusions in those daies of darknesse, the euer-crying minds of men were content to be lead: for not only Cadwallader, a quiet and meeke-spirited man, was possessed with this conceit, that it came vnto him by a diuine prouidence, but also King Alan perswaded him to obey his Oracle; and thereupon preparing for his Pilgrimage, gave ouer his expedition for Britaine, and left his distressed Subjects to be ouer-runne by strangers, and the Land to be emioied by a forraigne Nation: and receiving the habit of seeming Religion at the hands of Pope Sergius, died soone after in the yeere of our Lord six hundred eighty nine, and there was buried in S. Peters Church, being the last King of the Britaines blood, after they had held possession therof the space of one thousand one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres before the Nativitie of Christ, and six hundred eighty eight yeeres after his Birth, as the Chronicle of Irlande, with other Britaine Writers, haue calculated, though (as is said) after the largest size. But howsoever this sudden alteration was wrought in Cadwallader, yet whiles he continued a King in health, hee reigned (saith Goffrey) in great magnanimitie, the terme of three yeeres, and fought many Battles against the Saxons, whose sword was cut sheathed with vi-dor, for Lathaire King of Kent he slew in the Field, and Edithwath also King of the South-Saxons, with the ruine of his Country, as the British Historians report, and would have it.

But Beda, unto whom more credit is heerein to be giuen, telleth vs, that Lathaire was slaine by Edrik, his Nephew and Successour, declaring the manner and day of his death, and that Ceadwalla, a young man of the West-Saxons blond royall, being banished from among them, fell vpon the South-Saxons, hurrying the Coantry and killing their King. But afterwards lamenting the blood he had spilt, whereat even Nature her selfe seemed to bee offended, in great repentance abandoned his Kingdome, and pilgrim-like went va-to Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Easter Euen, the yeere from Christs Natourie six hundred eightie nine. The times thus agreeing, their names to neere their denotations alike, Sergius the same ghostly father to both, their sepulchers in one and the same Church, doe strongly confirme that they both were the same and one only man, as we formerly haue said. But with this man Cadwalader, where soeuer he died, lay buried the last blood of their Kings, their go-uernment, and immediatly the very Name of Brit-taine, for many hundred yeeres ensuing, as in the sequell of this Historie (Christ assisting) shall bee shewed.

And now at last, according to my first intendment,
I am come to speake of the iaccesion of Great Bri-taine Monarches, from which (vpon the fore-shewed occasions of the Islands diuision, the Saxons possessions, and these Britaine Residues) I haue heere ouer-long staid, and am forced to returne againe to King Hengist, the first of the Saxons, that I may shew their succeeding succession in this English Monarchy: wherein of necessitie I must desire the patience of my Reader, if some things be againe touched that formerly haue beene spoken, the Matter of Historie so much requiring, and the Method that to my proceeding I haue herein proposed, enforcing it.

feited his son in law King Portigern, slaine his Britaine, and seized into his possession the best of the Island, he laid the foundation of a Monarchy, and deserueth to

(1) He (as all the Saxon Kings besides) doth claime fifth in issue from them; as thus: Himselfe was the sonne of Witigod, who was the sonne of Wittha, and he the sonne of Woden, the eldest sonne of the Deified Woden.

This Prince held the sapreme Scepter of this Island for thirty foure yeeres continuance, and therein died honorably, with Marienus Sentus. But Peter de Blois, Polidore, and others say, that he was slaine in battell, or elfe taken by Edol, Earle of Gloucester, and beheaded at Historiographer also to be Duke of the Saxons in Germany, and there left to gouerne the people at his Fathers departure for Britaine. And if Althaus authority be sufficient, he was the Father of Duke Harwegat, and grandfather of Hilderik King of the Saxons, ancestor to the valiant Witkindus, the principall progenitor of the most noble Familie of the Dukes of Saxony.

(4) Etha, the second sonne of King Hengist, came over with his Father into Britaine, and was his assistance in all his warres, wherein he gave worthy testimonie of his valour: whose Kingdome of Kent after his death be enoyed, and gave name to that Countrey Inhabitants, who were from him called Ethlings, over whom he reigned peaceably twenty yeeres.

(5) Regena, the daughter of King Hengist, was borne in Germany before her Fathers departure, and afterwards sent for by him into Britaine, to further his designs. At whose surpasing beautie and feature

Farigera so viciously gazed, that he put from him his lawfull and loving wife, to enjoy the pleasures of her Paganish bed, and to the great decay of Christianity, and griefe of the Nobilitie, she became the Kings second wife, and the principall cause of the Lands destruction. By her he had a daughter, who contrary to all lawes either of God or man, was likewise his third wife; by whom he had issue Faulsa, that as veruoually spent the daies of his life, as he was incestuously begotten in that wicked bed.

This Regena, whom some call Ranica, by Florus is accounted the Neece and not the Daughter of Hengist. But seeing his opinion is grounded vpon the youth of Hengist; as not sufficient in yeeres to haue a daughter so marriagable, I rather thinke and hold this bare testimonie vnable to turne the great stream of other Writers out of their vsuall coultie and received channel.

ELLA THE FIRST KING OF THE SOUTH-SAXONS, AND SECOND MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Ells, Monar.

CHAPTER XIV.

An. D. 581. Bede. lib. 1. c. 15.

Ells a noble Saxon, being sent for by King Hengist, about the three and twentieth yeere of his reigne, brought a fresh supply of those Germans to the reliefe of his Countymen, who with his forces landed at the haven now called Shurchein in Suffex, where putting backe the Inhabitants in many skirmishes, lastly chased them into a great wood then called Andredesforde, whence often being assailed by the sudden assaults of the Britaines, wherch, as may be thought, he lost the liues of his two elder sonnes, was so hardly beset, that he sent for more aid of his Saxons, who came to his supply.

(2) His strength thus augmented, and ambition still increased, he fought three cruell and bloody battles, but the last of them most fauill against the Britaines, in the place then called Marston, being the ancient and famous City Andred-Chester situated in the said great forest, and chiefe defensible fortresse in all those Southern parts, intercepted the Britaine that came to their reliefe, and cutting the same by an assault, put to the sword all that were found within it. After which great losse, the Britaines sought rather to provide for their owne safety by flying into desert places, then by making open resistance to procure their owne or apparant destruction.

(3) Ells in this state continued the time of five yeeres before he assumed the name of King, or the liming of that Province assigned vnder his gouernment, but then without any shew of resistance laid the foundation of this Kingdome, which was the second of the Saxons; and as Hengist held Kent so he had Suffex and Surrey for his Possession, wherein for six yeeres space with Hengist he liued, and that with such approbation of valour as that after his death he became the second Saxon Monarch of the Englishmen, in the yeere of grace 588.

(4) He is said to be the elder sonne of Osa, whose genealogie Florus of Worcester thus deriuech: Osa (saith he) was the sonne of Eberbert, and he the sonne of Ingenat, who was the sonne of Angeniat, whose father was Alaga, the sonne of Ingerand, the same of Weybrand, the sonne of Berna, the sonne of Bernar, the elder sonne of Brand, the sonne of Bealdeg, the sixth sonne of prince Woden and of Lady Fria his wife.

(5) His issue were Kymen, Fleorling, and Cissa, three valiant sonnes, that came oner with him, and assisted him in his enterprises for Britaine. From Kymen, the port wherein they arrived, was called Kymenbore; by the Britaines, Caneujsure, which time and seas hath both shortened and altered: and now is it called Shereham, a well knowne haven in Sussex. This Prince came to his grave before his Father, either by the stroke of warres, or by the course of nature, without farther mention of his acts, and his succellion, cut off by his death.

(6) Fleorling his second sonne, was borne vnto him in the Lowe countries of Germany, and with his brethren assisted his Father to the attaining of the South-Saxons Crowne; but being cut off by vniuely death, whether by the hand of the enemy, or by natures appointment, is vncertaine.

(7) The youngest sonne of king Ella, was Cissa, whom death spared to liue a long life; but faine as spiring to adorne it with memory of his acts: sue nothing of him is left memorabile, besides the building of Chichester. Fortune indeed let his fathers Crowne on his head, but kept the Imperiall Diademe in her owne hand, to adorne the head of a worthier bearer, which was Cherdik the West-Saxon, vnto whom Cissa gaue yeerely contribution, to secure him from the Britaines, as before and after hath been, and shall bee shewed.

(8) This Ella his entrance and crection of his Kingdome, for time is vncertaine; but his raigne therein, as also in his Monarchie, is more certaine knowne: for hee was King of the South-Saxons the space of thirty two yeeres, and Monarch of the English-men six and twenty, dying in the yeere of Christs Incarnation five hundred and fouretee, which was the thirty sixth after his first arrival into Britaine.

CHERDIK THE FIRST KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XV.

He Saxons Sunne, thus risen and high ascended vpon the South of Britaine, began now to spreade his beams towards the West, for Kent being quietly possessed by King Ethe, and South-Saxia, with all the subdued, at the dispose of great Ella, Cherdik a valiant Captaine of the Low Country German, thoughte him selfe as sufficient in warres, and as able to reach at, to weare, and to weld a Crowne of Estate, as either of them that had so done before him: and seeing that Britaine was now the feede-plot for Diadems, let his affection and preparation that way.

(2) He with his forces entred in the West of that Island, where he in his first battell so daunted the Inhabitants, that apparit signes of approaching glory were added to his aspiring hopes: for therein hee slew Natansted, otherwile called Nataland, a mighty King of the Britaines, whereby an easie entrance was laid open to his desired Empire, and a more easie warre left to his posteritie. This battell chanced about the yeere of Christ Iesus five hundred and eight, and was fought in the region of Natansted, (which Country bare the name of the King) and neere vnto a brooke of water in the West of Hampshire, which from Cherdik began to be called Cherdik-ford, where now a Towne of the same name standeth, but by contraction and shortnesse of speech is called Cherford.

(3) Fleorling of Worcester, the Saxons Centalogist (as I may well terme him) bringeth this Cherdik (as he doth the rest of the Saxon Kings) from the ancient Prince Woden, and that in this manner: Cherdik (first, he) was the sonne of Elyfing, and hee the sonne of Ella, the sonne of Gorsius, the sonne of Wigga, the sonne of Friarix, the sonne of Friedegar, the brother of Berna, the progenitor of Ida the first King of Bernicia, and both both of them the sonnes of Brand, the sonne of Bealdeg, the fift sonne of the foresaid Woden.

(4) In the seventh yeere of Ella his Monarchie, was his marriage, and six yeeres after hee beganne his Kingdome of the West-Saxons, leaving himselfe and foundation thereof betwixt the Britains and the South-Saxons, for whole further securitie, Cissa King of that Province, gave him an yeerly contribution towards the maintenance of his charge in warr, wherein hee got such reputation, that after the death of Ella, and the thirteenth of his owne raigne, hee assumed the Monarchie unto himselfe, and was both the first King of the West-Saxons, and the third Monarch of the Englismen, wherein he continued the space of twentie one yeeres, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord five hundred thirty five, being the three and thurteeth of his Kingdome, and the fortieth after his first arrivall.

(5) His issue were two sonnes, Kenrik and Chetwasse: the one immediately, and the issue of the other collaterally attained to the same possession and title that Chetwasse heere first had.

(6) Chetwasse his second sonnes for of Kenrik the eldest wee are hereafter to speake) hath little mention made among our writers: more then that hee was the Ancestour of Etkin the eight King of the West-Saxons, that is to say, the father to Kenfrid the father of Kenfr, which Kenfr had issue the said Etkin, who was the Successor of king Kenwall, and predecessor of King Kenwin in the kingdome of the West-Saxons.

Kenrik.

CHAPTER XVI.

1. An. D. 534.

342. 577. 581.

Kenrik, the eldest sonne of King Chetwasse (as is said) being borne in Germany, and following his father into Britaine, valiantly served vnder him, as well in the Battle fought against King Nathaneld, the first day of his marriage, as in other battles against the Britains in other places, namely, at Cherid-sard, Cheridley, and in the Conquest of the Isle of Wight. Immediately vpon the death of his Father, he succeeded in his whole dominions, and was ordained the second King of the West-Saxons, and the fourth Monarch of the Englismen, beginning his raigne ouer both at one and the same time, the yeere of Christ his Natinitie five hundred thirty foure.

(2) And enlarging his confines vpon the Territories of the Britains, gave them two great overthrowes, the one at Sturbery in Wilt-shire, and the other at Banbury in Oxford-shire, which was fought the two and twentieth of his raigne, whereby his fame grew more renowned, and his Kingdome in more quiet after. He raigned the space of twenty six yeeres, and left this life in the yeere of our Lord God five hundred lxxxij.

(3) He had issue three sonnes, Chetwine, Cuthwasse, and Cuth. Chetwine the first, succeeded his father in the Monarchie, and West-Saxons Kingdome.

(4) Cuthwasse, the second, assisted his brother in many victories, as presently in his raigne shall follow. And Cuth, the third brother, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe, whereof more largely hath beene spoken in the raigne of Kenrik, as he was King only of the West-Saxons.

CHEVLIN THE THIRD KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND FIFTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XVII.

Aa. D. 561.

Chevaline, the eldest sonne of King Kewin, served with great commendations vnder his father, in all his warres against the Britains, and is specially mentioned at the Battle of Sanbury in Oxfordshire, and after his fathers death became the third King of the West-Saxons, and the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen. Hee much enlarged the bounds of his Kingdom, and increased the power and glorie of the West-Saxons.

(3) For continuing the warres where his Father left, did not onely subdue the Britains in many Battles, but also set himselfe against his owne Nation the Saxons, and sought to impose the scope of his power vpon the South of the River Thames: for entering Kent (whole King was then a childe, by name Etzelbert, the sonne of Imersl) at Wiphanston or Wiltanston in Surrey, in a set and free Battle, defeated all his forces, whence the young King was chased, and two of his greatest Captaines, bearing the names of Dukes, were slaine, as we haue said.

(1) Not long after this victory, he set his minde to enlarge his West-Saxons Dominions vpon the possession of the declining Britains, and to that end furnished forth a great Band of his Souldiers, whereof he made his brother Cuthwin chiefe Generall. These marching to Redford, gaue Battle to the Britains, where they slew them downe right, and surprized foure of their chiefe Townes, as that time called Lymbsurge, Eglsburgh, Bromington, and Engleson, which they fortified, to their owne strength, and the Britains great losse.

(4) And following the Tract of his fore-going fortunes, about six yeeres after sent forth againe his Saxons, vnder the conduct of the foresaid Cuthwin, who encountered the Britains at Dieth or Deorham, with such valour and success, that besides great slaughter of the British Souldiers, three of their Kings, whose names were, Cormagill, Candidas, and Fermungill, fell in the Field, with the surprisall of their three Cities, Gloucester, Bath, and Cirencester. Then (saith Gylfar) suddenly appeared the Lands destruction, the first of the Britains: being the only cause, when neither Prince nor People, Priest nor Leuite, regarded the Law of the Lord, but disobediently wandered in their owne wayes.

(5) But no greater were the sinnes of the Britains, then the vnstable desires of the Saxons were to conquer: for Chevaline about the last of Malgo his gouernment, met the Britains at Fethanleah, in the face of a Field, which was fought out, to the great slaughters of them both, and with the death of Prince Cuth, King Chevaline sonne: notwithstanding the victorie fell on his side with great spoiles obtained, and possessions of many Provinces, which himselfe no long time enioied.

(6) For growne proud through his many prosperous victories against his enemies, and tyrannizing ouer his owne Subjects, the West-Saxons fell into such contempt, that they ioined with the Britains for his destruction. The greatest against him, was Didogall Chell, or Cearit, his nephew, the sonne of Cuthwin his most loyal brother, whom both the Narons had elected for Generall. Vnder him they mustler and march into Wiltshire and at Wadnesbeote (now Wannes-ditch) pitch downe their Standards. Chevaline that thought hee had fortune in a leake, with confident boldnesse built his present proceedings vpon his former success, and in the face of his enemies displayed his colours. But the Britains ioined, and the Field goared with blood, the day was lost vpon the Kings side, and he in distresse saved himselfe by flight. Heere might you haue seene the world, as it is, vnconstant and variable; for he a Mar, that had ouer-borne the Britains in so many Battles, and had raised his Saxons vnto so great a height, is forced to flee before his conquered Captaines, and to exile himselfe from the sight of his owne Subjects, after he had gloriously raigned thirty one yeeres, or (as some wily) thirty three, and as a meane man, died in his banishment, the yeere of grace five hundred ninety two.

(7) He had issue two sonnes, which were Cuth and Cuthwin, the elder whereof had valiantly served in his fathers warres, namely at Wimboldene in Surrey, against King Ethelbert and his power of Kent, in the yeere of Christ five hundred sixty seven, and lastly in the Battle at Fethanleah, where the Britaines received a great overthrow. Notwithstanding, as hee was valiantly fighting among the thickest of his enemies, hee was there slain, in the yeere of our Lord five hundred eighty foure, being the five and twentieth yeere of his fathers reigne, and that without issue.

(8) Cuthwin, the younger sonne of King Chesline, succeeded his father, but succeeded him not, because of his young yeeres; or else (and that rather) for the hatred that his father had purchased of his Subjects, which they repaid him in his owne expulsion, and in this his sonnes deprivation. But although the wreath of the West-Saxons did not adorne this Cuthwin's head, yett those it more bright, and shod with greater majesty upon the browes of Ina, the warlike and zealous King of West-Saxons; and of Egbert the victorious and first sole absolute Monarch of the English Empire: both of them in a right line issued from this Cuthwin, as in the sixteenth Chapter we have said.

ETHELBERT THE FIFTH, AND FIRST CHRISTIAN KING OF KENT, AND THE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

An. Do. 561.

174. 2nd ed.

He flame of the West-Saxons for a time thus quenched, the Lampe of Kent began againe to shine, and to assume the Title of the Monarchie, after it had bene suppressed in them through the reignes of these foure last Kings: for young Egbert's entrance, with the great losse of his Kentish, overthrowne by King Chesline, gave rather inducements to a tributary subjection, then any apparant hopes to purchase an Empire.

(1) But such is the dispose of God in his hidden Counsell, that things of least appearance many times become the greatest in substance, as in this Prince it was evidently seene, who making use of his owne youth and losse, got thereby experience, both to defende himselfe, and to prosseke others, and with such victories abroad, repaired his losses at home, that as fast as Assailers he made all subiect to Kent.

(2) Thus grown to be the greatest of any Saxon before him, hee sought to hold it up by fortune alliance, and to that end became suter for Berta a most vertuous Christian Lady, the daughter of Chelperth

King of Francia, unto whom by her father she was lastly granted, but with these conditions, that she might receive her Christian Professors privy the presence and the instructions of Luthard her learned Bishop, with the place of his Queene.

(4) These conditions concluded, and many French Christians attending her in his Court, by their daily service of God, and continuall practise of pietie, drew many of the English to favour their Religion, yea and the King also to bee inclined that way. And as these were working the salvation of Kent, behold Gods proceedings for the conversion of the rest.

(1) It chanced great Gregory (then but Arch-deacon of Rome) to see certaine youths of this land brought to that Cite, to be sold for slaves: His Christian heart pitying at such heathenish tyrannizing, and beholding stedfastly their faces to be faire and Angel-like, demanded of their Merchants, of what Nation they came; who made him answer, that they were Angles, and by that name were knowne unto other Nations. Indeed, said he, and nor without cause, for their resemblance is Angelicall, and fit it is that they be made inheritors with the Angels in Heauen. But of what Province are they? said Gregory. It was replied Of Deira, a Countie situated in the Continent of Britaine. Now surely, said he, it is great pity but these people people should be taken from Deira, the ire of God. And further asking what was the name of their King, it was answered, that he was called Ella; whereunto he allying, said, that Alewa, to the praise of God, in thine Princes Dominions should shortly be using.

(6) And to that purpose himselfe, being afterwards Pope, sent Austine a Monk, with forty others, for assistance, whereof Aditus, Julian, and Iohn were chiefe. These landing in Tanet, in the moneth of Iuly, about five hundred nunny and fix yeeres after the Incarnation of Christ, and one hundred forty and seven after the first arrival of these Angles into Britaine, had immediately access to the presence of King Ethelbert, but yet in the open field, for hee feared to conferre with them in any house, lest by force (as hee fondly furnished) he might be overcome.

(7) These preaching unto him the word of life, his answer was, that presently he could not consent to their Doctrine, neither rashly forsake his ancient and accustomed Religion. But seeing (said hee) you tell vs strange things, and give vs faire promises of after life, when this life shall be ended, wee permit you to preach the same to our people, and to convert as many as you can; and we our selves will minister all things behoovefull for your livelihood. Which promise he instantly performed, and in Canterbury his head City, allowed them fit places for residence, and sufficient provision for their maintenance; wherein these religious men, following in some measure the examples of the Apostles, spent their times in preaching and prayers, watching for the peoples conversions, and exercising the works of true piety, as examples and motives unto others, to embrace the Gospel which they taught to plant.

(8) Nexte unto the East part of the City stood an ancient Church, built by the Christian Romans, whither they had dwelt in Britaine, and by them dedicated to the honour of S. Martin, and is so yet called. To this Church the Christian Queene Berta, with her Communicants the French, daily referred to pray, and vnto these, and in this Church, Austine and his fellows began daily to preach: vnto whose Sermons so many of the Kentish also referred, that a plentiful harvest in short time appeared, vpon the fertile plot of their tillage; for it is reported that ten thousand of the English people were baptized there in one day, inasmuch that the King himselfe forsooke his Heathenish Idolatrie, and likewise received the Sacrament of Baptisme, vnto his salvation in Christ: in which whereof, hee gave the Lordship and Royaltie of his chiefe City Canterbury, vnto Austine, and resigned his princely Palace therein vnto him, who in the East of this City laid the foundation of that great, and afterwards magnificent Church, dedicated to the service and name of Christ, which at this day is the Cathedral of that Metropolitan See: and Ethelbert to give him more roomes, withdrew himselfe vnto Reichen in Tanet, where hee erected a Palace for himselfe and his successors, the compasse whereof may be traced by the old wal, whose ruines remaine there yet to this day.

(9) Austine thus situated, and in the well deserved fauour of King Ethelbert, got one request more, which was this, that whereas by the Law of the Turlic Tables, it was forbidden to bury the dead within the wailes of any City, (the practise whereof, wee daily finde by monuments taken vp in the fields adjoining) it would please him to giue to that use, an old Idol-Temple standing without the East Wall of the City, wherein the King himselfe had woefully worshipped his Idols. This obtained, and the Church purged fro that prophane exercise, to the service of God, being honored with the name of S. Pancras, King Ethelbert added thereunto a most faire Monastery, built vpon his owne cost, and dedicated it vnto the name of Peter and Paul the Apostles, appointing it to be the place for the Kentish Kings Sepulchres, and Austine likewise meant it for the burials of his successors in that See. But first it became the Monument of his own name; for in regard of the Procurer, both Pan- cras, Peter, and Paul were soon swallowed vp, and the whole called onely by the name of S. Austine. In this place, eight Kings of Kent had their bodies interred, and tenne of their Arch-bishops therein laid, untill that Cuthbert the eleventh in succession, in fauour of S. Iohn, a new Church by him erected, procured of King Egbert the founne of Breambury, that succeeding Arch-bishop might be buried there. This Monastery, as all the rest did, came to her fallall period in the daies of King Henry the Eighth, whose vncouered walles stood so long languishing in time and stormes of weather, that daily increased the aspect of her ruines, till now lastly they are made inobscure to other publike vices, and the whole tract of that most goodly foundation in the same place no where appearing, Onely Ethelberts Tower, in memorie and honour of the man, as yet hath escaped the verdict and sentence of destruction; whose beauty, though much defaced and overorne, will witness to succeeding ages the magnificence of the whole, when all flood compleat in their glory together.

(10) These his happie beginnings, Austine signified by Letters to Rome, and withall demanded directions, how he might further proceed: which questions, were they not written by the Venerable Beda, wee could hardly beleaze that such idle conceits should haue place in the munde of a man so well and fruitfully buied: as, *Whether a woman which chold might receive the Sacrament of Baptisme, or in her monthly dis-ease, the holy Communion, or enter the Church: how long after her deliuerance, the husband ought to refraine her Bed: How the Ghosts that were offered on the Altar, ought to be distributed: and vnto what degree of consanguinity Christians might marry: and many others such like, as though himselfe had neuer read either Moses or Paul. But of the thing then more needfull, for that at that time it stirred most contention, it seemeth he was sufficiently instructed; neither among his other questions is it once named: and that was, the due time for the celebration of Easter: the difference whereof, betwixt the Britaines and the Romans was such, that it caused Lord-like Austine to prophesie (if not to seele) their destruction, and they in their opinions, to hold him no better then the Man of Sinne: for thus the storie is reported.*

(11) Austine, by the assistance and authoritie of King Ethelbert, called an Assemblies of the British Bishops and Deacons, that had retained the doctrine of the Gospel amongst them, euen from the first plantation thereof by the Apostles themselves, to be holden in the Borders of the Pictish and Welsh Saxons, and at the place vpon that occasion called Anglesiers Oake: thither referred seven British Bishops, and many other well learned men (with Beda) out of their greatest Monasterie at Ranger, where at that time Diocet was Abbot. These men were ready to go to the first said Synod, came first to a certaine holy and wise man, which lived thereabouts an Anchorite life, to aske his counsell, whether they ought at Austine preaching and exhortation, leave their Traditions or no: The Anchorite replied, *If he be a man of God, follow him. But how shall we prove (said they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchorite answered, Our Lord saith, Take ye on youm Yoke, and leaue ye of mee, for I am milde and humble of heart. If therefore thus Austine bee milde and humble of heart, it is like that humbly heareth the Yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare. But if hee bee stout and proud, it is certaine that hee is not of God, neither must we much esteeme his words. Then they enquired, how they might know whether this Austine were proud or no: Proud (quoth he) that hee and his company may come first to the place of the Synod or Councell-house: and if it bee so that when you approach neere him, he arise courteously, and salute you, then think him to bee the servant of Christ, and so beare him, and obey him: but if when you approach, hee despise you, and will not condescend to rise at your presence, which are the greater number, let him likewise be despised of you. And truly (saith hee) as this Anchorite bade them, so did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, S. Austine was already set in his chaire, and stirred not:*

which when they saw forthwith amazing wrath, they noted sum of pride, and therefore endeavored to overthrow and enjoy whatsoever he proposed. And so the Synod brake up without any thing done.

Thus then we see, that the subtilance of doctrine was embraced in Britain, before the landing of Augustin from Rome: only in ceremonies they differed, as the most of Christian Churches, without derogation to the Gospell, at this day doe. And this for the celebration of Easter, a matter of so great moment (if we consider our Christian libertie, and the Apostles care, that the oblations of daies, moneths, times, and yeeres, turne the hearts after betterly radomous, bring again into bondage, and make his labours for Christ in vaine) yet for the different obseruation of this Feast from the Romans, how oft are the Britanes remarked by Bede, a wicked people, a cursed nation, and well deserving those calamities which the Lord did afflict vpon them? This controuerse five Easter celebration, thus begun, continued no lesse then ninety yeeres after, and was lastly concluded in manner as followeth.

(12) This variance (saith Bede) made not onely
the people to doubt and feare, left bearing the name of Christians, they did and had runne in vaine, as the Apostles speaketh, but also good Ofsy King of Northumberland and learned Prince Adelfrid, with Queene Eanfled, were much distracted and perplexed: for by this variance (saith hee) it often times hapned, that in one yeere two Easters were kept, for the King breaking vp his Fast, and solemnizing of the Feast, the Queene with Prince Adelfrid, continued their Fast, and kept that day their Palme-Sunday. To conclude which contrariety, a Synod purposely was called, and the Question disposed by their best Diuines. The place was Stranbalech or Whithy, whereof it was Abbacie.
The chiefe parties for, and against the accustomed time of keeping that feast, were King Ofsy and Prince Adelfrid in issue. The Disputers for Ofsy and the established orders, were Colman Arch-bishop of Turke, with his Secular Clergy, and Alde the vertuous and learned Lady Abbess of the place. For Adelfrid and the attempted alteration, were Agilbert Bishop of the West-Saxons, Wilfrid Abbot of Rippon, with Iomer and Romanus, two learned men, and the reuerend Ceolde newly consecrated Bishop, appointed Prolocutor of the Assembly.

The Communication set, King Ofsy made a solemne Oration, wherein hee begged a necessitie, that those people which feared one God, ought to celebrate his heauenly Sacraments alike, and should keepe one order and rule in the same: the truth of which phrase, and force of that long vniuersal variance, for the Christian celebration and time of Easter, was then presently by those learned men to be handled, and by best approuements to be determined; whereunto hee requested their vermost endeuours, and to that purpose commanded his Arch-bishop Colman first to speake: whereupon Colman with reuerence stood vp and said: I the Easter which I obserue, I receiued of my Fore-fathers, of whom I was consecrated, and first father for your Bishop. They all (you know) were goodly men, and obserued the Feast as we doe now: neither thinke you they kept this tradition without fore to errant from greater then themselves, which as Saint Iohn the Euangelist, and the Disciple whom I use especially laud, who in the Churches hee himselfe presided, celebrated the Feast of Easter, as we doe now. Therefore knowing the man so worthy, and the manner so ancient, I hope you will all con-fesse, it is not faine for vs now to receiue.

Wilfrid the declaimer, appointed to answer, stood vp and said: I the Easter which we obserue, were our felices have seene obserued in Rome, where the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul dwelt, preached, suffered, and are buried:
and in our travels thence France and Italie, either for stu-die or vpon pilgrimage, we have seene the same order kept:
and we know by relation, that in Africke, Asia, Egypt and Greece, nay throughout all nations and tongues in the world where Christ hath his Church, that this our time and order is obserued. Shall then these obstinate Priests (I meane the Britanes) and these remote Islands in the Ocean Sea, and yet not all of them neither fondly contend in this point against the whole world?

But here Colman interrupted him, and said, I must marvell, brother, that you come out deaging a faine contention, seeing we haue for our warrant so worthy an Apostle as Iohn was, who only leamed vpon our Lord his life, and whose life and behaviour all the world acknowledge to bee most wise and discreete.

And forbid (saith Wilfrid) that I should accuse Iohn: but yet we know that he kept the decrees of Moses liberally, and according to the Jewish Lawes; and so the rest of the Apostles were constrained in some things to doe, for the weaknes of them who accounted it a great sin to abrogate the rites that God himselfe had instituted; and for that cause S. Paul did circumcise Timothy, offered bloud-sacrifices in the Temple, shamed his head at Corinth with Aquila and Priscilla: vpon which consideration also Peter 1 times wrote
Paul, You see brother how many thousands of the Iewes haue received the faith, and all of these are yet zealous followers of the Law. But the light of the Gospell were shining there in the world, it is not lawfull for any Christian to be circumcised, or to offer up bloudy sacrifices of Beasts. Saint Iohn therefore, according to the custom of the Law, in the fourteenth day of the first month, at such time as the celebration of Easters Festiuitie, regardlesse whether it fell vpon the Sabbath day, or any other of the weekes. But S. Peter preaching the Gospell in Rome, remembering that our Lord arose from his grave the first day after the Sabbath, gaue thereby vnto vs certain assurance of our resurrection, obserued the Feast of Easter according to the Commandement of that Law he looked for, as S. Iohn did, that is to say, the first Sabbath after the full Moone of the first month. Neither doubt this new obseruation of the Gospell, and Apostles practise, breake the old Law, but rather fulfilleth it: for the Law commandeth the Feast of Passouer to be kept from the fourth day of that month, to the twentieth and one of the same. And thus hath the Nicene Council not newly confirmed, but rather confirmed (as the Ecclesiasticall Historic write) that this is the true obseruation of Easter, and of all Christians after this account it to be celebrated:
and thereupon charged Bishop Colman, that hee neither obserued it according to Iohn nor Peter.

To this the Bishop replied, that Anatholius for his holines much commended by the said Ecclesiasticall History, and Columba a Father of the said Councill, by whom miracles were wrought, kept the Feast according as he then did,
from whose imitation he durst not digresse.

Your Fathers, which you pretend to follow, how holy seer they be (saith Wilfrid) and what miracles seer they haue wrought, yet this I answer, that in the day of iudgment many shall say vnto Christ, that they haue prophesied, cast out Devils, and wrought miracles in his name, to whom our Lord will answer, I know you not. And if your Father Columba (you and our Father, if hee be the true Ieremias of Christ) were holy and mightie in miracles, get can use by means hee preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, vnto whom our Lord said, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it, and to thee will I geue the keyes of the Kingdom of Heauen. Thus said, the King asked Colman, whether our Lord indeede saide thus vnto Peter, who answered, He did. But can you (saith hee) geue endurance of so speciall authority granted to your Father Columba? The Bishop said, No. Then (quoth the King) doubt you both agree confidently, that these words were principally spoken vnto Peter, and that vnto him the keyes of the Kingdom of Heauen were giuen? They all answered, It is most certaine. Whereupon the King concluded this great controuerse, and said, Then will not I giue my such a Porter as this is, but as farre as I haue, and can able, I will conent in all points to they he or distance, left perhaps when I come to the Doores of Heauen, I finde none to open vnto me, having his displeasure, which is so cleerely promised to beere the keyes thereof.

And with this so simple a collection of King Ofsy, concluded this long and great contention for the cele-

time, I have inserted, to continue the narration thereof together, & to avoid repetition of the same things, which I seeke purposely to shunne; and so retaine againe to King Ethelbert.

(13) Who now became an instrument himselfe for the conversions of his Nation the Saxons. The first frutes of his intendment were wrought vpon Seler King of the East-Angles, his owne sisters sonne, whom not onely hee converted to Christianitie, but therein assisted him in the building of the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul for Mileus his Bishop; as also the Church of S. Peters on the West of London, then called Thorpe, with the assistance of a London Citizen, as some haue said, and himselfe at Rachelter, built the Cathedral Church there, which he dedicated to the Apoll S. Andrew.

(14) This noble King hating a care for them that should come after, brought the Lawes of his Country into their owne mother tongue, and left nothing vnattempted, that might aduance the glorious Gospell of Christ, or with honour adorne his owne temporal raigne; and is worthily an example to all succeeding Princes, in all true piety, and heroicall parts of a true Christian King. He died the foure and twentieth day of Februarie, in the yeere of our Lord God six hundred and sixtene, being the one and twentieth of his Christianitie, the three and twentieth of his Monarchie, and the fifty sixth of his Kingdome of Kent, and was buried at Canterbury in the Church of S. Peter and Paul, afterwards called S. Augustines, in the Chapell of S. Martin.

(15) His first wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperic King of France, as we haue said, who was the son of King Clotaire, the sonne of Clodove, the first Christian King of that Country. Shee decaied before the King her husband, and was buried in the Church of S. Peter & Paul and Canterbury, within the Chapell of S. Martin there.

(16) He had a second wife, whose name is not recorded by any Writer, being, as is thought, vnworthy of remembrance, because of the vnnatural contract and marriage of Edwald her husbands sonne; a sinne that both Law and Religion doe condemne: and lastly by her conuerted husband was forsaken, without either note of her illue or death.

(17) The illue of King Ethelbert by Queene Berta were Edwald that succeeded him in the Kentish Kingdome, Ethelburg, and Edburg two daughters.

(18) Ethelburg, the elder, was a Lady of passing beauty and piety, and surnamed Tae, who greatly desired and intended a Virgins life, had not her mind bene auerted by the intreaty of her brother, the persuasions of Bishop Paulinus, and the earnest suit of Edwine King of Northumberland; vnto which Edwine lastly she yielded to bee his wife, in hope of his conuersion, and vnto whom for that purpose Pope Basil directed his Epistle from Rome, earnestly exhorting her that shee should bee diligent for the Kings saluation: which shee soone after effected, to the great ioy of both the Kings, and to the comfort and increase of the Christian Faith thorowout England.

(19) Edburg, another daughter of King Ethelbert, is warranted only by the testimonie of Iohn Capgrave, a great traueler in Antiquities, and should bee most skilful in his own Country of Kent: notwithstanding he is to be suspected in this, that hee reporteth her to haue bene a Nunne in the Monasterie of Misther in the Ile of Thancet, vnder the Foundresse Dunecue, being the daughter of her nephew Ermeard, and that shee succeeded in the government of that house, Attended the daughter of the same Dunecue. Hee reporteth also, that shee died and was buried in the same place, and that her body was from thence remoued by the Arch-bishop *Lauf*frank, to his Church of S. Gregorie in Canterbury.

REDVVALD THE THIRD KING OF THE EAST-ANGLES, AND SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XIX.

An. D. 616.

Edwald, the sonne of Titul, and the third King of the East-Angles, had been a substitute vnder Ethelbert King of Kent, and serued a long time as his Vice-roy ouer all his dominions, whereby hee gained such reputation to himselfe, that either for his owne valour, or Edwalds vices, (contemned of the people for his Apostasie, fence, and incestuous bed) became the seventh Monarch of the Englishmen, about the yeere of Christ his Incarnation six hundred and sixtene; and the twentieth and fourth of his raigne ouer the East-Angles.

(2) This Redwald (such Rede) had receined Baptisme in Kent, but in vaine, and without zeale, as it afterwards appeared. For returning to his Country, through the perswasion of his wife, returned againe to his superstitious worships, and in one and the same Temple, after the manner of the old Samaritans, hee erected an Altar for the service of Christ, and another little Altar for burnt sacrifices to his Idols, which stood vnto the daies of Beda himselfe. But as he was an instigator to the East-Saxons idolatry, so was hee an instrument to the further spreading of Christianity (though not by heretofore purpoise) means) inasing the life of Edwine, who afterwards planted the Gospell in all the North parts of the Saxons government.

(3) For Edwine flying the rage of wilde Ethelfrid, was succoured and maintained in the Court of King Redwald, vnto whom lastly, the Northumbrian sent both threats and rewards to haue him deliuered, or else put to death: and surely had not the Queene stood for his life, he had presely died. But the alleging the law of humanitie, the trust of a friend, and the royaltie of a Prince, prevailed so farre, that Redwald did not onely save his life, but assisted him in battell, to the destruction of his enemy, and the gaining of Northumberland Crowne. For vpon the returne of Ethelfrids Ambassadors, vnto whom Redwald had yielded to make Edwine away, he with his power of the East-Angles were at their backs, and as an enemy made towards Northumberland.

Redwald, to the great griefe of him and his whole host: whole reuenge was so violently sought, that they slew King Ethelfrid in the field, and established Edwine to be his successor; which was the second yeere of Redwalds Monarchy.

Redwald his reigne.

(5) Wherein he reigned the space of eight yeeres, and was King of the East-Angles thirty one, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord six hundred twentie foure, the eighth of Edwalds King of Kent, the thirteenth of Kings King of the West-Saxons, and the eighth of Edwine ouer the Northumbrians.

(6) The Queene and wife of this King is not named by any of our Writers, but that she had been the widow of a Nobleman, descended of the blood-royall of that Nation, and was a Lady that had deserved great commendations for the many vertues by her possessed, had she been a Christian, or a fauoror of the Christians, or had not been an viter enemy to their faith. Notwithstanding by her first husband she had a sonne named Sigebert, that proved a learned and most religious Prince, of whom we haue spoken in Chapter eleuenth.

(7) His issue were Reynhere and Erpwald. Reynhere the elder and Prince of the East-Angles, was slaine as you haue heard, in the battell that his father fought against wilde Ethelfrid, neere vnto the Riuer Idle in Nottingham-shire.

(8) Erpwald the younger succeeded his father Redwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and was the fourth King of that Nation, whose life and reigne we haue declared in the succession of the East-Angles Kings: Chapter 11.

EDWINE THE GREAT KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE EIGHTH SOLE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XX.

An. Do. 617.

He Monarch reuerted from the East-Angles, was next possessed by the Northumbrians, wherein it was held with greater glorie and for longer time. For Edwine in King Redwalds life growne very potent, after his death became his successor in the English Monarch, and most worthily did adorne the same by his ciuill iustice and diuine pietie: his exile, visions, and obtaining of the Northumbrian Crowne, we haue already spoken of, and therefore without repetition will passe on to his end.

(1) This Edwine, the sonne of great Ells, the first King of the Deirians, was the third King that possessed the same, the eighth of Bernicia, the second (and first Christian) King of all Northumberland, at the age of twenty three, and in the yeere of Christ six hundred twenty foure, succeeded Redwald in the Monarchy, and was the greatest King of all the Saxons. Bishop Paulinus.

(as Beda saith) hee subdued all the coasts of Britannie whereof ever any Provinces were inhabited, either of English or of Saxons, which thing no King of the English before him had done: and added the Mercian Isles vnto his owne Dominions. The first of them, and next the South, was large and fertile, gave room for nine hundred and sixty of his English Families, and the second, ground for about three hundred Tene-ments.

(3) His first wife dead, he became suitor for Lady Ethelburg, daughter to Ethelbert King of Kent, deceased, and sister to King Eadbold then reigning: whole Ambassadors were answered, that it was not lawfull for a Christian Virgin to be espoused to a Pagan, lest the faith and sacraments of the heavenly King should bee prophaned, by the matching with that earthly King, which knew not to worship God aright. But Edwine hearing of the Virgin's beauty, integrity, and piety, was so farre overcome and ransified therewith, that hee confederated, she should wih her place retain her owne Christian Professions, and enjoy the Chri-istian Societie both of her men, woman, Priests, and servants, to bee her attendants in his Court. These covenants thus confirmed, the Lady accompanied with Paulinus the reuerend Bishop, and an honour-able retinue, all of them Christian, came to King Edwine's Court, and with great ioy there was espoused his Queene.

(5) It happened the same night being holy Easter Sunday, that Queene Ethelburg was brought to bed of a daughter: for ioy whereof, and her life deliuerance, the King gaue thanks to his Idols; which Bishop Paulinus, then in presence, greatly reprimed, and bade Edwine to giue thanks vnto God, from whom only all goodnesse came; and spake vnto him of our new birth in Christ: at which conference the King much reioiced, and promised that hee would euer after renounce all his Idols, and worship that Christ whom he preached, if that God would grant him his life, and giue him victorie against that King, who had sent this Manqueiller to murder him; in pidge whereof, he assigned Paulinus to baptise his daughter, the which vpon Whitsunday following was performed in her, by the name of Engled, and shee the first of the Northumbrians which received that Sacrament. At which time also, Edwine being recovered of his wound so lately received, made an Armie, and marched forth against the West-Saxons, and in battle either slew or tooke prisoners all them that had conspired his death, and as a victorious Conquerour, returned to his Contry.

(6) Where continuing in honour, and his affaires prospering to his owne desires, hee was yet in misde distracted, and his thoughts continually perplexed, what God he should worship. The sanctitie of the Christians moued him much, and the ancient customes of his Ancestours staid neere his heart, betwixt whom there seemed a combat in himselfe. And in these dumps sitting one day alone, it chanced Bishop Paulinus to haue access to his presence, where laying his right hand vpon the Kings head, demanded of him whether hee remembered that signe: whereat Edwine suddenly fell as the Bishops feet, whom hee in haste and reuerence presently lifted vp, and spake vnto him as followeth.

Behold O Soueraigne (saide he) by the bountifull hand and power of our God, you haue escaped the hand and vengeance of your most hard and deadly enemies. Behold also, by his most gracious goodness you haue obtained the four argu-ments of raigne and rule of the Kingdome. Remember now therefore the third thing which you promised him, and desire no longer to accomplish the same by receiving his faith and keeping his Commandments; who hath deliuered you from your temporal aduersities, and exalted you to the honour and Maiesty of a King; whose holy will if you hereafter obey, and doe his precepts which by mee is preached, hee will also deliuer you from the perpetuall torments of Hell, and make you partaker with him in his beauey Kingdome and eternall blisse without end.

(7) Whereupon conferring with his Counsell, whereof Bishop Cyff was chiefe, for the establishing of the Gospell, and suppressing of Idolatrie, it was then concluded, that the true God should be wor-shipped, and the Altars of their wonted Idols over-throwne: vnto which action, Cyff himselfe became the first man; for mounted on horiebacke in armour, with a girt sword and lance in his hand (all which was vnlawfull for those Idols Priests) he brake downe their Altars, Grates, and Barres, and destroyed their Temples whereof euer he came. Some ruines there-of not farre from York, and neere vnto the rising of the river Derwent, remained to be seen vnto the daies of Beda, and were then called Gutmond in Gabum. And King Edwine himselfe, with all his Nobilitie, and most of the Commones, received the laver of Baptisme, the eleventh yeere of his raigne, and of Christs Incarna-tion six hundred twenty and seuen, one hundred and eighty yeeres after the Saxons entrance into Britanie. The king was baptised the twelfth of April, being Easter Sunday, at the Citie York, in the Church of S. Peters, built then of wood, and was the Kings Ora-torie, which he enclosed about with a deepe founda-tion, and laying the walles with squared stones, made it the Cathedrall Church, and his Conuerter Paulinus Arch-bishop of that See.

(8) The Gospell thus established in these Nor-therne parts, spread daily further into other Provin-ces, and with such fruit of peace, that in the raigne of this Edwine, and thoroughout his Dominions, a weak woman with her new-borne babe might haue passed without damage or danger ouer all the lland, euen from Sea to Sea. And so much did the King tender his Subjects, that his provident care was extended to the way-faring passengers, for whose vie he enclosed cleere Springs by the waies, where he set great Basins of brasse, both to wash and to bathe in; which either for loue or displeasure of the king, no man defaced, or tooke away.

And so great was the magnificence of this Monarch, that (according to Beda) he had not only in Battle the Ensignes proper to battell borne before him, but in his ordinarie passages thorow the Cities and Towns of his kingdome, there alwaies went an Ensigne-bearer before him. And (to vie the words of the same venerable Author) he went not in any three, in which there was not borne before him that kinde of Stan-dard which the Romans called Tufa, and the English Tunef. That the Romans had such an Ensigne, as that which here is called Tufa, Tuffus Lippus in his Com-mentarie vpon that place in Peregrinus (lib. 3. cap. 5.) where the severall Ensignes of the Romans are recited, doth declare, correcting that place of Peregrinus (where Rufa was set for Tufa) by this place of Beda, and in the same shewing, that Tufa signified a Ball, as the Ball (by the example of Augustus) was an Ensigne of Monar-chie, or absolute government.

and descent, and euer is mouing in the circle of his celestiall orbe: so man hath his birth time, being, and death, and all then is neuer staied in one certaine point. Kings therefore, as they be Kings, are the Suns of their owne world, but as they are men, goe to the shadow of death: neither can the strength of their power, wildome, or policie, lone or applaue, stay the hand here that holds the fatall knife: for so in this King Edwine we see, raised aboue hope to attaine the Deademe, and railing in loue and liking of the people, was notwithstanding cutt off in the midst of his glorie and greatnesse of strength.

(10) For Penda the stout Mercian enuying his peace, and Cadwalla the Britaine seeking to recouer his right, ioined in friendship against this Monarch, and met him in his enemies in the face of a Field. The plaine was large, and called Heistfeld, where after a long and most bloodie fight, king Edwine was slaine, with prince Offrid his sonne, his whole Host put to the sword, or most shamefull flight: which chanced the fourth of October, the yeere of our Lord six hundred thirty three, the sixth of his Christiansme, the twentieth of his Monarchie, the thirtieth of his kingdom, and the forty seventh of his age. His bodie was latly buried in S. Peters Church in Strawall, after called St. Peter's.

His Wives.

(11) Queenburg his first wife, was the daughter (as Bede reporteth) of Cearl, but as all other Writers doe witness, of Grada King of Mertia. She was married vnto him in the beginning of his youth, (and when he was dispossessed of his inheritance by the Tyrant Ethelred, as we haue said) with him she liued a great part of his banishment, and in the Court of Redwald King of the East-Angles deceased, before her husband could recouer his Kingdom.

(12) Ethelburg, surnamed Tate, was the second wife of this King, who was the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, and of Queen Bertha his first wife. She was married vnto him in the yeere of grace six hundred twentie five, being the second of his Monarchy, and was his wife six yeeres: him forsaking him, and desirous to liue a religious life, shee returning into Kent, withdrew her selfe to a place not far from the Sea side, called Lymms, wherein shee built a Monastrie of Nunnies, and among them spent the rest of her life, and therein died, and was there buried.

His Issue.

(13) Offrid, the eldest sonne of King Edwine, and Queenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile among the East-Angles. He was baptized in the faith of Christ by Paulinus the first Archbishop of York, and was slaine the same day, and in the same battell that his father was. He had a sonne named Iffy, who was baptized also by Bishop Paulinus, and after the death of his father and grand-father, for feare of King Ofwald, was conueyed ouer the Seas into France, to bee brought vp in the Court of King Dagobert, where he died in his childhood, and was there honourably interred.

(14) Edfrid, the second sonne of King Edwine and Lady Queenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile, and baptized with his brother Offrid by Bishop Paulinus. After his fathers death, for feare of King Ofwald, hee fled to Penda King of Mertia, who was his fathers enemy, and his mothers kinsman; by whom hee was most treacherously murdered. He left behind him a son named Herbert, who by his wife Bertfrith had issue the vertuous & learned lady Hilda, Abbess of Strawall: & Queen Herfrith her sister, the wife of Ethelbert King of the East-Angles brother to King Anna, by whom shee had issue Ald wulf, Edfrid, and Seorne, all three succeeding Kings of the East-Angles.

(15) Ethelme, the third sonne of King Edwine, and the first of Queen Ethelburg his second wife, was baptized by Paulinus Arch-bishop of York, not long after his father and half-brethren; but in short space after his baptism, he departed out of this world, euen in the time that he wore the white attire, which in those daies was vied to bee worn by such as were newly baptized for a certaine space. His body was with all due funerall obsequies entred within the new Church of S. Peter in the Cite of York, which his father had newly founded.

(16) Fiffric, the fourth sonne of King Edwine and the second of Queen Ethelburg his second wife, and the last and youngest of them both, bare the name of his fathers great grand-father. He was baptized by the Arch-bishop Paulinus at one time with his brother Ethelme. After the decease of his father, his mother carried him with her out of Northumberland into Kent, and from thence conueied him ouer into France with his Nephew Iffy, the sonne of his half-brother Offrid, where hee continued in the custodie of King Dagobert, being his mothers cosen-german and there died, and was honourably buried in a Church with his Nephew Iffy.

(17) Laufled, the elder daughter of King Edwine and Queen Ethelburg his second wife, was borne the night following that her father was wounded and baptized, her being a Pagan. Shee was afterwards married to Ofuy, the fourth King of Northumberland, and tenth Monarch of the Englismen, as shall be said.

(18) Ethelred, the younger daughter, the fifth and last-borne child to King Edwine and of Queen Ethelburg, was baptized at the same time with Ethelme and Iffy as her brethren. She died an infant, shee white clothing not yett put off, which in those daies was usually worn at certaine set times after their baptism, and was with like funerall obsequies buried by her brother Ethelme in the Church of S. Peter in York, which their father had founded.

OSVWALD KING OF NORTHVM-BERLAND, AND THE NINTH MO-NARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIFE, AND ISSE.

Monarch 9.

Ofwald.

CHAPTER XXI.

An. Do. 634.

Oswald, the fifth King of Deira, the ninth of Berni-cia, the third of Northumberland, and the ninth Monarch of the Englishmen,
began his raigne the yecre of Christs incarnation six hundred thirty foure. He with Eanfrik and his brethren, the sonnes of wilde

Ethelfrid, and Ofrik also the sonne of Alfrik King Ed-wines Vnkle had been secured in Scotland all his raigne, and among the Red-blacks lived as banished men,
where they learned the true religion of Christ, and had received the Laver of Baptisme. But Edwines death wrought and disvalged, these Princes returned again to their Country, and the Northumbrian Kingdome lately governed by one, was now againe divided into two feuerall parts, as formerly it had been.

(2) Over the Deira, Ofrik was made king, and of Bernicia, Eanfrik assumed the raigne, but Gods iustice ouer taking their Apostolicke, neither their liues nor this diuision lasted long. For Cadwall the Christian, and Penda the Pagan were Gods instruments, that with worthy vengeance in the first yecre of their go-uernment, cut the one off in battell, and the other by trechery; whose names and yecre of raigne as vn-happy and of hatefull remembrance, the Historiographers of thos times would haue to be omitted.

(3) But religious Ofwald lamenting the effusion of his Countries blood, long slept not their reuenge.
For assembling his power, which was not great, he suddenly and vnlooked for came vpon Cadwall, and at Deuflingburn pitched downe his tents. The place (saith Beda) stood nere the wall that Senarus had made, where Ofwald for the first day forbore to fight, and among his Souldiers for his Standard set vp a Crosse of wood; wherunto it seemeth thos dawning daies of Christianity were ouermach addicted. Here

Ofwald making first intercession to God, the onely preseruer of his people, in sore & long fight obtained great victory, with the slaughter of Cadwall, and of all his British Army: which so accomplished, many haue attributed the vertue of that Crosse to bee no small cause of that great ouerthrow. This Crosse so set vp, was the first we read of to haue been erected in England, and the first Altar vnto Christ among the Bernicians, whose pretended miraculous cures, not onely in the wood it selfe, but in the mosse and in the earth wherein it was set, let Beda report them, and Stephan vige them, yet for my part, I hold them no Article of our canonickall Creed.

(4) But certaine it is, that Ofwald himselfe was a most religious and godly king, and tooke such care for the conseruation and saluation of his subjects, that he sent into Scotland for Aidan a Christian Bishop, to instruct his Northumbrians in the Gospell of truth.
And whereas the Bishops could not speake their language, the king himselfe was interpreter at his Sermon, and gaue his words in the English, as hee spake and pronounced them in the Scottish, which language Ofwald perfectly spake, hauing bene there the space of eightene yecres.

Thus the godly proceedings of the king and Bishop, produced such increase of their beaueuly seed, that it is reported in seuen daies space, fifteene thousand Christians received Baptisme; and many of them forsaking the pleasures of the world, to haue become themselves to a religious and solitarie life.

(5) At this time the whole land flourished both with peace and plentie, and acknowledged their subjection vnto king Ofwald. For, as Beda reporteth, all the Nations of Britannie which spake foure languages, that is to say, Britainers, Redblacks, Scotti, and Englishmen, became subiect vnto him. And yet being aduanced to so royall a stature, he was as merittfull and good (which is more worthy to be reported) than to all, gracious to the poore, and beneficall to strangers. The fruits whereof the same Author exemplifieth in his bounty and humilitie towards the poore; who vpon a solemne feast day, seeing many such at his gates, sent them both the delicates for himselfe prepared, & commanded the charger of siluer to be broken, and diuided among them. The Bishop much reioycing thereat, tooke the king by the right hand, and praised that it might neuer consume; as after his death it did not, but was shined in siluer, and in S. Peters Church at Richa, now Bambergh, with worthy honor was worshipped for the many miracles in cures that it did, as likewise the earth wherein his blood was spilt: with such iustis enlargements have those writers interlined the deeds of Gods Saints.

(6) But as the Sunne hath his shadow, and the highest tide her ebbe, so Ofwald, how holy soeuer, or government how good, had emulators that fought his life, and his Countreys ruine: for wicked Penda the Pagan Mercian, enuying the greatnesse that king Ofwald bore, raised warres against him, and at a place then called Maserfeld in Shropshire, in a bloodie and fore fought battle slew him; and not therewith satisfied, in barbarous and brutish immanitie, did teare him in peeces, the first day of August, and yeere of Christ Iesus hundred forty two, being the ninth of his reign, and the thirty eighth of his age: whereupon the said place of his death is called to this day Ofwaldstree, a faire Market Towne in the same Countie.

(7) The dismembred limmes of his body were first buried in the Monastery of Bradbury in Lincolnshire, shined with his standard of Gold and Purple crested ouer his Tombe, at the industry and cost of his neece Offryd, Queene of Mercia, wife vnto king Ethelred, and daughter to Ofwyn that succeded him. From hence his bones were afterwards remooued to Gloesster, and there in the north side of the vpper end of the Quire in the Cathedrall Church, continueth a faire Monument of him, with a Chapell set betwixt two pillars in the same Church.

His Wife.

(8) Kinburg, a most vertuous Lady, and daughter to Kingul the sixth, and first Christian king of the West-Saxons, was the wife of king Ofwald, who became both his father and sonne in the day of her marriage, by receiuing him at the Foote, and her of his gift. She was married vnto him in the second yeere of his reign, which was the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred thirty six: no other relation made of her besides the birth of his sonne.

His Issue.

(9) Ethelwald, the only child of king Ofwald and Queene Kinburg his wife, was borne in the yeere of our Lord six hundred thirty seven, being the third yeere of his fathers reigne; and but an infant at his fathers death, was disappointed of the Northumbrian Kingdome by the fraud of his vncle Ofrym. Notwithstanding at the death of Ofrym king of Deira, and then not above sixteen yeeres of age, hee tooke the same kingdome, and by strong hand held it against his vncle so long as he liued, and at his death left it to his cosen Alfred, the naturall sonne of king Ofrym, as in the ninth Chapter we haue said.

(who did apostate from his faith) and ruling his Province in plenty and peace the space of seven yeeres, was therefore greatly enuied by Ofwy of Mercia, and hally by him provoked into the field. Their hosts met at the place then called Wulfers Dyne, ten miles West from the village Cassarillon, and there attended to hazard the day. But Ofwy finding himself too weak for Ofwy, and to save the effusion of Christian blood, forsooke the field, accompanied only with one Souldier, and went to Earle Hunwald his friend as he thought, to secure his life. But contrary to trust, hee deliuered him vnto King Ofwy, who cruelly slew him the twentieth of August, and ninth of his reign, at the place called Ingerthing, where afterwards for satisfaction of so heinous an offence, a Monastrie was built, as vpon like occasions, many the like foundations were laid, whose stones were thus ioynd with the mortar of blood.

(3) Of this Ofwy thus slain, Bede reporteth the Story following: Among his other rare virtues and princely qualities, his humility (saith he) and passing lowliness excelled: whereof he thus exemplifieth: The reuerend Christian Bishop Aiden ofwy much travel to preach the Gospel throughout that Province, the King for his more ease, gave him a goodly Gilding with rich and costly trappings. It chanced one day, as the Bishop rode to minister the word of life, that a poore man demanded his almes: but hee not heeding wherewith to releue him, and paying his distressed poore estate, presently alighted, and came vnto him with his horse and rich furniture; whereof when the King heard, hee blamed him, and said, What meant you my Lord to give to the begger the horse that I gave you, with my saddle and trappings? Had we horses of no lower price to give away to the poore? To whom the Bishop replied, And is the bread of a beast dearer in your sight, then this poore man the child of God? The King then repented, turned himselfe towards the fire, and there falling upon his knees, presently gave from him his furrow, and in haste fell at the Bishops feet, desiring forgiveness in that he had said. The Bishop much amazed, suddenly lift up the King, desiring him to sit to meat, and to be merry; which the King immediately did, but the Bishop contrariwise began to bee penitent and sadde, and the tears to trickle downe his cheekes: in which position hee burst out into these words, and said to his Chaplaine in an obsequious tongue, I neuer till this time have seen an humble King; and surely his life cannot bee long, for this people are not worthy to haue such a Prince to gouern them. But to returne to King Ofwy.

(4) Who after many cruell inuasions of the mercilesse Penda, was forced to flee vnto him for peace, with profers of infinite treasure and most precious Jewels: all which rejected, and the Tyrant comming on, Ofwy fought his helpe by supplications to God, and with such zeale as then was embraced, vowed his young daughter Elsfleda to be consecrated in perpetuall virginity vnto him, with twelve Farmers and their lands, to the erection and maintenance of a Monastrie: and thereupon prepared himselfe for battell.

(6) The battell was fought neere to the riuer Isart, which at that time did ouer-flow his banks, so that the victorie falling with Ofwy, more were drowned in the water then flane with the sword. And heerein proud Penda lost his life, with the discomfiture of all his Mercian power. Heerein also died Ethelwald, the East-Angles King, who was the only motiue to these warres: and Ethelwald escaping, returned with diffidence vnto Deira. The day was thus gotten the thirteenth yeere of King Ofwy his reign, the fiftenth day of Nouember, and yeere of Christi his Incarnation six hundred fifty five.

(8) This Ofwy ending in troubles as he began in warres, reigned the space of twenty eight yeeres, and then falling sick, was so stricken with remorse for the death of good Ofwy, and blood which hee had spilt, that hee vowed a pilgrimage to Rome, in which reported holy place hee purposed to haue ended his life, and to haue left his bones therein to rot: but his disease increasing, and that purpose failing, he left this life the fiftenth of Februarie, and his body to remaine in S. Peters Church at Strasburgh, the yeere after Christi his six hundred fuenente, and of his owne age fifty eight.

His Wife.

(9) Eanfled, the wife of this king, was the daughter of Edwin and Ethelburg, King & Queene of Northumberland. Shee was the first Christian that was baptized in that Province, and after her fathers death, was brought vp to Kent vnder her mother, and thence married vnto this Ofwy, whom the furnished, and spent the whole time of her widow-hood in the Monastery of Strasburgh, where her daughter Elsfled was Abbesse, wherein the deceased and was interred in the Church of S. Peter, hard by her husband king Edwin.

His Issue.

(10) Egfrid, the eldest sonne of king Ofwy and of Queene Eanfled, was borne in the third yeere of his fathers reign, being the yeere of grace six hundred forty five. In the twenty fifth yeere of his age, and of our Lord God six hundred fuenente one, hee succeeded his father in Northumberland, but not in his Monarchie: of whose life and acts, wee haue further spoken in the fiftenth Chapter of this Booke.

(11) Elsfleda, the second sonne of king Ofwy, and of Queene Eanfled, was borne in the yeere of our Lord six hundred fity one, being the ninth of his fathers reign; at whose death hee was nine yeeres old: and in the ninth yeere after, being the eighteenth of his age, was unfortunately slaine in a battell, wherein hee kried his brother Egfrid, against Ethelred king of the Mercians, to the great griefe of them both, the yeere of Christi nativity six hundred fuenente nine.

(12) Elsfled, the eldest daughter of king Ofwy and queene Eanfled, was borne in the month of September, the yeere of grace six hundred fity foure, being the twelfth of her fathers reign, and when shee was a yeer old, by him committed to the custody & bringing vp of the renowned Lady Hilda, Abbesse of Strasburgh, wherein shee liued vnder her a Nun, and after her death did succeed her Abbesse of the place, and in great holinesse and vertue spent therein her life, vnto the day of her death, which was the yeere of Christi Iesus seuen hundred fouteene, and of her owne age fixtie, being interred in S. Peters Church within the same Monastrie.

(13) Offred, the younger daughter of king Ofwy and queene Eanfled, was borne about the fiftenth yeere of her fathers reign, which was the yeere of our Lord six hundred fitye fuen: and when this was fully twenty, was married vnto Ethelred king of Mercia, the twelfth Monarch of the Englishmen, in the third yeere of his reign, and of Christi six hundred fuenente fuen.

(15) Alfred, the naturall daughter of king Osney, borne before her father was king, in the yeere of Christs incarnation six hundred fiftie three, and the eleuenth of her fathers raigne, was married to Feldt the sonne of Penda, that by his permission had gouerned some part of Mercia, and by Osney his gift with this Alfred, all the South of that Province. She was his wife three yeeres, and is of most writers taxed to be the sctor of his death, being wickedly murdered in the fraile of Egfrid, the yeere of grace six hundred fiftie fixe, and the fourteenth of her Fathers raigne.

Vulfhere.

VVLFHHERE THE SIXTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE ELEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIFE, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXIII.

An. Do. 659.

Vulfhere, after the enmurther of his brother Penda, advanced against Osney by the Nobles of Mercia, maintained his title and kingdom for twelve yeeres continuance, in the life time of that Northumbrian Monarch, and after his death translated the Monarchy from those Kings and Countrey, vnto himselfe and his successors the Mercians, who now wore the Imperiall Diademe without reuerence, vntill such time as great Egbert set it vpon the West-Saxons head.

He was the second sonne of Penda King of Mercia, and the sixth in succession of that kingdom, beginning his raigne the yeere of Christs Incarnation, six hundred fiftie nine, and twelve yeeres after, Anno six hundred seauenty one, entered his Monarchy ouer the Englishmen, and was in number accounted the eleuenth Monarch of the Land.

(1) His entrance was with trouble against the Northumbrians, for vnto Egfrid their King he had lost the possession of the land Lusky, and was expelled the Countrey: yet three yeeres after he fought against the West-Saxons with better success, whose Countrey with conquest he passed thorow, and won from Kenwald their King the Isle of Wight, which land he gave to Eadwech the South-Saxons King, whom he reuered his God-sonne at the font-stone: notwithstanding himselfe had lately been a prophane Idolater, and most cruell Heathen, as by the Liger booke of the Monastery of Peterburgh appeareth, whose story is this:

(1) King Vulfhere of Mercia remaining at his Castell in Worcester in Stafford-shire, and vnderstanding that Vulfild and Eufus his two sonnes, vnder pretence and colour of hunting, usually resorted to reuerend Chad, to bee instructed in the fruitfull faith of Christ Iesus, and had at his hands received the Sacrament of Baptisme, at the perswasion of one Werobod, suddenly followed, and finding them in the Oratory of that holy man, in deuout contemplations, slew them there with his owne hands. Whose martyred bodies Queene Ermeneld their mother caused to be buried in a Sepulchre of stone, and thereupon a faire Church to be erected, which by reason of the many finnes thither brought for that foundation, was euer after called Stones, and now is a Market Towne in the same Countrey. But King Vulfhere repenting this his most vnhumane murder, became himselfe a Christian, and destroyed all those Temples wherein his heathen Gods had been worshipped, conuerting them all into Christian Churches, and religious Monasteries: and to redeeme so heinous an offence, vnderwent the finishing of Medesham, his brothers foundation, enriching it largely with lands and possession.

His Wife.

(5) Ermenild, the Wife of King Falsfere, was the daughter of Erumbert, the seuenth King of Kent, and sister to Egbert and Luthair, both Kings of that Countie. Her mother was Sexburg, daughter to Anne, the seuenth King of the Egls-Angles, whose sisters were many and most of them Saints. She was married vnto him in the third yeere of his reigne, and was his wife fouenteene yeeres. After his decease, she went to her mother Queene Sexburg, being then Abbesse of Ely, where she continued all the rest of her life, and there in deceased and was buried.

His Issue.

(6) Knewd the son of King Falsfere and of Queene Ermenild, being the heire apparent of his fathers possessions, was vnder age at his fathers decease, and by reason of his minority, was withheld from the gouernment, which Ethelred his Vncle entred into, without any contradiction of this Knewd, who beid himselfe contented to liue a priuate life: notwithstanding Ethelred taking the habit of a Monke, left the Crowne to him who was the right heire.

(7) Falsfeld a young Gentleman conuerted to the Christian faith by Bishop Chad, and martyred for profession of the same by King Falsfere, is reported by Walter of Warwicke a Monke of Peterborough in a Register which he wrote of that Monastery, to bee the supposed son of King Falsfere himselfe, and to haue been slaine by him in his extreme fury before he was a Christian, or could indure to heare of the Christian faith. He was buried in Stone, as we haue said, where his father build a Colledge of Canons regular, which was afterwards called S. Falsfeldes.

(8) Asfere the fellow martyr of Falsfeld, is by the same Writer reported to be his brother, and the supposed Issue also of Falsfere the King. Their murders, as he saith, was committed the ninth Calends of August, which is with vs the foure and twenty of July, vpon which day there was yeerely celebrated a solemne memoriall of their martyrdomes in the same place, where they both suffered, and where their Monument was then remaining.

(9) Werdburg, the daughter of King Falsfere and Queene Ermenild, was in her childhood committed to the bringing vp of Queene Ethelrid her mothers Anne, in the Monastery of Ely, by whose perswasion she professed virginity and returning to her Countie in the reigne of King Ethelred her Vncle, was by him made ouerser of all the Monasteries within his dominions. She deceased at Tricheingham (now called Trottham) in Staffordshire, and was buried at Manby. Her body was afterwards remooued to Wolcsther, where Leofrik the Earle built in honour of her a goodly Church called S. Werdburg, which to this day is the Cathedral Church of that Cite.

daring to appeare in field. The Cite Rochester felt alio his fury, whose Citizens were ransacked, their buildings ruined, and their Bishop Pette driven to such distress, that he became a Teacher of good Arts and Musicke in Mercia, to maintaine his aged yeeres from the necessity of perishing want. These flames (saith Bede) happened in the yeere of grace six hundred seventy seven; and the next following, so fearefull a Blazing flarre, as was wonderful to behold, first discovered in the month of August, and for three moneths together continuell rising in the morning, and giving forth a blazing pile very high, and of a glittering flame.

(3) Theremore of conscience for the blood he had spilt, and the places of Oratories by him destroyed, (besides his instructions into another mans right) stricke so deepe a wound into King Ethelreds breast, that ever hee bethought him what recompence to make. First therefore building a goodly Monastery at Bradney, and that most fruitfully seated in the County of Lincolne, thought that not sufficient to wash away the scarres of his foule offence, but determined in himselfe to forsake the world, for that was the terme attributed to the monasticall life: wherein notwithstanding, in lesse cares they lived, and their persons more safe from all dangers attempted, then when they publicly administered their lawes to their people, the rust executions whereof, many times breed the overthrow of their Princes, and their Persons never secure amidst their owne guards.

(4) But such was the religion then taught, and the godly zeale of the good Princes then reigning, whose works have manifested their vertues to posterities, and faith in Christ the saluation of their soules, in whose Paradise we leave them, and Ethelred to his deuout intent: who to reconcile himselfe first vnto Kenred, bequeathed the Crowne solely to him, although he had a sonne capable thereof: then putting on the habit of religion, became himselfe a Monke, in his owne Monastery of Bradney, where he lived a regular life the terme of twelue yeeres, and therein lastly died Abbat of the place, when hee had reigned thirty yeeres, the yeere of Christs nativity, seven hundred lxxviij.

His Wife.

(1) Offryd, the wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Osry, and of Lady Eanfred, King and Queene of Northumberland. She was married vnto him in the yeere of our Lord six hundred seventy seven, being the third of his reigne, and the twentieth of her age. Shee was his wife twenty yeeres: and passing thorow the North parts of Mercia, she was let vpon and slaine by the people of that Country, in reuenge of the death of Penda their King, who had long before bin murdered by Aelfred his wife, and her half sister, as we haue said. And thus strangely came thee to her vntimely end, the yeere of our Lord six hundred ninety seven, the twenty three yeere of her husbands reigne and the fowenth of her owne age.

His Issue.

(6) Chelred the sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Offryd his wife, was the heire apparent of his fathers kingdome, and of sufficient yeeres to haue succeeded him, when he entered into religion; but that it was his fathers will to make amends to his Nephew Kenred, sonne to his elder brother King Waltheof, that now he might reigne before his sonne, who should haue reigned before himselfe.

CHAPTER XXV.

Kenred the sonne of Waltheof, became of his minority at his Fathers death, was defeated of his dominions by his Vncle Ethelred, and vntill it pleased him to resigne his Crowne, liued a priuate life, whereunto by assure hee was mozt inclined. But King Ethelred for the wrongs to him committed, and to re-deeme the time that in warre and wealth he had prodigally spent, yielded the Scepter vnto his hand, and set his seeming ouer-henry Crowne vpon his Nephew Kenreds head; who began his reigne at one and the same time, both ouer the Mercians and Monarchy of the Englishmen, which was the yeere of Christs Incarnation seven hundred and foure.

(1) He is in account the eighth King of that Province, and the thirteenth Monarch since Hengst the Saxon. He reigned in peace the space of foure yeeres, then weary of government, and desirous of consecration plation, after the example of his Vnkle, sought a more priuate and religious life: and thereupon appointing Chelred his Colich germane to rule in his place, in the fifth yeere of his raigne, abandoned his kingdome and Country, and departed for Rome, accompanied with Offa King of the East-Saxons, and with Edwine Bishop of Wortleser, where both these Kings were made Monks in the time of Pope Constantine the first, Justinian the younger then wearing the Imperiall Crowne: and in a Monastery at that cite, both these penitent Convents in the Coules and Orders of Monks, spent the rest of their liues, and therein died and were entered; this Asterian King Keured hazing had neither wife nor child, that I can reade of.

(1) It is not greatly to be wondered at, in that these times to much overshadowed with superstitious zeal, the holy acts of men, which no doubt were many, & the habit of Monks, the accounted holy garments of humility, were so meritoriously respected and reputed in the deuout hearts of the religious, when by the Clergy (that are accounted the light of the world) in a Council at Rome held vnder Pope Constantine the first, it was decreed and commanded, that curued Images, which neither had action, nor life, nor could sue themselves from the stroke of destruction, should bee made to the memoriall of Saints, and should be set vp in Churches, with respectiue adoration, contrary to Gods most expresse commandement, and condemned for idolatry by the warrant of sacred Scripture.

Hereupon great preparation was made, and each set forward with all the powers, the one to attaine, and the other to keep the glory and title that both of them so much thirsted after. At Wadenbury they met, and with vndanuted spirits so fought, that the victory was doubtfull, for neither could say the battell was his, or that he departed with the lesser losse.

by Florus of Worcester, who was the follower and the most of necessity be thought to have been mar-

Ethelbald, cofin germane once remoued, vnto King Chelred, succeeded him in the kingdom of the Mercians, whereof he was the tenth in number, and of the Monarchs ouer the Englyshmen the fifteenth account. He beganne his raigne in the yeere of grace Iesen hundred sixteene, and with great honour raigned ouer all the Kings on the South side of Humber, whyle time for the most part was spent in peace; yett some wars he had, and those with variable success.

(2) For in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, hee
belieged Somerton, and wanne it; and inuading Northumberland, without proffer of resistance, returned with great riches by spoyle. The Brittaines also that were ioined confederates with the West-Saxons, hee molested and ouercame, for whose reuenge King Cuthred gave him battell neere vnto Burford, where he with his Mercians recouered the spoile, and loile the Banner, wherein was portrayed a Golden Dragon, the thirty seuenh yeere of his raigne.

(3) The sinnes of these times both in Prince and people, were many and great, as by the Epistles of Bansuar an Englyshman, and Archbishop of Mentz, is most manifest, wherein hee reprooued his adulterous life, who refraining to marry, wallowed in filthy le-cheries; by whose example the Noblemen of Mercia
did the like: and their women, as well Nunnas as others, made away their children be: ne out of wedlocke, whereby the graves were filled with dead bodies, as hee it selfe with damned soules. And in another Epistle sent vnto Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, hee complained of the Englysh Nunnas, who wandering on pilgrimage vnder forn of deuotion, sought pleasure and wanton fornications, through all the Cities of France and of Launbury.

(4) This his Epistle tooke so good effect, that in re-penance King Ethelbald relesed and prouided the Church from all tributes to himselfe, and built the Abbey of Croiland in Lincolneshire, for the pacifying of Gods wrath towards his sinnes; when also it was enacted by Cuthbert and his Clergy, in a Conuoca-tion held in his Prouince, that the sacred Scriptures should be read in their Monasteries, the Lords Prayer and Creed, taught in the Englysh tongue: which accordingly was done. Which Council was held in the thirte yeere of this Kings raigne, and of Christs incarnation Iesen hundred forty eight.

(5) Finally, when hee had ruled forty two yeeres, fighting against Cuthred the West-Saxon, in a warre not prudently vnderaken, hee was traitorously slaine by his owne subiects, at the procurement of Bernard a Leader of them, who affecting the kingdom by this stratagem of Treason, sought to attaine it, but was himselfe slaine by Offa the Mercian, before that this ill sowne seed could take any roote. The place of this Great Ethelbalds death, was Secundum, three miles from Tamworth, in the Countie of Warwick, and of his buriall, Regium in Darbyshire, where with honourable obsequies hee was entereed, the yeere of Christs humanity Iesen hundred fiftie eight, having had neither Wife nor Children.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

An. Do. 758.

Offa, the colen of King Ethelbold, after some time of inter-regnum, succeeded him in his dominions of Mercia; a man of so high stomacke and stoutnes of mind, that he thought nothing vnpossible for him to attaine; and for vertue and vice, so equally compoised, that hardly could bee iudged to whiche of them the scale of his carriage most inclined, although the Monke of S. Albans, and writer of his life, doth blanch out his graces with superlatiue praises.

(2) His Parents bee nameth Twinfresh and Mercella, and himselfe bee said to haue been first named Pineered, borne both lame, deafe, and blinde, wherein he so continued vnto his manhood. The rage of Berored (saith the same Authoe) had forced all three into a solitary place, where suddenly by miracle Pineered was restored, and for that cause called another Offa, who presently assailed, and in a great battell manfully fought, slew the vntirpung Berored. The Nobles of Mercia being rid of that Tyrant by the valour of Offa, gladly embraced & receiued him for their King, who began his raigne with greater shew of glory, then any Mercian before him had done, being in number the eleventh that had raigned in that Prouince, and is accounted the sixteenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

(3) His neighbour Kings foreseeing, whereas his eye glanced, solicited by Letters Charles the Great, then King of France, against him, who wrote vnto Offa in their behalfe, and in threatening wise commanded him to desist. But he was so farre from fearing of his threats, that to his contempt he was the more eager.

(4) The first that felt his fury, were the Kentishmen vnder Athel their King, whose ouerthrow was the lesse dishonourable (saith Malmesbury) for that they were vanquished by so great a Monarch. The place was Onsiferd, vnfortunate to them, where their King was slaine by the hand of Offa himselfe, their forces quice diucomfited by the losse of this field, and their Countrey trodden downe vnder the feet of the Mercians.

(5) From South to North King Offa then marched, and beyond Humber made haucke of all that stood against him; whence returning triumphant, he set vpon the West-Saxons, that had formerly joined with his enemies: the place was Berinton, which Castell King Offa tooke, with the diucomfite of King Ecnulf, and all his West-Saxons, who sought their reuenge by the aides of the Britains in Wales. Their King (saith same Authoe) was then Marmadine, betwixt whom some intercourse by letters passed, & great presents to King Offa sent, onely to prouoke time, and to worke vpon advantage.

(6) In this interim of complements, for a further security, Offa caused a great ditch to be drawe betwixt his and the Britains borders, which worke began at Basingmark in Flint-shire, and North-wale, not farre from the mouth of Ure, and ranne along the mountaines into the South, & ended neer Bristow at the fall of 44 ye; the tract whereof in many places is yet seene, and is called to this day Cludde Offa, or Offa's ditch. Marmadine, who openly bare faile to this wind, and seemed to winke at Offa's intent, secretly called a Councell of State, wherein he declared how the Ast shire in working, would soone proue the bane of liberty vnto their countrey, and the marke of dishonour to the Cities & politerity for euer; therefore his aduice was, that by some stratagem it might be slaid by time.

(7) To this his Britains consented, the truce yet lasting, and the feast of Christs Nativity euen then at hand; in the celebration whereof was held the greatest advantage with least suspect, to put themselves in action against it; and secretly working the assistance of their allies the Saxons, both of the South, the West, and the North, vpon Saint Stephens day at night, suddenly brake downe the banke of this fortification, filling vp againe a great part of the Ditch, and in the morning most furiously rushed into Offa's his Court, putting a great number to the sword, who were most intemperate and regardfull to the Feall, then to any defence from their cruell and mercelless swords.

(8) These wrongs King Offa deliud not to re-queste, first making their hostages his valfills and daughters, and then with a great army entering Wales, in a bloody and fore-fought battale hee overcame Marmadon and all his associates in the field. Thus then as a Conquerour ouer all his enemies triumphantly after ten yeares was abroad returned he to his owne Kingdome, neither puffed with pride, nor suffring his title to be enlarged according to his conquests: yet he was not neglectiue of regall state, by the report of the Ligger booke of S. Almon, which saith, that in regard of his great prerogative, and not of any pride, he first instituted and commanded that euen in times of peace also, himselfe and his Successors in the Cremore, should as he passed through any Cities, have Trumpeters going and sounding before them, to shew that the person of the King should be both feared, and honour in all which either see him or heare him.

(9) Vato King Charles of France he wrote in excuse of his warres, and desire of his amity: whom Charles againe congratulated with letters of gladnes, both for his victories, and the Christian piety in his land embraced; desiring of Offa safe conduct for such his subiects, as came to his country in deuotion to God, and withall sent him, (for a present) a Booke of the Decrees of the second Council of Nice. Which Synodall Booke (to wit Reger. Howelous owne words) was sent vnto King Charles from Constantinople, wherein (alas for pity) by the unanimous assent of three hundred Bishops & more congregated in that Council, were decreed many things inconsistent, yea and quite contrary to the true faith: as in most especially the worshipping of Images, which the Church of God doth utterly detest. Against which Booke Albion wrote an Epistle, admirably strenghtned by the authority of the holy Scriptures, which together with the forefaid Booke himselfe presented on the name of the Princes or Bishops of this land, vnto the forefaid Charles King of France. Such intercourse both for State and Church had this great Offa with that great Charles.

(10) His last warres (according to mine Author) were against the Danes, whom he forced to their ships with the losse as well of their booties, as of many of their liues; and then (saith he) with the spirit of humility, both to recall himselfe from the trace of blood, and to the better establishment of his kingdomes peace, he ioined in affinity with his neighbour Frances, vpon whō he bestowed his daughters in marriage.

(11) And making Eystred his sonne a King with himselfe, in great deuotion went to Rome, where with the like zeale and example of Iuan the west-Saxon, he made his Kingdome subiect to a Tribute, then called Peter-pence, afterwards Ransome; besides other rich gifts that he gaue to Pope Hadrian for canoniz-ing Almon a Saint: in honour of whom, and in repentance for his finnes, at his returne (ouer against Frelanston, in the place then called Helmeburgh, where that Prelatry of Britaine, for the constant profession of Christ, lost his head) Offa built a ma-giustick Monastery in Anno 795. indowing it with lands and rich reuenues for the maintenance of an hundred Monks: vpon the first gate of entrance in thence (saith he) cut a slender Argent in a field azure, & is signified by the iudicious in Heraldry to bee the Armes that he bare.

(12) Also in testimony of his repentance for the blood hee had spilt, he gaue the tenth part of all his goodis vnto the Churches, and vnto the poore. At Rome he also built another Monastery, and in War-wich a Church, where the adorning towne, from it and him, beareth the name off- church.

(13) Finally, when hee had reigned thirty nine yeares, he died in peace at his towne off- by the nine and twentieth of Iuly, the yeare of Christ 838, so-uen hundred ninety foure: and with great solemnity
his body was buried without the towne of Bedford

in a Chapell standing vpon the Banke of Ouse, which long time was swallowed vp by the same riuer: whole Tombe of lead (as it were some phanassicall thing) appreth often (saith Reger) to the man that seek it not,
but to them that seek it, is altogether inuisible.

His wife.

(14) Quenbrid the wife of King Offa hath not her pageant set down by any of our Writers: notwithstanding, the recorder of this his life, saith that her name was Dryda, and that shee was the kinswoman to Charles the Great King of France, and by him for some offence banished his Realme, who arriving vpon the coasts of England in a ship without tackle, was taken thence, and relieved by Offa, being then a young Nobleman, where first changed her name
vnto Petramilla: with whom he fell so fast in loue that hee made her his wife, contrary to the liking of his Parents: She was a woman of condition ambitious, coeuous, and cruell, as appeared specially in the death of Ethelbert, King of the East Angles, that came to her husbands Court to marry their daughter; whole port shee so much enuid, that shee procured him to bee treacherously murdered: in the manner the forefaid Author declared to be by his fall into a deepe pit, purposely made in his bed-chamber, and vnder his chaire of estate. That his head was cut off, and found by a blind-man, that the uell which bears his name spring vp presently in the place where it lay, that the blood thereof gaue the blind man his sight, and that Dryda died in the same pit which she had digged for Ethelbert, I leave to the credit of my author, and the liking of my Reader:
but certain it is that Gods vengeance followed this heynous fact within one yeare after the same was committed, by the death of her selfe, her husband, & her Sonne, and the translation of that Kingdome from the Merians to the West-Saxons.

An ancient Saxon coine inscribed with her name, KENEDRED AEGIN. we haue found and here placed, which the iudicious suppose to be hers, and that not unlikely, shee being so powerfull, proud and ambitious.

His issue.

(15) Eystred the onely sonne, and heire apparant of King Offa and Queene Quenbrid, was the onely joy and pride of his parents, who succeeded his Father in his dominions and rule, and in the same yeare also in the State of death.

(16) Ethelburga, the eldest daughter of King Offa and Queene Quenbrid was married to Britrice: the sixteenth King of the West-Saxons: shee was a Lady of passing beautie, but withall of an inuolunt disposition, hating all whom her husband loved, and practising the deathes of them that she hated: She departed into France after the poisoning of her husband, & for that her offence, a law was enacted to the great prouidence of the West-Saxon Queenes, as in the reigns of Britrice we haue declared.

(17) Eystred, the second daughter of King Offa, & Queene Quenbrid, by the report of Randaup Niden
the Monke of Cheshire, was the second wife to E-thelred King of Northumberland, who in regard of her had put from him his former wife, for which his subiects rose in Armes against him, and slew him in the last yeare of King Offa his reign.

(18) Eystred the third and youngest daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quenbrid, being promised in marriage, and assured vnto Ethelbert King of the East Angles, after the murder of her hoped Bridegroom, with great lamentations and prophesying threats of revenge, abandoned the society of men, and withdrew herselfe vnto the monastery of Crowland in the Fenets.

An. Do. 794.

Egfrid, the sonne of King Offa, succeeded his father in the Mercians Kingdom, wherof he was the twelfth in number, and in the Monarchy of the Englishmen, ranked in account the seuenteenth. He began his raigne the thirteenth day of July in the year of Christ his natiuitie, seven hundred ninety foure. The first businesse that he vndertooke after hee came to the Crowne, was the restauration of ancient priuiledges to the Church, which his father had deprived them of; and great hope was conceiued of his further proceedings, had not God cut him off by vncinely death. For hauing reigned onely foure moneths, hee gaue place vnto nature, and to another successor, the first of the people desiruing no such Prince: for whose cause, and his fathers great bloodshed, as Alewine wrote to Oshertus, he was taken away so soone.

Kenwolve.

KENWOLFE THE THIRTEENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE EIGHTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Monarch 18.

CHAPTER XXX.

An. Do. 794.

Kenwolve, not so neere in blood to king Elfrid, as he was like him in all vertuous conditions, by him was ordained to succeed in his Dominions, where by hee became the thirteenth King of the Mercians, and the eighteenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

Kenwolve, in the yeere of our Lord seven hundred ninety seven. At home he was an example of piety, peace, and religion, & set the scale of Justice without respect to all alike; abroad temperate, humble, and courteous, without vain ostentation or ambitious conceits; in warres hee was stout and victorious, in peace studious to enrich his subjects: briefly, at all times so carrying himselfe, that enuie could not touch him with her tongue.

(1) Whether vpon a new quarrell begun, or the old retained, (as inheritable to the Mercians against those of Kent) I cannot say, but true it is, that in the entrance of his raigne, hee carried that Province with a great host of men, and in a sore fought field discomfited the Kentish, and carried away prisoner their King, whose surname was Prea. His kingdom hee gave to Cuthred, and kept him captiue in Mercia, to his great griefe, and his subjects dishonour.

(2) But Kenwolve in peace, & minding the works of true piety, gaue himselfe to the building of a goodly Church at Winchesombe in Gloucestershire; where vpo the day of dedication in the presence of Cuthred (assigned his Victory in Kent) thirteene Bishops, ten Dukes, many Nobles, and a great concourse of people, he led Prea this Kentish captiue vnto the high Altar, and there without either his curacy, or ransom for Redemption, released and let him free; shewing thereby his deuotion to God, and the heroicall parts of a magnanimous Prince.

(4) His raigne was twenty two yeares, and death in Anno eight hundred nineteene, being solemnly buried in the Church of the Monastery at Winchesombe afore said which himselfe had founded.

His Wife.

(5) Elfrid, the wife of King Kenwolve, hath not her parentage certainly reported by any of our Historians; yet some later vpon a likelihood of her name, the place and time agreeing, haue thought her to be the daughter of Offa, affianced to King Ethelbert, as hath bene said: but in these obcurities, conjecture may wander astray.

His Children.

(6) Kinelm the sonne of King Kenwolve, and of Queene Elfrid his wife, was very young at his fathers death, and succeeded in the Mercian Kingdom, but not in the Monarchy of the English; King Egbert the West-Saxon King then growne too great. And in the same yeare that he began his raigne, by the treason of his vnnatural filier hee was murdered, and first obscurely buried, but afterwards solemnly removed and reposed neere to his Father in the Monastery of Winchesombe, as in the Mercian Kings successions wee haue said.

(7) Queendred the eldest daughter of King Kenwolve, and Lady Elfrid his Queene, after the decease of her father, ambitiously aspiring to compulse the sway of the Mercian Kingdom wholly to her selfe, wickedly conspired the death of her brother King Kinelm, which was traitreously acted by Aethbert her instrument, who had the charge of him: but the same turning to her reproch, for very blame of so damnable a deed, shee within short time after ended her life, but not her ignominie.

(8) Burgenseld, the younger daughter of King Kenwolve, and of Queene Elfrid, hath not bene so famous to posterity as her sister Queendred was for her infamous Act; notwithstanding, she may reasonably be supposed to haue lead a better life, and to haue died a better death, especially of vs, who find her not stained with any aspercion of misdeuouring.

EGBERT THE EIGHTEENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, THE NINE- TEENTH, BUT FIRST SOLE AND ABSO- LUTE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND ISSUE.

Monarch 19.

CHAPTER XXXI.

An. Do. 800.

THe Saxon Heptarchy drawing now to a period, the spring of an entire Monarchie began to shew it selfe, and the glory of the Englishmen more cleerely to arise: for though they had weakened each other by their own wars, yet flood their power strong in the possession of the whole, and the out-borne Brittaines held still at the worst.

(1) But such is the dispose of the sole disposer of Empires, that they have their risings, their falls, and their falls: never staying in one and the same point, neither entailed to one and the same Nation, how strong, politick or populous soever. The proofe whereof is apparent in all the Kingdomes of the earth, and this of ours as mutable as any; whose change of State vnto, and in, this seven-fold Government hath hitherto benee fene: the severall Kings thereof long contending to branch their own fountaines furthest and fairest, lastly let them fall into one streame, which so meeting, made a more famous confluence in this Atmureby, then the seven heads of Nilus in the Egyptian Sea.

(2) Formerly, the Kentsh, South-Saxons, East-Angles, Northumbrians, and the Mercians, through no lesse then eight descents had worne the Emperiall Diademe, whose rayes shone now so bright in the West-Saxons eyes, that they againe sought to recast themselves in so glorious a position. For, whereas Brightrik was possessed and contented with the West-Saxon Crowne, neither that worne without jealousy and feare; yet others of the blood royall from Cherdik raised the wings of their soaring thoughts much higher, among whom Egbert was one, neither the last nor the least in the opinion of the people, or suspect of his Prince.

(3) This Egbert having command of some part of that Province, so carried himselfe, that his fame grew fearefull to Brightrik the King, and hatefull to the envious Eltheburg his most proud Queene, by whom he was enforced first to secure himselfe with the Mercian Offa; and lastly constrained to flie into France: where vnder Charles the Great, he turned his adversity into an occasion of his valour, by serving in his warres, and learned by his politick government, how to rule a quiet or disturbed State.

(4) But King Brightriks death acted, and his Queene the contriver banished, Egbert is solicited to the wearing of the West-Saxon crowne, where hee became the eighteenth King in number, and nineteene yeares after the nineteenth Monarch of the Englishmen; entering his reign the yeare of Christ Iesus, eight hundredth, being the same yeare that Charles was made Emperour of the West, and Cornwall then ruling over the Sets.

(5) His first warres were against the Cornish, and their associates the Welsh, both of them a remanace of the old Brittaines, who had benee oftentimes vanquished, but neuer would seeme to be subdued, and for fouretene yeares continuance held side against Egbert; which their resistance so provoked his furie that hee enacted a most severe law against them, commanding that no Brittaines should presume to passe over great Offas ditch, and present death to them that durst let foot vpon any English ground. Their great Carr-legion (now West-chester) hee tooke from them, and at London from their West-gate cast downe the brazen Image of Cadwalla there set vp by the Brittaines for a terror to the Saxons, as we haue said.

(6) His warres thus prospering, his poissance grew dreadfull, and his glory much enuied at by the other Princes, whereof Bernulf of Mercia was the first attempter that sought to plucke the wing of this well-Saxon Eagle, but thereby wrought his owne downefall; for Egbert joyning battaile with him at Ellenden overthrew his power, and in that quarrell Bernulf was lustily slaine.

out reuerence vntill the Danes first got, and againe loft it, and the Saxons illuse failing, the same fell to the Norman Duke by Conquest, as in continuance of our history, Christ assisting, shall be seene.

(10) His Coronation was at Winchester, and entrance in the year of Grace, eight hundred and nineteen, at which time by his Edict in that City dated, hecaused all the South of the Iland to bee called England, according to the Angles, of whom himselfe came, and promising great felicity to his State and Successors, was therein not so happy as in his affaires he had beene fortunate.

(11) For those Saxons that by warre and blood, had made themselves Lords of other mens rights,
and of one Kingdome no lesse then seven, are now endangered to bee made seruants vnto subiection, and by warre and blood their ten-fold Kingdome brought againe vnto one; neither yet freed from the reuenge of bloodie violence: for that a ferce and cruell nation (the Danes) ceased not continually to invade them, till they had subdued and for the crowne thereof vpon their owne heads, who in King Brightricke dayes, and about the yeere seven hundred eighty seven, bating with three vessels landed in the West of England, at three seuerall times, in so many seuerall places, fought the ruine of the land in the reigne of this Egbert.

Simen, Dore.

Mall. 1793.

(12) The first was in his thirty third year, when with thirty five ships they landed at Lundisford vpon the North of England, where they were met and fought with Carham, but with such losse to the English, that two chiefe Captaines, Dudda and Ofmond, two Bishops, Herfrid of Winchester, and Figferd of Shirborne, with many Souldiers were therein slaine, King Egbert himselfe hardly escaping by the covert of the night.

(13) Their second attempt was in the second yeare following, when in West-Wales they landed, vnto whom the Brittainers there toynded, and in the place called Henigstentun abode the King in scid, where Egbert with prosperous fortune vanquished and slew both the Danes and the Welsh.

(14) The third place of their arriue was Shorprie in Kent, which Iland they sacked, and with much a doe were expelled in the last of King Egberts reign, and but the new beginning of their savage cruelties.

(15) This Egbert by Florentius of Winchester is said to be the sonne of Alfred, who was the sonne of Etha, and he the sonne of Eppa, the sonne of Inga, the brother of Iuc, the eleventh King of the West-Saxons, and both of them the sonnes of Kenred, descended from Cherdic the first King of that Province:

he was but low of stature, yet well composed and strong of limme, very valiant, wise and polihcke, a skillfull souldier, and as great in mind, as fortunate in warre; he reigned ouer the West-Saxons the space of thirty six yeares and seven monethes, and Monarch of the whole Iland seenteene: his death happened the fourth day of February, and year of Christs Incarnation eight hundred thirty six.

(16) His bodie was with all obsequies solemnly buried at Winchester, and his bones since taken vp, re-maine with others in that Cities Cathedral Church, belowd in Chells serpon the Wall of each side the Quire, with these verses neither ancient, nor elegant,
thereon inscribed:

*Hic Rex Egbertus postulat omne Regi
Nobis egregia munera veteraque iuris.*
Hic iussit.

(17) Redburg, the wife of King Egbert, was the first of the West-Saxons, that by their owne made law was deprived of title, authority, or place of a Queene; notwithstanding it seemeth these haue a great stroke with her husband, in that Iohn Brev
the Monke of Wynchester reporteth, that shee procured a law to be made against the Brittainers, the penalty whereof was present death for any of them to set footing within the realme of England, or to passe
the Dutch that King Offa had made.

Hic iussit.

(18) Ethelwulf, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, and Lady Redburg his wife, was in his childhood committed to the charge of Helmegus Bishop of Winchester, vnder whom hee was carefully tray-ned vp in learning and vertue, who coming to mans estate proved also a perfect Souldier, and had the leading of his fathers power against Rudric King of Kent, whom hee forced to flie ouer the Thamis, and to abandon his Kingdome, which he subdued to the subiection of his father, and afterwards succeeded him in the Monarchy of the Englishmen.

(19) Ethelstan, the younger sonne of King Egbert, and of the Lady Redburg his wife, was by his father deputed King ouer the Kentishmen, the South-Saxons, and the East-Saxons after hee had brought them vnto his subiection; which people hee most valiantly defended against the invasions of the Danes, defeating their forces both by sea and land, and at Sandwich gave them a most memorable ouerthrow, in the year of our Lord eight hundred fifty one, being the sixteenth of his brother King Ethelwulfes
reigne; in whose time hee deceased, and is reported to haue left a sonne named Osfrid, who by reason of his minority succeeded not in his fathers dominions, which Ethelbert the second sonne of King Ethelwulf
entred vpon, and being Monarch reunited these king-domes inseparably vnto the Monarchy.

(20) Egfrith, commonly called Saint Edith the daughter of King Egbert, was in her childhood by her brother Ethelwulf committed to the charge and bringing vp of a Lady in Ireland, greatly renowned for her holiness of life, named Moderne, by whom she was afterwards recommended to a Disciple of the said Lady, named Athra, and made Gouverneste place which the King her brother had given her, called Fellesworth, situated in Arden in the north verge

ETHELWOLVE THE NINTEENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENG- LISHMEN: HIS WARRES, ACTS, WIVES, AND CHILDREN.

CHAPTER XXXII.

An.Do. 337.

Ethelwolve, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, committed in his youth to the care of Heinefian Bishop of Winchester, and by him vnto Switlan a famous learned Monke of that time, tooke such a liking vnto the quiet and solitarie life, (specially enjoyed by men of Religion, all other degrees molished to withstand the intruding Danes) that he vnderooke the Monkish vow and profession, and was made Deacon; shortly after which degree taken, Heinefian died, in whose place Prince Ethelwolve was consecrated, as Roger Hoveden affirmeth, or at least elected, (as John Brampton Abbat of Tarnewick writeth) Bishop of Winchester. But the death of his Father King Egbert immediately following, by great intreaty of the Nobles, and partly by constraint of the Clergy, hee was made King, and was by the authority of Pope Gregory the fourth, whose creature in both professions he was, absolved and discharged of his vows.

(2) He entered his Monarchy the fourth day of February in the yeare of Christ Incarnation, eight hundred thirty seven, and was the nineteenth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Englishmen. His Bishopricke he gave vnto Switlan his Tutor, and according to his place, combined all his powers to withstand the dangerous Danes, that attempted the vnter subuersion of his faire land: whose first invasion in his first yeare happened, which drew the Saxons ciuill warres vnto a constrained peace, hauing more then they could well doe to defend their lues from their slaughtering Swords, or to sue their vniuall gotten land from the spoiles of those common enemies, who, not like Conquerors, but destroying Caterpillers, left nothing vndeouered wheresoeuer they came, and had now begunne their mercilese depopulations in diuers places at once, so that the distracted English were to seeke where was most need first to withstand.

(1) At Hampton & Portsmouth many of these Norway Pirates had entred, at Hampton with their overthrow, at Portsmouth with victory; and the same time at Carham, a Troupe of these Danes discomfited King Ethelwolves power. The next yeare at Mersware, Landsey, in East-Angle, and Kent, they did much mischief, and harried all the Country before them; yet in his tenth yeare at Peberdesmouth, the Somerset and Dorsetshire men gaue them a memorable overthrow, vnder the conduct of Earle Enwalde, Bishop Adelstan, and Osfred their captiues.

(4) But in the sixteenth yeare of this King, the great Planet Mars seemed to predominate continually, and Fortune to cast the chance of victory euer on his side: for two hundred and fifty ships, (some reckon a hundred more) entred into Thamesis mouth and set on shore an infinite number of these destroying Danes. London and Canterbury they had sacked and left wast, had pierced into Astoria, and chased Bertholfe their King out of his Country, and now in Somethy had pitched their battle, as able and resolute to shide all the power of the English, whither King Ethelwolve with his sonne prince Ethelbald repaired, and tooke the field at the place called Ogry; wherem after a long and fore fight, the victory fell to the English, with such slaughter of these Norway invaders, as is incredible to report, and the same held as great and famous, as euer had hapned in the land before.

(5) With the like successe his Brother Athelstan King of Kent, fought with the Danes at Sandwich, where chasing them to sea, tooke nine of their ships; and in Deuonshire, Earle Cearle at Windlethore so overthrew their whole power, that in despaike they withdrew themselves into the Ile of Thanet, where they made their abode all the winter season, and if destiny had not withhold the English, the Danes had bene expelled for euer. But the Saxons seeming seeming cleared of this common enemy, fell to their wonted quarrels with the ever deprecced Britains; against whom Burhard the Mercian obtained the assistance of King Ethelwolve in his eighteenth year, whose daughter Ethelfrith he had obtained in marriage; whereby for a while was increased the fame and power of that valiant, but unfortunate King.

(6) In this State the affairs of the land stood up to the nineteenth year of King Ethelwolve's reign; who now remembering his former Ecclesiastick profession, ordained that Tithes and Lands due to holy Church should be free from all Tributes or Regall services; and in great devotion went himselfe to Rome, where hee was both honorably received, and entertained the space of a whole year; in which time hee new built the English Schoole, that Offa the Mercian before had there founded, and lately was fired, bearing the name of Thomas the Holy; confirming also his Grant of Peter pence, and further commanding in lieu of his kind entertainment to pay yearly three hundred markes to Rome, this to be employed; one hundred to Saint Peters Church, an other hundred to Saint Pauls Light, and the third to the Pope: the Bride that hereafter must be kissed and largely paid.

(7) His returne from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, hee there married Isideth the most beautiful daughter of Charles the Bold then Emperour; in honour of whom in his owne Court, hee ever placed her in a Chaire of Estate, with all other maiestieall complements of a Queene, contrary to the law of the West-Saxons for Ethelbert's offence, formerly made. Which his doing so disliked the Nobles, that Prince Ethelbald his eldest Sonne, Adelfstan Bishop of Sharburne, and Ernulf Earle of Somerset, rose up rebelliously in Armes and sought to depose him; yet by mediation of friends, the matter came to a compromise, and the land to be divided betwixt the Father and Sonne, but with such partiality that the better part westward was allotted to Ethelbald: which vnequality gaue great suspicion, that this revolt was rather grounded upon ambition, then any inclination they had for the defence of their lawes, which commonly is the pretence and vaile for all disloyall attempts of seditious subjects against their soveraigne Lords.

(8) Howsoever it was, long after this he liad noe, but left his Manerly into his eldest sonne Ethelbald: and by will appointed Ethelbert his second, to be King of Kent and Essex, which countries he had conquered. He reigned twenty years, one month, and nine dayes, and decreased at a place called Stamrige, the thirtieth day of January, in the year of our Lord, eight hundred fifty seven, being the twenty one of his Reigne. His body was first buried at the place of his decreas, and afterwards removed into the Cathedral Church at Winchester.

His wives.

(9) Orburg, the first wife of King Ethelwolve, was the daughter of a Nobleman named Ofst, who had the office of Great Butler of England, and was descended of the stocke of Staffe and Wahgar two brethren, being nobleme of the people called Wes, who were the first Princes of the Ile of Wight, and Nephewes to Cherd, and cosen germanes to Kenw the first and second Kings of the West-Saxons, and the third and fourth Monarchs of the Englishmen. Shee was the second Kings wife that was debarred of the title and place of Queene. Shee decreed three years before the King her husband, in the nineteenth year of his reign, being the year of Christs Natiuitie eight hundred fifty nine.

(10) Isideth his second wife, was the daughter of Charles the Emperour, and King of France, as wee haue said: her Mother was Queene Ermentrude, the daughter of Volan Earle of Orleans. She was a Lady of passing beauty, and married to this King in France, and when she came into England was received with the title and place of a Queene, in a bullis-ment of the peruerse law of the West-Saxons, made against the Kings Wives, as before was touched. She was his wife three years, and furnished him without any faile.

His Issue.

(11) Ethelbald, the eldest sonne of King Ethelwolve, and of Lady Orburg his first wife, was brought up in his youth in the exercise of warre, and serued vnder his Father in the great victory obtained against the Danes at Oley in Surrey, in the year eight hundred fifty one; afterwards hee turned his force against his Father; and at his returne from Rome, practised to defeat him of his Kingdom; and was ready to haue giuen him battaile, had not his Father parted with him his Dominion.

(12) Ethelbert, the second son of King Ethelwolve and Lady Orburg his first wife, was in the life time of his Father, after the decreas of his vncle Ethelstan, appointed and placed his Successor in his Kingdom over the South-Saxons, the Kentish, and the East-Saxons, without any mention or meaning (as it seemeth,) that hee should intermeddle further with any other part of England. Notwithstanding after the death of his brother Ethelbald, it was generally holden of all men for law, equity, and reason, that hee should succeed him in the Manerly: and so hee did, with the consente of his Brethren, and without resistance, or contradiction of any other.

(13) Ethelred the third sonne of King Ethelwolve, and Lady Orburg his first wife, had by the disposition of his Father in his last will, the one halfe of his Fathers proper inheritance; which was all such land as King Ethert his Grandfather had before hee was King, and was no part of the Demesnes of the Kingdom, and this was diuided betwixt him and his brother Elfred, as the kingdom was betweene their elder Brethren Ethelbald and Ethelbert: with an intent that this Ethelred should succeed his brother Ethelbald in the kingdom of the West-Saxons; notwithstanding, his brother Ethelbert, after the decreas of King Ethelbald, entered into the other part, adjoining it to his former kingdom, and was king of the whole, and after left it entire to this Ethelred, who succeeded him in the Manerly.

(14) Elfred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelwolve and of Lady Orburg his first wife, was borne at 11 Anteg in Burghshire, in the year of our Lord God, eight hundred forty nine, and the thirteenth of his fathers reign. Being a child of five yeeres old, hee was taken very honourably attended to the City of Worcester, where Law the fourth then Bishoppe confirmed him, as was his Godfather at the confirmation, and annointed him to the expectation of a kingdom; growne in yeeres, hee grew so in discretion, magnanimity and fauour of all men, that in the successie reignes of his three elder Brethren, hee ruled as a Vice-roy or secondary king vnder every of them, and after them at the last succeeded in the English Manerly.

(15) Ethelfrith, the daughter of King Ethelwolve and Lady Orburg was married to Burhard the twentieth King of Mercia, which marriage was solemnized at the towne of Chappinham in Wiltshire, in the month of Aprill, and yeare of Christs Natiuitie eight hundred thirty six, and the fifteenth of her fathers reign: but within twenty two yeeres after, they were both forced by the Danes to abandon their kingdom, and departed into Italy, where the King died the same yeare in the English Colledge at Rome: hee liued after him fifteen yeeres in the habite of a Nunne, at the City of Padua, and there died, and was honorably buried in the year of our Lord God eight hundred eighty nine, which was the eighteenth yeare of her brother King Elfred's reign.

(16) Neate, supposed by Iohn Agapere the Letend writer, to be the sonne of King Ethelwolve, was in his youth brought up at Glosterbury vnder Dunelm, who was afterward Archbishop of Canturbury. Hee proued a man of great learning, and was one of the first Readers of Diuinity in the Vniversity of Oxford, at the

CHAPTER XXXIII.

An. Do. 847.
Florus. origen.

*E*thelbald, the eldest sonne of king Ethelwulf, hauing had part of the kingdome in the life time of his Father, after his death entered vpon the whole, and was the twentieth King of the West Saxons, and the twenty one Monarch of the Englishmen, beginning his raigne in the yeere of Christs incarnation eight hundred fiftie seuen.

His wars against the Danes.

(1) His youth he had spent in the exercise of war, hauing made proofe of valour in his seruice against the Danes in many batels; and likewise attempted (though not in so good a cause) to haue fought against his owne father. Which his affaires, as they seemed violent and vnnatural, yet being in the quarrell of the West-Saxons law, enacted in preiudice of their Queenes, he was both sided and approued, as hath been said.

Wit. Melanbury.

(2) But howsoever vnwilling he was this faire Queene should sit in state by his fathers side, yet contrary to all lawes either of God or man, hee laid her by his owne, and by nuptiall rites, brought her to his sinfull and incestuous bed. Which act, though foule enough, some haue made worse, in reporting his Wife to be his owne Mother, whom King Ethelwulf kept for his Concubine. And surely this his sin was not long vnpunished by the shortnesse of his raigne and life, leauing no other memory of his acts, besides this foule blot to his faire name.

The time of his raigning.

(4) His raigne was onely two yeeres and an halfe, and death chanced vpon the twentieth day of December, the yeere of Christs assuming our flesh, eight hundred sixtie. His body was first buried at Starbome in the Countie of Dorset, where at that time was the Cathedral Church and Episcopall See; but afterwards was removed and enterr'd at Salisbury, in the Countie of Wiltshire.

His Wife.

(5) Indith, the Wife of King Ethelbald, was the widow of his owne Father, a most vnlawfull matrimonie contracted against all law of God or of nature, which being both dissolved and punished by the hallow death of the King, and the returning towards her father and Countie in Flanders, was rauished by Baldwin the Forester of Arden in France, and by him forcibly kept vntill shee consented to become his wife, who in regard of that marriage, when he was reconciled to the Emperor Charles her Father, was by him created the first Earle of Flanders, by whom shee had issue Baldwin the second, who espoused Lady Elfrid, the youngest daughter of Elfred King of England, from whom, through five descents lineally, Adame Queene of England, Wife to William the Conquerour descended, and from her, all our Norman English Kings vnto this day.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

An. Do. 860.

Ethelbert, the second sonne of King Ethelwulf, who had succeeded his Vnckle Ethelstan in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, Kentish, and East-Saxons, and for five yeceres continuance, ruled those Countreies with great equiry and valour, after the decease of his brother Ethelwald, succeeded him also both in the West-Saxon kingdome, and the whole Land Monarchie: whereof he was the one and twentieth King, and the two and twentieth Monarch.

(1) His raigne began in the yecere after Christs nativity, eight hundred and sixtie, and was disquieted from first to last by the innasions of the bloody Danes. For presently after his coronation, these common enemies entered the Land, ruining all before them vnto the Citie Winchester, which they sacked, and left it troden vnder their destroying feet, even to the ground. But in their retorne were encountered by the Barthelmewes, vnder the leading of Ofrik, Earle of Hampton, by whom they were vanquished, the prey recovered, and a great number of those Infidels slaine.

(2) In his first yecere also a natiue of Danes and Normans entered into the Land Taney, and began their wonted spoiles among those people: whereupon the Kentish compounded their peace for a great sum of money giuen. Notwithstanding these miscreants, which knew not God, gaue little regard to their promised covenants, and before the daies of truce were expired, like a sudden flood ouer-bare all before them. These their irruptions to withstand, the Kentish then prepared, rather aduertening themselves vpon the chance of battell, then to rely vpon a seeming truce, wherein their destruction was too apparant, and forthwith assembling all the powers together, set vpon those truce-breakers, and with much slaughter forced them at length out of their Countrey.

(3) But the date of King Ethelberts life being expired, hee yielded his body to the course of nature, and his Kingdomes to his next Brother, after he had raigned ouer the Kentish, South, and East-Saxons, the terme of ten yeceres, and had five Monarch of the whole onely true. He died the yecere of grace eight hundred sixty six, and was honourably buried in the Cathedrall Church of sherburne in Dorset-shire, by his brother King Ethelwald.

His supposed issue.

(4) Athelm, the brothers sonne of King Elfred, mentioned in the last will and testament of the same King, seemeth by all likelihood to be the eldest son of this King Ethelbert, elder brother to the same King Elfred, although hee succeeded not his father in his Kingdome. For in those daies, if the Kings sonne were vnder age, the succession went to the next brother; and if that brother left his sonne at full age, then it went vnto him; otherwise it reuerted to the elder brothers sonne.

(5) Ethelwald, surnamed Clute, which is a word of addition giuen to all the Saxon Kings sonnes of England, is mentioned in King Elfreds will to be his brothers sonne, and is most likely to be the sonne of this King Ethelbert, he procured a most deadly enemy to his cosen King Edward, the sonne of King Elfrid his Vnckle, destroying his townes in Dorset-shire, and being driuen out of England, ioined himselfe with the Danes, who made him their King in Northumberland, and vnder his leading, greedously assailed the Countreies of the East-Saxons, East-Angles, and Mercians, wherein hee was slaine, the yecere of our Lord nine hundred and five, being the fourth of King Edward his cosen-germanes raigne.

CHAPTER XXXV.

An.Do.866.

*E*thelred, the third sonne of King Ethelwulf, after the decease of his Brother succeeded him in his Dominions, and was in number the two and twentieth King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty third Monarch of the Englishmen; he beganne his raigne in the yeare of our saluation eight hundred sixty and six, and for the time that hee was King raigne in continuall warres against the Pagan Danes, whose numbers now were greater, and footing surer in this land then formerly had beene.

(1) In the first yeare of his raigne, there arriued vpon the English coasts a huge Army of these Danes, whereof Hunger and Hobba, men of incredible strength and cruelty, were the Capteines: These winred in East Anglia, made truce with the inhabitants vpon certaine conditions, and forbore a time from their wonted rauening.

(2) But in the next yeare the King being busied to put backe a fresh iroude of Danes in the South and West of the Island then entred, these deuourers tooke aduantage vpon the ciuil broiles commenced among the Northumbrians, who in these turmoiled times sought to withdraw their subiections from the West-Saxons, and to set vp Kings againe of their owne. The forsaide Capteines Hunger and Hobba, hauing in time of their truce strengthened themselves with new supplies of aid, marched farther into the North, where finding the people vnprouided of strength, and the two Kings Osbert and Ella of reconciled enemies to be made no sure friends, they harried the Country before them, and entering Torkes slew the two Kings, with infinit number of the English; which City they consumed with fire, and burnt therein all those that had fled thither for succour.

(4) The State thus standing, and their forces encreasing euery day, brought new feares vpon the inhabitants, when euery late victory with increase of Capteines and rich spoiles, ministred occasion & meanes of some other conquest to follow; which these Pagans so pursued, till lastly they set a substitute King to raigne vnder them, ouer all the North Borders beyond the river Tyne, and so retiring themselves out of Northumberland into Mercia, came to Nottingham, which City they wanne, and therein winred the third of King Ethelred's raigne, who with the aid of Burford the Mercian King, constrained the Danes to sue for peace, and a safe departure, yielding the City, and againe retiring themselves ouer Tyne, remained in Torkes all the next winter.

(5) The Summers opportunity approaching, their wonted desire for spoile was with it increased, and to cut off long trauell these Danes by routes passed Humber, where Hunger and Hobba beganne with fire and sword to lay all wast before them, sparing neither Person, lease nor age. The places respected for publicke good, and sacred Temples consecrated onely to God, which all other Tyrants haue forborne, these sauage men as the earths destroyers cast downe and trampled vnder their prophane feet: among which for note were the goodly Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborough, Ely, and Huntington, all laid in leuell with the ground, and their Vocations, as well the Nunnes as the Monkes, murdered with their vnhumane and mercilesse swords; to avoid whose barbarous pollutions, the chaste Nunnes of Coldingham deformed themselves to their lasciuious eyes, by cutting off their vpper lips and noses; but to euertlasting remembrance they remain most faire, and well becomming faces of pure Virgins.

(6) These Pagans piercing further into the land, came into the territories of the East-Angles, wherein holy Edmund raigned King, whose Martyrdom in most cruell manner they wrought, he constantly calling vpon the name of Christ, whereof wee haue already spoken, and shall bee occasioned hereafter to speake.

(7) But in the last yeare of this Kings reign, their raging power was most great: for with a few supply two Danish Kings Sveeg, and Halden, entered into West-Saxia, and at Reading the Kings towne intrenched themselves: these foraging the Country, were encountered with at Englefield by Ethelwald Earle of Bathesburie, and his men, who in skilfull slew one of their leaders, and chased the rest backe to their Trenches.

(8) These Danes fearing lest debates would prove dangerous, and knowing that the first successe is commonly seconded with further courage of hope, foure dayes after showed themselves in field ready to fight: their hoste they divided into two battalions, whereof the one was guided by two of their Kings, and certaine Earles were leaders of the other; which when the English perceived, they also divided theirs, whereof King Ethelred had the leading of the first, and Elfred his brother was General of the second; the place was Affenden, where their Tents were pitched, and the day approached for battaile: King Ethelred in his Tent staid so long in prayers that Elfred upon a forward courage hasted to encounter the enemy, and that with a most fierce and sharpe fight, wherein having spent the most of their strengthes, and ready to decline, and give backe: Ethelred manfully entered the battaile, and so seconded his brother, and our-tyred Souldiers, that hee made way by dint of his sword through the thickest of their almost-conquering enemies, and with such losse of the Danish blood, drawne from the sides of one of their Kings, five Earles, and an infinite number of the common Souldiers, that the streames thereof seemed as an over-swelling tide, altogether to cover the face of the field, and is accounted for the noblest victory that the English till then had gotten of the Danes.

(9) Yet were not these Pagans therewith discouraged, but gathering more strengthes and supplies from other parts; foureteen dayes after, made head againe against the English, and pitching downe their standards at Basing, about the coming of Ethelred and trial of battaile, wherein successe was altogether altered; for herein the Kings part was discomfited, and the Danes the winners of the day.

(10) Thus both sides borne upon rage & hope, in their heat of blood prepare for new fight. The Danes power was augmented with a further supply sent from beyond Seas, and the English confirmed with hope of successe: These meeting at Merton (two moneths after the battaile of Basing) encountered each others both boldly and bloodily; wherein at first the English prevailed, and the Danes were chased; but their numbers the greater, and fresh supply maintaining their battaile, they recovered themselves, and wonne the day; wherein King Ethelred received his deaths wound, with such slaughter of his people, that little wanted the end of all encounters, to have been afterwards attempted any more by the English.

(11) Great was the valour and resistance of this King; for in his short time of Raigney, as Writers record, no lesse then nine set battailes against the Danes he fought in one yeare, to the great effusion of Christian blood, and to no little losse of the Danish power; for in his reign fell of them one King, nine Earles, and of the common sort without number.

(12) He died at Wittingham of his wound received the three and twentieth day of April, in the yeare of our Lord God eight hundred sixtenty two, and was buried in the Collegiat Church of Winton in Dorsetshire, where remains his Tombe and his Armes unto this day, with this Inscription:

Elfred, the eldest sonne of King Ethelred seemeth to be Grandfather to the noble and learned Ethelwold, who being Kinsman, Counsellor and Treasurer to King Edgar, wrote an history of his Country, beginning at the first arrival of the Saxons into England, and continuing unto his own time: which history he dedicated to his kinswoman, and cosen germane the Lady Matilda Abbess of Quedlingburg in Saxony, being the daughter of the Emperour Otto, by Edgith his wife, daughter of King Edward the elder, and sister of Ethelstone, and Edmond Kings of England.

Osulf, a young sonne of King Ethelred, is mentioned in a Charter of his Fathers, by which he gave lands to the Manserv of Abingdon neere Oxford; and to which this sonne of his hath his name set downe for a witness; which Charter is yet extant, recorded in a great Legies-booke, and Register of the Evidences of the lands, sometime belonging to the said Manserv.

Tyrra, the daughter of King Ethelred, is reported by the histories of Ireland to be married to Gormon King of the Danes, and so have had issue King Harald, which Harald, by Queen Gnold his wife, had issue, Sweyn king of Denmarke, Tringa king of Northumberland, and Gnold Queen of North-Wales. CHAPTER XXXVL

An. Do. 872.

Marston, Flores.

Elfred, or Alfred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelwulf, though hee had bene appointed King at Rome by Pope Leo in his young years & Fathers life time; yet reigned he in no part of his dominions, before the deathes of all his Brethren, vnder whom hee served in most of their warres; assisting them likewise in all their counsels: the land now miserably torne by the cruell incurfions of the bloody Danes, was left vnto him, both to redeeme, and to raigene oner, by the death and Testament of King Ethelred his last brother.

(1) Hee beganne his raigene in the yeare of his age twenty two, and of our Lord God eight hundred seventy two, being crowned in the City of Winchester, the twenty third King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty foure Monarch of the Englishmen: but of some Historians he is famousied by the stile of the first absolute Monarch.

(2) His raigene beganne with troubles and wars in defence of the land which the Pagan Danes intended to destroy; and though his powers were small, yet was he forced into the field within one month after his Coronation: the place was Wilton in the Countie of Wiltshire, on the south-banke of the riuer Wylt; where the Danes at first gaue backe and fled: but seeing the fwaines of their pursuers, re-enforced their battie, and got the field, with whom the West-Saxons entered league, and compounded for their departure from among them.

(4) These Roouers then with their associates at Reading, got themselves into London, where they wintered, with whom the Mercians likewise compounded for their peace, which proued shortly to be the destruction of their princely blood; and lastly, the lands subuerfion to a forraigne nation: For the Danes hauing got footing in the North, the West, and the South of this land, (vnto whose side many new-come guests from their Easterne countries were arrived, vnder the leading of other three Kings, Guthrum, Echthel, and Amond) all together let their griping tallents with such fast hold vpon Mercia, that at Exeter they constrained Burthred the King with his Queene Elfrith out of the land, and in his stead placed a King of their owne choise, vpon condition to deliuer vp the same againe vnto them when they would demand it.

(5) In the fourth yeare of King Elfred their armies diuided themselves into two parts, the one of them guided by King Halden, returned into Northumberland, where hee bellowed that Countie among his followers, and therein remained for two yeares continuance, doing much harmes both to the English and Pitts. The other part led by the last new-come King, came to Grainbridge, whence they wintered and spoiled the Countie, and there spreading themselves as Gashoppers vpon the face of the earth, eate vp all where they came; so that King Elfred was enforced to compound for their departure out of his owne kingdom in West-Saxia; to which covenantes they promised and swore; yet contrary to both, tooke into Deuonshire, and wintered at Exeter, vnto whom a further supply by sea sought to ioine themselves, but met with such boisterous blasts, that one hundred and twenty of their ships were cast away by tempest at Swinemich vpon our coasts, and their land-army marching towards Exeter, were there welcommed with so sharpe an encounter by King Elfred, that they gaue him both pledges and oath to depart with all speed.

(6) But Fortune euer dallying with them, whom shee means to down-cast, set the chance of losse presently lently upon the Saxons side; for now the three Kings Guthred, Esketil, and Admund thought it not good to let Elfred thus rest, and thereupon drew their forces towards him, where at Chippenham (a Mannor of his) they winned, and compelled the West-Saxons there, either to yield, or to forsake the Country.

(7) King Elfred therefore, with such strength as he had, halted towards them, and fourteen miles from Briflow pitched down his tents even in the face of the enemy, where betwixt these fierce nations a great battle was fought, to the infinite losse of blood on both sides, and that upon such equall departure, as neither could challenge to bee masters of the field; yet the report went, that King Elfred was discomfited, which turned greatly to his advantage, for thereupon many of the English halted to his succour, left the overthrow of him should be the bane of them all; his strengthes thus reined with an unexpected supply, no time was deducted to stay the Danish rage, who were now returned further into the heart of the land, and at Abington by Oxford had pitched their standards for fight.

(8) Thither the English repaired, and the next morning he ordered his Army, neither were the enemies unprepared, but with braves blood ready to receive the encounter. The battaile joynd, continued with such losse of blood, that it is accounted one of the foret that ever betwixt them before had bene fought, and onely parted by the approach of the night, neither party challenging the honor of the day, the losse being so great upon both sides.

Seven of these battailes are reported to be fought in that year, whereby both their strengthes were much abated, and their spite blood so cooled their liners, that lastly they concluded upon a peace, one article was this, that the Danes should admit no more of their nations to arrive in this land; but how soone that was broken, the sequels did shew.

(9) For in the year eight hundred seventy sixe, (saith Simon Dunelmensis) Ralls a nobleman of Denmark with a great Army entered into England, with no lesse spoile and destruction then other of those Danes before him had done notwithstanding the treachery whom King Elfred met, and gave him so host welcome, that hee liked not greatly his entertainment; and being warned (forsooth) in his sleepe, that better fortune attended him in France, hee left his countreinen to ruggle with the English.

(10) The Danes then accounting the peace to be broken, like Bees from the Hive, infect all the land, inso much that this vndanted King Elfred was oftentimes brought to such extremities, that he hid himselfe out of sight, and in the Fens & Marsh grounds was forced with such small companies as he had, to live by fishing, fowling, and hunting of wild beastes for his food, having no more of his great Army left him, but Summeris, Hanton, and Wiltshires only, neither yet them free from the incursions of the Danes.

(11) The solitary place of his most residency, was an Island inclosed with the two rivers Thame and Parret, at their meeting in the Countrey of Summeris, commonly called Edlingesley, where he in very poore attire disguised, was encartered into a Cowherds house (if not into his service, where on a time as he saw by the fire in trimming of his bow and shafts, a cake of dow baking upon the hearth before him chanced to burn; the Cowherds wife comming in, and seeing him mind more by his bow then his bread, in a great fury cast away both his bow and arrows, and checking him as her Groom, said, Thou fellow, dost thou see the bread burne before thy face and wilt not turne it? and yet art thou glad to eat it before it be half baked! little suspecting him to be the man that had bene served with more delicate cates.

(12) But this Prince, the very mirror of Princes, more minding the wealth of his subjects, then the majesty of State, disguised himselfe in the habit of a common Minstrel, and in person repaired to the Danes Campe, who lay like Jenachides, wallowing in wantonnesse, and secure in their owne conceit from impace of danger, which Elfred a most skillfull Minstrel, and an excellent Poet, did not a little egge on by his sweet musick, and kings of their valour; so that hee was suffered to passe uncontroled into the company of their Princes, at banquets, or else where: whereby he both saw their negligent security, and by diligent observance learned the designs that in their counsells they extended.

(13) Returning to his comfortable company, he told them the condition of the hostile Campe, and how easie it was to recover againe their decayed estates; whereupon shewing himselfe to his subjects, unto whose sight nothing could be more joyous, on the suddaine set upon the carelesse Campe of the Danes, and made thereof a very great laughter, to the great terror of others in other parties, that had accounted him dead long since.

(14) Habba, that had harried the English, and now rowzed upon the newes of King Elfreds victory and life, with thirty three ships sailed from Wales, and arriving in the mouth of Tam, where it falleth into the Severn Sea, assaid to take there the then strong Castle called Kennish, unto whom the Danish men gave battle, and slew eight hundred and eighty persons of their retinue; where the Danish King Habba, whose corps being there interred under a great heap of cropped flowers, gave name to the place, and was called Habbeflowe. Here and then was taken the Danish most esteemed Treasure, called Resan, wherein a Raven was portrayed wrought in neede-work, (so African Ateneensis reporteth) by the three sisters of Habba and Hunger the daughters of Leatherbreake (that is Leather-breath) the Dane: In regard whereof, as also for the opinion of good lucke, as they took it, it was cast born before them in their wars.

(15) These adarte proceedings of the Danes designs, especially falling when the game was neere woane, made them suspect, how fure soever the ball lay to hand, yet fortune would serve it in the end to their losse: for Elfred now stocked unto upon carys side, beganne to build fortresses behind his backe, and forward to march with his conquering sword: whereupon the Danes sent him for Peace, and delivered him hostages, upon assurance that they meant as they spake: The conditions were, that their King should receive Baptisme, and the great Army of the Danes quietly to depart out of the land.

(16) Whereupon Garmond or Guthrum the Danish King repaired to the new built Castle of Edlingesley unto King Elfred, and in the place then called Alre, was washed in the laver of Baptisme, whom Elfred received for his God-son by the name of Aethelstan, and gave him in free gift the Countrey of East-Angles. In the same fountain of Grace (saith Simond Dunelmensis) thirty of the chief Danish Nobility were initiated: upon whom the true Christian King Elfred bestowed many rich gifts: And that the limits of the English might be free from their incursions, thus the confines of King Elfreds kingdome were laid forth, as we find it in the end of those Letters that Elfred published, whose words are these: Let the bounds of our Dominions stretch from the river Thames, and from thence to the water of Lea, run unto the head of the same water, and so forth straight unto Bedford: and finally, going along by the river of Ouse, let them end at weatling forest.

(17) But so farr were the Danes from performance of covenantes, that in this eighth year of King Elfreds reign, and the eight hundred fienemy aitered after Christ, this Garmond and his company wintered at Chippenham in Wiltshire, and a new supply of these Papans (known by the name of the Wenings) winned at Fulham neere London; yet after upon better advice, the one went into their assigned circuit, and the other other departed to the realme of France, and so to his twelfth yere the land tooke some rest, that had been kept long waking by the loud sound of warre.

(18) In the yere of Grace eight hundred eighty five, these last retired Danes finding France not fitting their purpose, returned into Kent, and put into Medway, where on his East side they began a fierce siege vnto the City Rochester, before whose gate they built a strong Castle: Thither King Elfred halied, before whose power these Danes could not stand, but were forced to their shippes, and backe againe into France.

(19) Whereupon the King remoued his siege vnto London, whence all the Danes fled (as Volucres abide not the presence of the Lion) the inhabitants reioicing to see the face of their King: which City he committed to their former liberty and beauty, and committed the custody thereof vnto Etheled Duke of Mercia, that had married his daughter the Lady Etheled, whose title the King had maintained against Colvolphus, made King thereof by the Danes. Whereupon both Kent, the South-Saxons, and West-Saxons came willingly, and submitted themselves to King Elfred. Fornham battell

(20) But in the one and twentieth of his raigne, and of Christs Incarnation eight hundred ninety two: those roring Danes returned out of France, & againe arrived in Kent in the mouth of the river Limen, with two hundred and fifty shippes, which they drew foure miles into the great wood, then called Andredes weald, and there destroyed a Castle that stood for defence, building another more strong at Apulder, wherein they kept. At the same time likewise entred one Hasting, a Nobleman of Normey, with eighty shippes, but with a fairer shew hee intended, for hee sent his oath vnto Elfred not to annoy any part of his dominions, and withall his two sonnes to be baptized: which King Elfred accepted, himselfe becoming the Godfather of the one, and Duke Etheled of the other; and both they, and his Ambassadors returned with rich gifts. Against these Fenish invaders, King Elfred fought a great battell at Fornham, nere vnto Arlisford, wherein he wounded their King, and forced his Army to flee ouer Thames, in passing whereof, through ouermuch haile, and great fear many of them were drowned, and they that escaped, fled to a Island called Breckley inclosed about by the river Colne.

(21) News thereof being brought into the East, that the Danes from Northumberland had infested the West, and with a strong siege began the City Excester. Elfred left for General his sonne in law Duke Etheled, which he with a strong power went to suppress this rage: who hearing of his coming, brake vp their sieges, and were gone: vpon the advantage of his absence, perished Hasting then wrought, who out of his new built Callicast Beamsfield, made spoile of the Kings people, and forraged all the Country before him. Whereupon Duke Etheled assembled a power, and first assailing his well stored Castle, tooke thence his wife and two sonnes, with exceeding spoiles of gold, siluer and garments; all which were presented vnto King Elfred at his returne to London: who out of his princely magnanimity, sent backe to Hasting his wife and two sonnes, because (said hee) shee was no warrior, and his two sonnes were his God-children: whereupon Hasting repaired his Castle, and ioined with the other Danes that lay at Apulder.

East and West belonged.

(22) Those then that had fled but lately from Excester, in their returne met with other their confors, and rousing about the coast for their prey, fell lastly vpon the ancient City Chesler, which presently they beganne to sicke and burne. But the country inhabitants coming to the rescue, begirt them about with their host, and foecalled the passages of all supply of victuals, so that for want of food, the Danes were constrained to eate vp their horses, and vpon composition thence to depart.

(23) Thence fetching a compass all along the coasts of Wales, in the same yere they arrived in Essex, being the twenty foure of King Elfreds raigne: and in the Winter following, drew their shippes by the Thames into the river Lee, by which they passed in those light Pinnaes twenty miles Northward into the land, and built them a fortresse at the place called Weare, thither forthwith the King repaired, and pitched his tents before his enemies in the same place, who seeing their strength, and the danger of long siege, did that by policy, which power could not so fodainly do: for hee diuided the river into sundrie streames, whereby the Channell was made vnainnigable, and the Shippes bedded in the muddie, lay rather to their annoyance then defence; the former experience of their hunger-starued besiege made the more fearefull to fall into the like; and therefore in great hast departed their fortresse, leaving their wives and children to the mercy of the English. Neither stayed they till they came vnto the borders of Wales, when at Cardiff vpon Seuerne they built another Callicast, and lay there all the next winter.

(24) Long there they layed out, without dislike of their lodgings, and cold entertainments, but that they returned to their wonted spoiles, and diuiding themselves, some to Northumberland and some into East-Anglia, like Locusts eate vp all as they went: whose breath as it were, so infected the aire, that for three yeres following a great mortality raigned both vpon men and bealls, and ended not much before the death of this incomparable Prince: which hapned to the great sorrow of his subjects vpon wednesday the twenty eight of October, when hee had reigned twenty nine yeres and six moneths, of his age fifty one, and yere of Chrill leies nine hundred and one.

(25) The vertues of this Prince are matchable to any that euer reigned before him, and exceed the most that euer reigned after him, both in seruice of God, whose subjects they are, in defence of his Country, which charge they all beare, in providing good lawes, the finewer of Kingdomes, and care of posterities, from which none is exempted.

The day and night containing twenty foure howers, hee delighted equally to three especiall vices, and them obserued by the burning of a taper (six in his Chappell or Oratory, eight howes hee spent in contemplation, reading and prayers; eight, in prouision for himselfe, his repose and health; and the other eight in the affaires of his common-wealth and state. His Kingdome hee likewise diuided into shires, Hundreds and Tithings, for the better ordering and administering of iustice, and for the abandoning of theues, which had formerly increased by the meanes of long warres; whereby notwithstanding the multitude of soldiers continually employed, it is reported that a Viper might trauell alone in his daies through all his dominions, without any violence offered; and that bracelets of gold were hangd in the high waies, and no man so hardy as to take them away.

Hee was a most zealous, and studious protector and provider for the Clergy, Widowes and Orphans, liberal of his goods, wise, temperate and iust, valiant, patient in aduersities, and euer religious in the seruice of God. A most learned Prince, a skillfull Multitudin, and an excellent Poet: the best lawes bestitting his Subjects hee translated into the English tongue: as also the Palterall of Gregory, the history of Beles, and Beatus his conuolation of Philosophy, the Psalmes of David (whose godly raigne hee propoled to himselfe for imitation) hee likewise began to translate, but died before hee could finish the same. And so great a desire had hee vnto learning, that (as Alfredus himselfe witnesseth) he published this Act: We will and command, that all Freeman of our Kingdome, who fewer passing two sides of land, shall bring up their sons in learning till they be fifteen years of age at least, that so they may be trained to know God, to be men of understanding, and to live happily: for, of a man that is borne free, and yet illiterate, we repute no otherwise than of a beast, or a homeless body, and a very fool. And for the furtherance of this his royal intent, comforted with African Metuenus, Grimbold, John Sax and others, neither permitted he any in office in Court, or eliew here, unless he be learned, which incited his Nobles to the earnest pursuit of learned Arts, and to traine vp their children in good letters: his buildings were many; both to Gods service, and other publique vſe, as at Widmſſy a Monastery, at Wincheſter a New-Minſter; and at Shaſtbury a house of Nuns, wherein hee made his daughter Ethelgelda the Abbess. But the foundation of the Vniuersity of Oxford (which hee began in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred ninety five, and whose lectures he honoured with his owne presence) firmoueth all his others, to the continuance of posterities, a liuing spring and grations fountain, whence issue the streames of all knowledge, that abundantly haue watered both this and other kingdomes.

(26) His body was first buried in the Cathedral Church of S. Peter at Wincheſter, vnder a faire Monument of most pretious Purphoy, afterwards because the lewd-religious Chanons put it out to work some feat of their vſual impoliticke) that his Ghost did waik every night from house to house both it and the Monument were taken vp, and by his son the Kings command (in detestation of those forceries) removed into the Church of the new Monastery: and lastly, his body, Monument, Church and Monastery, were taken thence and removed without the Northgate of the City, since called Hyde.

(27) Some alledge that the malice of those Chanons against him, was for displeasure that he placed ouer the a rude Swineheard named Denerphus, whom he made their Bishop; but the ground of that allegation seemeth vnwarrantable by the relation of Wigornensis, & also of T. h. Radborne, the first of which saith, that Elfred caused him to be trained vp in learning, and the later, that after long study, he attained to the degree of a Doctor of Divinity in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and was afterward made Bishop of Wincheſter by the King. For doubtlesse at that time the Bishops of Rome had not deſeuered our Kings of that prerogative.

His Wife.

(28) Elfrith the wife of King Elfred was the daughter of Ethelred surnamed Muchel, that is the Great, an Earle of the Mercians, who inhabited about Gaueſborough in Lincolnſhire: her mother was Edburg a Lady borne of the Blood-royall of Mercia. She was married vnto this King in the twentieth yeare of his age, being the second of the raigne of his brother King Ethelred, and was his wife twenty eight yeares, and liuing after him foure; died in the yeare of grace nine hundred and foure, and was buried in the Monastery of Nones which hee had founded at Wincheſter, out of which afterwards King Henry the first took to his wife Maud and the daughter of Malcolm King of Scots, by whom the royal blood of the ancient Kings of England became vniued to the Normans, whereby he wanne much loue of the English nation.

His Issue.

Edgar, the eldest sonne and second child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfrith, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers raigne, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred twenty one: hee was brought vp in his Fathers Court, and carefully attended, and intrusted by men of great vertue and knowledge, in learning, and in all other qualities, and exerciſes conuenient for Princes. He was married, and had diuers children: hee was thirty yeeres of age before his Father deceased, and then hee succeeded him in his Kingdom and Monarchy.

Ethelward, the second son, & fifth and last child of King Elfred and Queene Elfrith, was borne about the midle of his Fathers raigne, and about the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and eighty. Hee was in his youth by his Fathers appointment, and for the example of other young Nobles brought vp in the study of good Arts, at the vniuersity of Oxford, where (saith T. h. Radborne, and the Annals of Wincheſter) he became a man very learned, and a great Philosopher: he had of his Fathers gift by his last Will great linings in the Counties of Deuon, Somerset, South-Hampton: he proued a man of great iudgement and wisedome, and liuing vntill he was about forty yeeres old; hee died the sixteenth day of October, in the two and twenty yeare of his brother King Edward raigne, Anno nine hundred twenty two, and was buried at Wincheſter.

Elfrida, the eldest daughter and first child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfrith his wife, was married to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, who in respect of this marriage was suffered to haue all roiall iurisdiction ouer that Countrey, in as ample manner as the Kings thereof had enioied; and after the deſeale of her husband, which happened in the yeare of our Lord nine hundred and twelue: she continued the gouernement in the same sort eight yeeres, with such resolution and valiant resistance of the common enemy (the Danes) that the flood her brother Edward ingreat stead, as in the relation of his life shall be further shewed. She died the fifteenth of Iune nine hundred and nineteene, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Glouceſter, leaving issue, a daughter, named Elfrith, whom King Edward her brother deſtined of that Duchy, which her owne mother enioied, and he his crowne by her assistance.

Ethelgelda, the second daughter and fourth child of King Elfred and Queene Elfrith, was neuer married, but tooke vpon her the profession and vow of Virginity, and was by her fathers appointment made a Nunne of Shaſtbury in the Countrey of Dorset, in the Monastery there founded by him: who is also accounted the first of the Towne in Welle. Shee was afterward Abbess of the house, and therein spent, and ended her life, and was there also buried.

Elfrida, the youngest daughter, and child of King Elfred (and Queene Elfrith his wife, was married to Baldwin the second, surnamed the Bald, Earle of Flanders, sonne of Earle Baldwin the first, and Queene Tadith his wife, the widow of King Ethelræſſe her Grandfather. Shee was bis wife thirty yeares and more; shee suruiued him and was a widow eleven yeeres, she died the seventh of Iune, in the yeare of our Lord nine hundred twenty nine, being the fift of the raigne of King Ethelſtan her Nephew. She is buried by her husband in the Chappell of our Lady, within the Monastery of S. Peter at the City of Glouc. She had issue Annaſſe the third Earle of Flanders, progenitor of all the Earles of Flanders since his time, & Adalſſe Earle of Burgoyne and Torin.

EDVVARD SVRNAMED THE ELDER THE TWENTIE FOVRTH KING

OF THE WEST SAXONS, AND TWENTY FIFT
MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSE.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

An.Dogol.

O greater were the griefes conceived for the death of worthy Ælfred, then were the hopes of the people in his sonne Prince Edward, whose valour had bene often approved against the raging Danes, & whose vertues were both many and princely; not so learned as his Father, neither so patient to vndergoe his chance; but as glorious in martiall prowesse, and as fortunate in al his fights, vnder whose hand the Danes every where fell, and vnder his Monarchy all the English did sleepe excepting the Northumbrians.

(2) He entred his raigne the yeare of Christs nativity, nine hundred and one, and at Kingston vpon Thames was crowned and anointed with holy oyle. The Danish warres continuing in a faccious manner, fell as it were hereditarily from the Father vnto the Sonne, and ripened daily towards their wished harvest. Besides Ethelwald the sonne of Ethelbert, the vnckle to this King Edward, young at his fathers decaie, and therefore perhappes held vncapable of gouernement, shewed now the blossoms of vnder-fucking plants, whose fruits are neither plectuous nor plicant in tall; for his humours euer working vpon discontents, drew his thought onely how to make the possessor fall.

(3) He then entering action of rebellion, tooke the towne of Winton neere vnto Bath, and besides the allegiance due to his Prince, in sacrilegious manner brake the helis of holy Church, in deflowering and taking a Votarist to wife: Edward the elder so called, (it may be in regard of this his Opposite) with a selected Army repaired to Bath, and thence prepared for the field: whose fight was so cockatrice-like to his

cofen-Germans eye, that in the night he bade his Nus and Wiborne adew, posting to Northumberland, and proffering his seruice to the Danes that lay for aduantage of rapine and spoile.

(4) Him as a fitt instrument they created their King, and forward in hope of some prosperous successe, passed through the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, and the Mercian Countries: and laden with robberies came to Crikelade in Wiltshire, whence they departed ouer Thames to Basingstoke and harrying the land before them, with triumph returned vnto East-Anglia. Edward thus endangered by these dreadfull euemies, gaue them no aduantage by lingring delays, but followed their tract vnto Saint Edmunds Ditch, whence in his returne, the Danes gaue him bataille, and obtained the victory, though bought with the liues of Ethelwald and Cochrim their Kings, and losse of many English, which made Edward the readier to enter a truce with them about the lift of his raigne.

(5) That the English were most expert for war in these daies, is witnessed by their resilience of those sturdy Danes, against whom the Commons many times with victory fought, without either King or Captaine to guide them: and they were likewise famous in other lands: for about this time it was, that the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Gothes, besieged the great City Argilla in Barbarie, which they wanne with such slaughter of the enemy, and spoile of the towne, that for thirty yeares after it lay desolate without inhabitants, whereby it was hoped that the Saracens would haue departed Europe, as Isaiah Las after hath told vs, who according to the Saracens doth refferre this siege to the three hundred and foureteenth of Mahomet Regia, which meeteth with the yeare of Chrills Nativity, nine hundred and fwe.

(6) The trace yet lasting, the Danes in Northumber-land were nothing quiet, to taily whole irruptions King Edward lent a great power, who harried the Country before them, and with much slaughter returned victorious. These dalliances of Fortune made the Danes very desperate, and therefore to stay the rowling ball before it should passe their goale, they gathered their powers & entered Mercia, where with victory and spoile they raged for a time. But Edward to aid Ethelred his brother in law, and Earle of that Province, mustered his men, and at Wodenfeld neere Wrotham-hampton in Stafford-shire gaue the battaile, wherein the English so behaued themselves that the two Pagan-Kings Canutus & Hæthelwite, the two Earles For and Scafa, besides other Nobles & Commons innumerable they flew: and now the clouds of these temperatures being driven backe, King Edward Monarchy ascended the Horizon, and the Sunne of his power beganne to shine very bright, therefore he seeking to hold what he had got, let his thoughtes to secure his towne with Castles and walles of defence.

(7) These his proceedings caused him to be both beloued and feared; but his mind full free from any ambitious pride, as may appeare by the intercoure betwixt Leolin Prince of Wales and himselfe, wherof Wals. Map. an. maketh mention as followeth. What time Edward the Elder (saith he) lay at Austline, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Bethelley intending a Party, Leolin refused to come thence, or to craue the Seaunce: whereupon Edward tookt boat and entered the river towards him, when when Leolin saw, and knew who she was, he e off his such robe wherewith he was clad, and which hee had prepared for that small assembly, and entered the river breakt-up, where clasping the boat with an robe, hee submissively said: Most wise and sage King, thy humilitie hath overcome my inferiour, and thy wisdom triumphed over my folly; come, gett upon my necke which I haue (saith as I am) lifted up against thee, so shall thou enter into that land which thy beynie midwinters hath made thee owne this day: and after he had taken him upon his shoulders, he would needs haue him sit down upon his small roole, and so putting his hands roundly one his, did him homage.

(8) In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, as Henry Huntington hath it, Ethelred Earle of Mercia, who had married Edigea King Edward first, departed this life, he having borne him one onely daughter named Edgwen, whose trauell in childbirth was so grievous, that euer after the forbore the nuptiall imbracements of her husband, alledging that it was an ouer foolish pleasure, which brought with it so great paines; and thereupon changing the wonted affection of her sex from the bed vnto battaile, gouerned Mercia eight yeares after her husbands decease, as another Zenobia, and did not a little assist her brother in his warres: for the Welsh he pursued as farre at Brecknock, which he tooke with their Queene: from the Danes hee wonne the Conney of Darby, and assaunting the towne vpon them, put her selfe in great danger; for enterprising to enter the Gate, she was resisted by whole multitudes of Danes, notwithstanding, she persisted, & got entrance, in which encounter many died, and foure of her chief men of war, being Wardens of her person came full by her side were slaine.

The Danes in Yorkeshire he constrained to bee at her deuotion, so that some of them became her subiects, some vowed to attend in her aide, and some promised to be prest at her dispose. Her policie in warre proved euer the fust; her counsell of State was regarded with the wisest, and her prouidence in building, and repairing Cities for the weale publick, or fortifying places for munition of warre exceeded others: which shee extended vpon Chester, Tamworth, Lichfield, Stafford, Warwick, Shrewsbury, Ludlow, Redbury, Sinsbury, Runcorne, Strawberry-Bridge and others.

This renowned Lady giuing place vnto Nature,

(9) The last battaile of this King against these vassilate enemies, was in the Country of the East Angles, wherof Edrick the Dane was King, for hee intending new warres with the English, sought to incite other Danes to his aide, wherof Edward hauing intelligence, preuented his purpose, by his sodaine approach into those parts.

Edrick therefore hauing all in a readinesse, rashly encountered with his enemy, and fought a fierce battaile to the great losse of his Army, and damage of his life; for returning to his Court after so foule a diffamiture, became odious to his owne subiects, who violently fell vpon him and murdered him, and them selves brought low by ciuill diffention were shortly made subiect to the English King Edward, and that Kingdome with Mercia, ioined vnto his West-Saxons. And now hauing raigned in great warres and honour the space of twenty foure yeares deceased at Feringdon in Berke-shire, the yeare of Christs incarnation, 924, and was buried in the new-Monastrey of Winchester, which his Father beganne, and himselfe wholly finished.

His Wives.

(10) Egwin the first wife of King Edward, was the daughter of a meane Gentleman named Brecher, whose eye-pleasing feature and alluring beauty made her to be educated aboue the degree of her birth, and was brought up by the nurse of King Edward in tender affection and great cheere. It chanced Prince Edward in kindnes came to visite his nurse, where seeing the admirable beauty of the Maide, fell so farre in loue, that he tooke her to his wife without the consent or knowledge of his father: In which regard he is reputed by some Writers rather than his Cousine then his Queene, no other cause mouing them but her meane parentage, and secret making and keeping of this marriage, although there bee some good histories and many likehoods to induce that he was his lawfull Queene.

(11) Edigea the second wife of King Edward, was the daughter (as Matthew of Westminster reporteth) of an Earle named Ethelwode, and after the Bishop of Sherborne maketh mention of an Earle in Wiltshire among the West-Saxons of the same name, who was in great fauour with King Elfred, the father of this King, by whom hee was sent Ambassador to carry his Almes to Stephen the six, of that name Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of our Lord 887, and by all probable conference of name, time, and place, hee seemeth to bee the man that was father to this Queene.

(12) Edgiva, the third wife of King Edward, was the daughter and heire of Earle Sigolue Lord of Acepham, Culings, and Icanham in Kent, who was slain in battaile against the Danes, Anno 927. She was married vnto King Edward about the fourteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace, 916. She was his wife ten yeares, and after his death she liued a widow all the times of the raignes of King Ethelred her sonne in law, of King Edward, and King Edred her owne sonnes, of King Edwy her Grand-child, and was living in the Raigne of King Edward another of her Grand-children, almost fortie yeares after the death of her husband. It is writ of her that in the yeare of Grace, 959. Shee offered her lands and endowes to Christ vpon his Altar at Canterbury. Shee deceased the twenty fifth of August in the fourth yeare of the said King Edgar, and of Christ, 963.

His Children.

(13) Ethelflan, the eldest sonne of King Edward, and the Lady Egwin, was borne and growne to good yeeres in the time of the raigne of his Grandfather King Elfred, who with his owne hands gaue him the order of Knighthood, after a very honourable man-bet of creation, as William the Monke of Malmesbury, a great observer of such things, hath left in writing: who reporteth, that he put upon him a Purple Robe, and girt him with a girdle wrought with pearly, and a Saxon sword in a leasard of gold, hanging at the same. He was the Successor of his Father in the West-Saxons dominions, and the English Monarchy.

(14) Edfred, the second sonne of King Edward and the Lady Egna, is warranted by the testimony of the Bory of Hyde, to have been loved of his Father above all his other children, that he caused him in his owne lifetime to bee crowned King, and to sit with him in his Seat of Estate, as his Partner in the Kingdom, and that he enjoyed that great honour but for a small time, deceasing shortly after his creation, and long before his fathers death; and was buried in the New Monastery at Winchester, which afterwards was removed to Hyde.

(15) Editha (whom the Scottish Writers call Beatrice) the daughter of King Edward and the Lady Egna, with great honour was married to Sydrick, the Danish King of Northumberland, in the first yeere of the reign of her brother King Ethelstan, being the yeere of grace 915. Within one yeere after her marriage, her husband deceased, and his sonne Gutfrid succeeded him in his Kingdom. Wherefore the forsaking that Country, obtained of her brothers gift, the Castell of Tamworth, in the County of Warwick, where she began a Monastery of Nuns, and therein lived, and was interred, and both the Monastery and Body afterwards was removed from thence unto Pellefworth.

(16) Edward, the third son of King Edward, &c. the first of Queene Etheldas his second wife, was born, as it seemeth, about the beginning of his Fathers reign. He was carefully brought up in the study of Liberal Arts, and in all other princely qualities, so that it was expected he should have succeeded his Father in the Kingdom; but presently upon his fathers death, he deceased himselfe in Oxford, and was buried as one time, and in one place with him in the New Monastery at Winchester, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 924.

(17) Edwine, the fourth sonne of King Edward, and the second of Queene Etheldas his second Wife, was very young when his father was buried, and his brother Ethelstan was crowned. Now in standing a deep idolotie possitting the King, that his title was too neere the Crowne, he caused him to be put into a little Prison, without either Tackle or Oares, one only page accompanying him, that his death might be impured to the waters: whence the young Prince outcome with griefe, and notable to murther his owne passions, cast himselfe headlong into the sea, and his dead body being driven upon the coasts of Flanders, was taken up by Adolph, Earle of Belaine, his cozen-germane, and honourably buried in the Monastery of Saint Bertin, in the Towne of S. Omers. Which fact was much lamented by King Ethelstan, who generously punished the fuggellions of his owne idolotie, and the procurers of his brothers death; lending great thanks to the Earle that buried him, and rich presents to the Monastery which entombed him, and to appease the ghost of his innocent brother, built the Abbey of Antidunum in the County of Durset.

(18) Etheldas, the second daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Etheldas his second Wife, entered into the orders of Religion, and tooke upon her the profession and vow of Virginity, in the Monastery of Rumsey, situated upon the River Tyff, in the County of Southampton. In which Monastery, she was first a Nunne, and afterward Abbess during the whole time of her life, which was there spent and ended, and her body in the said Abbey buried.

(19) Egna, the third daughter of King Edward, and the second of Queene Etheldas his second Wife, was the second Wife to Charles the third, furnished the Simple King of France, son to King Lewis the brother of Judith, Queene of England before mentioned. She had issue by him Lewis the third, furnished Be-yard, because he was brought up here in England with his Uncle King Ethelstan; and Giles Duchesse of Normandy married to Edw. the Dane: who in regard of his marriage, was allowed to be the first Duke of that Country. This Queene furnished King Charles her Husband; and afterwards was remaried to Herbert, the younger Earle of Fernandis; which marriage was taken for so great an indignity, because Earle Herbert the elder, father to this Earle, had caused the King her Husband to die in prison, that King Lewis her sonne presently purified her, apprehended, and committed her to the strict custody of Queene Gerberge his wife: so as shee had no recourse unto him, nor issue by him.

(20) Etheldas, the fourth daughter of King Edward, and the third of Queene Etheldas his second Wife, followed the example of her elder sister Etheldas, and became a Nunne in the Monastery of Wilton, which was sometime the head Towne, giving name to the whole County of Wiltshire, and anciently called Eldunden.

(21) Editha, the fifth daughter of King Edward, and the fourth of Queene Etheldas was married to Hugh furnished the Great, Earle of Paris, Grand-maister and Constable of France, in the yeere of our Lord 926. being the third of her brother King Ethelstan his reign. This Hugh was the sonne of Robert, brother to Edw. King of France, and father of King Hugh Capet, progenitor of the Kings of France, ever since unto this day: but she died before him without any issue by him.

(22) Edgitha, the sixth daughter of King Edward and the fifth of Queene Etheldas, was the first wife of Otho the first, furnished the Great, Emperour of the West, sonne to the Emperour Henry, furnished the Falconer. By him he had issue Ludolf, Duke of Swabia, William Arch-bishop of Metz, Landgrave married to Conrad Duke of Lorraine, and Atchold Abbess of Quedlingburg in Saxonia: in which Citie she deceased the seven and twenty of August in the yeere of Christs Nativity 947. the eleventh of her husbands Empire, and the first of her brother King Edreds reign in England. She was buried at the East end of the North side of a Chappell which her selfe had founded in the same Citie.

(23) Edgna, the seventh daughter of King Edward, and the sixth of Queene Etheldas his second Wife, was by King Ethelstan her brother, with her sister Edgitha sent to the Court of the Emperour, Henry the first King of the Saxons in Germany, who honourably entertained her, brought her up with his owne daughters; and after he had married her elder sister to his eldest sonne, he placed her also in marriage with a Duke of Italy about the Alps, who is not named of our Writers, but may easily be conjectured by the honourable disposition of the maker of the match, to have been a Prince of note and account, worthy of her estate and parentage.

(24) Edmond, the fifth sonne of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgna his third and last Wife, was borne in the twentieth yeere of his fathers reign, being the yeere of the worlds salutation 921. and at his fathers death little more then three yeeres of age, was notwithstanding by the careful provision of his mother, brought up with all princely education convenient for his yeeres and estate, inasmuch as there was generally a great expectation amongst the people conceived of him in the life of his brother King Ethelstan, under whom he learned some experience of service in warre, and after whom hee succeeded in the Kingdom of England.

(25) Edred, the sixth sonne of King Edward, and the second of Queene Edgna his third Wife, and the youngest sonne of them both, was borne about the two and twentieth yeere of his fathers reign, and yeere of grace 921. which was not long before the death of his father, who left him a little infant in the custody of his mother, by whom hee was carefully brought up, and prooved a Prince of so great vertue and valour, as after the death of King Edmund his brother, in regard of the minority of his Nephews, hee was with the generall consent, and liking of the whole nation, chosen to be his brother's successor in the kingdom and government over them.

(26) Edburg, the eight daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgiva, in her child-hood had her disposition tried, and her course of life disposed by her Father in this manner: he laid before her gorgeous apparrell, and rich Jewels, in one end of a chamber, and the new Testament and Bookes of princely instruction in the other, willing her to make her choice of which she liked best: the presentlyooke up the bookes, and hee in his armes, and kissing her said, Go in Gods name whither God hath called thee, and thereupon placed her in a Monastery at Winche- ster, wherein shee did most virtuously spend her whole life, and in that Abbey was buried.

(27) Edgiva, the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the second of his last Queene, whose name shee bare, is reported in the history of the Monastery of Hyde by Winchester, and other Writers of our Country, to have beene married to Lewes Prince of Aquitaine in France, which not long before had beene a Kingdome of it selfe, sometime allotted to the portion of Lewes the third sonne of the Emperour Charles the Great, of which house it seemeth this Lewes was; afterward it became a Dukedome, and the possession of an other Family by whom it came to be the inheritance after the Conquest to the Kings of England, which were descended of the house of Angvers.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward (as hath beene said) for the great hopes conceived of him, was crowned with a greater solemnity then any of his ancestors euer before him. The place was Kingston vpon Thames in the County of Surrey, the year of Christ Iesus 924, where, in the midst of the towne a high Scaffold was built, and thereon the coronation performed to the open view of all, by Archbishop of Canterbury, with shouts of ioy at that of Salomon.

(2) His beginnings were with troubles, and that rather by reason of friends then force of foes: for it is recorded, that Elfred a nobleman, either in fauour of King Edward or other sonnes, holding Ethelstan a Bastard, or else vpon an ambitious hope blinded of him-

selfe, intended at Winchester to haue plucked out the eyes of his Soueraigne: but his treason being knowne, before the deed could be wrought, he was apprehended & sent to Rome to purge himselfe by oath: where, before the Altar of S. Peter and Pope John the tenth, he there abjured the act, and thereupon fell sodainly down to the earth, so that his seruants tooke and bare him into the English Schoole, where, within three dayes after he died: the Pope denying him christian buriall vntill he knew King Ethelstan pleasure.

(3) These stormes ouerpast, as great a cloude seemed to arise vnto Ethelstans light, whose eye of icalousie euer followed the ascent, and his care euer opened vnto the insallations of Parasites, amongst whom his Cup-bearer was a chiefe, who brought daily more and more suspicion into the Kings head, that lastly (as wee haue shewed) hee consented to young Edwin death, though with too late a sorrow hee repented the same: for besides his fauour years penance voluntarily vndergoe, to pacifie

the ghost of his betrayed brother, hee built the two Monasteries of Melbury and Melbury, as for the most part such seed-plots were ever sown in the furrows of blood, which happened upon this occasion: It chanced his Capteuer in his seruice vpon a festival to stumble with the one foote, and recovering himselfe with the other, pleasantly to say, you see how one brother helpeth another; vpon which speech the King with griefe and touch of heart, called to mind the death of his innocent brother, and forthwith commanded execution to be done on him the procurer, to repay his fact with defructed death: & himselfe was ever after more tender and careful towards his other brethren, with a more respectiue regard, and belloved his sisters most honorably in marriage, as hath bene said.

(4) At his entrance of government, to discharge the expectations of his subjects, hee endeavoured both by warres and alliances to make them strong and rich. First, therefore entering friendship with Sutricke the Danish King of Northumberland, vpon whom with condition that hee should receive Baptisme, he belloved his sister Eldis in marriage, he bent himselfe to ordaine Lanes for the weale publicke, & those to bind awei the Clergie as the Leyes, out of which first sprang the attachment of Fellons, to take hold of such as stole aboute rueles penes, & were aboute twelve yeares of age.

(5) But Sutricke the Northumbrian dying the first yeare of this marriage, and his Queene returning to a religious life, his sonnes Godfrey and Anlaf, offended that their Pagan-Gods were neglected, and onely by the meanes of this their fathers last wife, stirred the Northumbrians to disquiet the English, which occasioned Ethelstan to invade their country, and forced Anlaf into Ireland, and Godfrey into Scotland, which last he wrought with Constantine their King, that he undertooke to side in his quarrell, with whom joined Harold King of Wales. There in a fierce battle hee outcame and constrained them to submit themselves to his will, who knowing the chance of warre to be variable, and pitying the case of these down-cast Princes, restored them presently to their former estates, adding wishall this princely saying, that it was more honour to make a King then to be a King.

(6) This notwithstanding, the case of Godfrey so mooved the spirit of King Constantine, that he againe assisted him in his inroad into the English part, which drew againe Ethelstan into the North: & coming to Torkshire (as he was a man much devoted to God-worsh) turned aside to visite the tombe of S. Iohn of Beverly, where earnestly praying for his prosperous successe, for want of richer Jewels, there offered his knife, vowing that if hee returned with conquest, hee would redeme it with a worthy price, and thus armed with hope, proceeded forward pitching downe his tentes at Barnesbury, his nauie waffling along those fens.

(7) To the aide of Constantine came Anlaf, called by writers King of the Tribes, and of the Fles, who had married his daughter, a man no doubt both hardy and desperate, as appeared by the Action hee underwent; for it is recorded, that as Elfred the English had attempted to know the State of the Danes: so this Dane at this place did to understand the English: disguising himselfe like a Harper, hee went from Tent to Tent, and had access even into King Ethelstan's presence, vntill hee had learned what he most desired, and then returned againe to his Campe, which part of his was no bolder, or more wisely performed, then was kept secret, and after revealed by a most faithfull souldier: for Anlaf departed & free from pursue, this Souldier made the act known to King Ethelstan: who being fore displeased with his enemies elcape, imputed the fault vnto him the reneger: but he replying, made him this answer: I once served Anlaf (said he) vnder his pay for a souldier, and gave him the same faith that I doe now vnto

you; if then I should have betrayed his desires, what trust could your Grace repose in my truth: let him therefore die, but not through my treachery, and by his escape secure your royall selfe from danger, reuenge your Tent from the place where it stands, let it vnrepent hee happily asseure you.

(8) The King seeing the faith of his souldier, was therewith pacified, and forthwith commanded his Tent to be removed, where presently a Bishoppe new come to his Campe pitched vp his owne, and the night following both himselfe and retinue were slaine by the same Anlaf that fought the Kings life in assailing the place, and preising forward came to his tent, who awaked with the foddain Allarum, boldly rushed vpon his enemies, & encouraging his men, put them backe with the death of five petty Kings, twelue Dukes, and well nere of the whole Army, which Anlaf had brought.

(9) The memory of this man is made the more lasting by a peece of ancient Saxon come of silver, inscribed with his name, ANLAF CYNNE, which for the antiquity of the thing, and honour of the man, we haue here imprinted, & placed though in the texture of our English Saxon King.

(10) To leane a memoriall of King Ethelstan's great victory, I giue me leaue to write what I find, namely, that nere vnto the Cattle Dunbar in Scotland, hee praying that his right vnto those parts might be confirmed vnto posterities by a signe, at one blow with his sword stroke an elle deepe into a stone, which stood so close a long time after, and vndoubtedly was the whetstone to the first Authors knife: but this is most certain, that hee ioued Northumberland to the rest of his Monarchy, and returning to Beverly redeemed his owne knife.

(11) From hence he turned his warres into Wales, whose Rulers and Princes hee brought to bee his Tributaries, who at Hereford entered covenant to pay him yearly twenty pound weight of gold, three hundred of silver, and twenty five hundred head of cattle, with hawkes and hounds to a certaine number, towards which payment by the statues of Harold Dha, the King of Aberfraw was charged at sixty six pounds, the Prince Dinawre, and the Prince of Pewry were to pay the like summes.

(12) The Brittaines, which to his time with all equall right inhabited the City of Excester with the Saxons, hee expelled into the further pomeuary of Cornwall, and made Tamur the confines of his owne Empire; so that his dominion was the largest that any Saxon before him had enioied, and his fame the greatest with all forraigne Princes, who fought his friendship both with loue and alliance, by marching with his sisters, and presenting him with rich and rare presents; for Hugh King of France besides other vnestimable Jewels; sent him the sword of Constantine the Great, in the hilt whereof (all couered with gold) was one of the nails that fastned Christ to his Crosse: he sent likewise the speare of Charles the Great, reputed to be the same that pierced Christ's side, as also part of the Crosse whereto hee suffered his passion, and a peece of the thorny Crowne wherewith his blessed Temples were bearded, and with these came the Banner of S. Maurice so often spread by Charles the Great in his Christian warres against the Saracens: And from Otho the Emperour, who had married his sister, was sent a vessel of precious stones artificially made, wherein were scene Lanslops with vines come, and men, all of them seeming to naturally to move, as if they had growne and retained life: And the King of Norway sent him a goodly shippe with a galle sterne, purple sailles, and the decke garnished all with gold.

(13) Of these accounted holy reliques King Ethelstan gave part vnto the Abbey of S. Swithun in Winchester, and the rest to the Monastery of Malmesbury, whereof Adelme was the foundet, and his Tutelar Saint, in honour of whom he bestowed great immunities vpon the towne, and large endowments vpon the Abbey; hee new built the monasteries of Wilton, Macheliffe, and Middleton, founded Saint German in Cornewall, Saint Petrus at Bodman, the Priory of Filton, new walled and beautified the City of Exeter, and enriched every famous Abbey in the land, either with new buildings, Jewels, Books, or Reuenues.

(14) As also hee did certaine Cities with the Mintage of his money, whereof in London were eight houles, at Winchester sixe, at Lewis two, at Hatfield two, in Hampton two, in Warham two, in Chichester one, in Rochester three, two for the King, and one for the Bishop; at Canterbury sixteen; foure for himselfe, two for the Archbishop, and one for the Abbe, although it appeareth the Archbishop had his before the raigne of this King. For among these ancient Saxon-Coines we find one of Cuthbertus, who saith there Archbishop in the yeare 831. which both for the antiquity & authority of truth wee haue here inferred.

(15) This Prince King Ethelstan was of an Indifferent stature, not much exceeding the common sort of men, chearefull in countenance, his haire verie yellow, and somewhat flooped forward as he went, for valour inuincible, in resolution constant, and for his cunctie beloued of all he reigned in great honour the space of fifteene yeares and odde monethes, and decreed in the City of Gloucester, vpon wednesday the seuenteenth of October, and was buried at Malmesbury the yeere of Christs Nativity 940. hauing neuer had wife mentioned in our histories.

His supposed Issue.

(16) Leone, the supposed daughter of King Ethelstan, is reported by John Rous and Pepuwick, writers of the mistrasted story of Guy of Warwicke to be married vnto Reynolds Earle of Warwicke, and sonne to the same Guy, whose remembrance and reputation is preferred & kept with no lesse renowne among the common people, for the liberty of England saved by his victory in single combate against Colbrand the Dane, then was Heratius the Romane for the preferatiō of Rome, whose historie I will leaue for others to enlarge that haue more leasure & better inuention.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

An. Do. 940.

Edmund the fifth soane of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiva his third and last wife, at the age of nineteen yeeres succeeded his brother King Ethelstan in his kingdome, and Monarchy: hee began his raigne the yeare of the worlds saluation 940. and with great solemnity was crowned at Kingston vpon Thames, in the fifth yeare of Ordo the first Emperour of that name, and his brother in law: his valour had often bene tried in the warres of King Ethelstan against those stout and sturdy eunies the Danes, Scots, Irish, and Welshmen, that often had assaied to disturbe his peace.

(2) Aethelstan deceased, and the crowne scarce set vpon King Edmunds head, but that the Danes in Northumberland, disliking subiection, called again Anlaf out of Ireland to be their King: who now in the infancie infancy of Edmunds elace, with great power of men purposed to subdue all before him; but Edmund as forward, with full resolution ment to keepe what was got, and so gathering his power; proceeded towards the North, and at Leicester encountered with the Danes: howbeit, through the interceding of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Odo and Walston, the matter was mitigated before it came to the vttermoſt.

(3) The next yeare of his raigne, the said Anſe (whom some hold to haue benee the King of Norway) being dead, an other Anſe, ſonne to King Sithric, of whom we haue ſpoken, intruded vpon the Kingdom of Northumberland. Theſe heads, as Hidra, ſpringing vp each after others, drew King Edmund againe into the North, who raging like a prouoked Lion, lobbard, as he went, thoſe townes where the Danes kept, and got from them Lincolne, Leiceſter, Darbie, Stafford, and Nottingham, compelling them to receiue Baptiſme, and to become his Subiectes; ſo that the Country was wholly his vnto Humber. Theſe his proceedings cauſed Anſe and Reinold the ſonnes of the Danish Cornes, ſubduers of York, to yeeld themſelues wholly to his deuotion, offering him ſubiectiſon, and withall to receiue the Chriſtian faith; for performance whereof, they likewiſe receiued Baptiſme, vnto whom King Edmund was Godfather, to Reinold at his Confirmation, and to Anſe at the Font: but how ſoone they fell from both, the ſpell ſhewed; for caſting off the faith and fealty thus promiſed, they ſtirred the Northumbrians to another rebellion, yet with no better ſucceſſe then deſert; for they were forced into a perpetuall exile, and King Edmund adioined that Country to his owne government, withoutt the admittance of any Secondary or Vice-roy to rule there vnder him.

(4) Cumberland alſo, which ſeldome was quiet, hauing bene a Kingdome entire of it ſelfe, and now aided by Leolin King of Southwales, he vtterly waſted; and apprehending the two ſonnes of Dunmail King of that Prouince, commanded the eyes of thoſe out-bold Princes to be puld out, and gaue their inheritance to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold the ſame by fealty from him. Thus by power and policie clearing thoſe coaſts whence the ſharpeſt ſtormes had continually blowne, hee returned into the South, and there ſet himſelfe to ordaine lawes for the good of his people, the which, 'leſt time the conſumer of all things might chance to obliuete, were by the labours of the learned Lambert tranſlated into Latine, and imp rinted in the yeare 1568. next, to ſhew his loue to God, and bounty to his Church, he gaue the towne of Saint Edmundsbury with the liberties thereof, wholly to that Marry, and to the Monks that lived in ſeruing at his Altars.

(5) But as each thing hath his ſpring, growth, & decay; ſo all men their dates, howſoeuer eminent in degree, & the ſhank of their Compaſ ſo ſet in a center that the Circle of their lines are oftentimes abrupt, before it be drawn to the full roond: for ſo with others, we may ſee in this Monarch, who being ſafely returned from many great dangers of war, at peace in his Pallace, came to a lameable & vncexpected end: for at his Maſoor of Palekerkes in the County of Glouceſter, whiles hee interpoſed himſelfe betwene his Sewer and one Lenne to part a fray, was, with a thruſt through the body, wounded to death the twenty fixt of May in the yeare of our ſilurion 946. when hee had proſperouſly raigned the ſpace of ſixe yeares and ſeuene moneths, and his body, with no leſſe ſorrow then ſolemnity, was buried at Gleſtrebo.

His Wife.

(6) Elfgine, the onely wife of King Edmund, hath not her parents declared (for ought I find) by any of our Writers: but this is affirmed, that hee was married vnto him in the fixt yeare of his raigne, which was the yeare of Grace 940. and that ſhe was his wife foure yeeres & vppward, after whoſe ſlaughter ſhe remained a mournfull widow all the reſt of her life, which ſhe ſpent with ſo great vertue and opinion of the people, as by the writers of that age ſhe is commended to poſterity by the name of a Saint.

His Iſſue.

(7) Edwy, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and Queen Elfgine, his wife, was borne in the ſecond yeare of his fathers raigne Anno 942. When his father died, hee was but foure yeeres of age, and in reſpect of his minority was not permitted to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, but forced to giue place to his vnckle Edred, vnder whom he liued nine yeares; and in the tenth, his vnckle being dead, and himſelfe then growne to the age of thirteene, was admitted to the ſucceſſion of the Monarchy.

(8) Edgar the ſecond ſonne of King Edmund, and of Queen Elfgine, was borne in the third yeare of his fathers raigne, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 943; and was but three yeeres old when his Father died; notwithstanding, hee promed afterward a Prince of great expectation, and in the ſecond yeare of King Edwy his brothers raigne, being then but fouretee yeeres of age, he was choſen King by the Mercians and Northumbrians, both which people hee governed vnder the title of King of Mercia, for the ſpace of ſeuerall yeeres before his brothers death, and then ſucceeded him in the whole Monarchie.

EDRED THE TWENTIE SEVENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTIE EIGHTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, AND ISSE.

CHAPTER XL.

An. Do. 946.

Edred, the sixth Sonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiva his third and last wife, at the age of twenty three yeeres succeeded his brother King Edmund in the monage of his children in al his dominions, and was the twenty seuenth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentie eight Monarch of the Englishmen. He began his raigne in the yeere of Mans saluation 946. and was annoiued, and crowned at Kingston vpon Thames in the County of Surrey vpon Sunday the seauenteenth day of August by the hands of Odo Archbishop of Cantebury.

(2) His Coronacion robes scarily put off, news was brought him that the Northmerians had revolted and stirred a dangerous insurrellion, notwithstanding the Covenants that his brother Edmund had made with Malcolme King of the Scots to secure the same. Therfore lest delays might proue dangerous, with a great Army hee entred into the verge of Scotland, without sight of enemy, or any resistance. But peace being concluded betwixt Edred, Malcolme and the Northmerians, yea and the same confirmed strongly by oath, yet was it little regarded of the last named furies; for no sooner was Edred returned, but that they sent into Ireland for Anlaf, the sonne of Gorme the Dane, who had beeu expelled the Country as we haue said.

(3) Anlaf gathering a heere and forces accordingly, came into Northmerland, where he was with great ioy receiued and made their King, which title hee maintained for foure yeeres continuance, banding against Edred, and still holding him play, till lastly the Northmerians disloyal to both, took their feather out of Anlaf his plume, and sent him packing to the place, whence he came, electing one Har-

ricus King in his stead.

(4) Edred awaked with the waits that they made, prepared a iourney into those parts, where with fire and sword hee bare downe all before him, and albeit he was a man religiously bent, yet spared he not the Abbey of Rippon from flames, but laid all vnto ashes as he went, the enemy not daring to shew the face. In his returne suspecting no perill, suddenly an host brake out of York, and fell vpon the Rere-ward of his Army, marching but carelessly, and brokes out of their array, whereby many perished before any complete order of resistance could be made. The King seeing this bold attempt of these Rebels, stroke downe his standard, turning his face againe to the North, and threatened the reuenge, with the Countries spoile and their lines.

(5) In this plot of sedition Wulfstan Archbishop of York had sowne some seed of treason, both in the assistance of action, and counsell for the enterprise, very ill becomming a man of his ranke: this Wulfstan therefore hazing thus awaked the Lion from rest, was the onely man that fell in his pawes; for the Northmerians expelling their baselesse Heretic with fulminant teares and golden showers, spozified the King, that their offences were therewith cleane washed away: but this good man (a Saint at the last) was mied up in prison (against whom accusations daily came, and namely, that he had commanded fardry of the Burgesies of Tewkesbury to bee slaine) where hee abode till he was by Edred vpon a reuerent regard of his calling, releafed from thence; for as this King is commended for his lenity towards the vertuous, so is he no lesse for his iustice towards the vicious, and for the practise of his Religion, as forward as any, suffering not onely his manners to be reproofed and corrected, (a quality truly roiall, and best becomming Princes) but also so much below the pitch of soveraigne Maisty) his body to bee chastised at the will and direction of Dunstan Abbot of Glascubury, vnto whose custody, he also committed the greatest part of his treasure and richest iewels to be lockt in his chests, and vnder the keyes of this Monastery.

(6) The stately Abbey of Mitch at Abington neere Oxford built by King Tuas, but destroyed by the Danes, he newly repaired, indowing it with lands & faire reuencues, and confirmed the Charters with scales of gold: hee also ordained Saint Germanus in Cornewal to be a Bishops See, which there continued till by Canutus it was annexed to the Episcopall See of Kyrtan in Deuon, both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confessor translated to the City of Excester: but sith the brightest day hath his night, and the highest tide his present ebbe, what maruail is it, if then Edred in the middelt of his strength were seized vpon by sicknesse and death, which surprised him after hee had reigned in great honour nine yeeres and odde moneths, to the great griefe of his Subiects, who solemnly interred him in the old Minster within the City of Winchester, the yeere of Christ Iesus 955. whose bones with other Kings, to this day are preferred in a gilt Coffre, fixed vpon the wall in the fourth side of the Quire.

His Issue.

(7) Elfred, the sonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King; neither find I mention of his Mocher, or any aft by him done; onely in the first yeare of King Edred his raigne, which was the yeere of Grace, 952. he is mentioned for a witness to his Fathers grant of lands in Wittenham, to Edelwolves Duke of England in thole daies, as appeareth by the Charter thereof, bearing date in the yeere afore said.

(8) Therfrid an other, and as it seemeth an elder sonne of King Edred, was borne before his father was King, without any mention also of his Mother, who lining in the second yeare of his fathers raigne, namely Anno, 948. was written for a witness in the same yeare, to his grant of lands in Bedelesing, to Cuthred one of his Barons, the Charter whereof is extant to bee seene vnto this day.

EDVY THE TWENTIE EIGHTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND

TWENTIE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER XLI.

Edwy, the eldest sonne of King Edmund, after the decease of his vnkle Edred, succeeded him in his dominions, and was the twentie eighth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentie ninth Monarch of the Englishmen: he began his raigne in the yeare of the worlds saluation, 955. and was annointed & crowned at Kingston vpon Thames, by the hands of Otho the 23. Archbishop of Canterbury.

(1) Yong hee was in yeares, and vicious of life, if the Monkish Story-writers of those times his deadly enemies may be credited, not past thir-

teene when he entred gouernment, and that begun with a capital sinne: for they report, that vpon the solemne day of his Coronation, and insight of his Nobles, as they sat in Counsell, with shamelesse and vnprincelike lust, he abused a Lady of great estate, & his neere kinswoman, whose husband shortly after he slew, the more freely to possesse his lechituous pleasure: and to fill the penne of his further infamy ready to their hands, that wrote his life, hee was a great enemy vnto the Monkish orders (a fore in thole dayes very tender to be touched, and may well be thought the cause of many false aspersions on him,) whom from the Monastery of Malmesbury Glascubury and others, hee expelled, placing married Priests in their roomes: Danstan likewise the Abbot Saint of Glascubury hee banished the Realm, for

for his over-bold reprehensions; if not rather for retaining the treasure deliuered him by King Edred, and demanded againe in his sicknesse; when by the voice (forsooth) of an Angell from heauen, his journey was staid, and those rich Jewels not deliuered the King in his life, I will not say kept backe, left Dunstan with Balaam (whose stories are not much vnlike) should bee thought to follow (as he did) the wages of deceit.

(3) Howsoever, the reuerent opinion of the Monks single life, and the conceiued holines of Abbot Dunstan in those misty times, did daily counterpoize young Edwy in effeeme, which made his best acts construed, and recorded to the worst, inasmuch that his Subjects minds, ebbing as the Sea from the full, drew backe the current of their subiectiue affections, and set the eye of obedience vpon Prince Edgar his Brother: and albeit his young yeeres may seeme to cleare him from the imputation of so lustful a fact, as he is charged with, at the day of his assuming the Crowne, and the separation from his wife, (as too neere in consanguinity) wrought griefe enough in his distressed heart, yet pitilesse of his estate, and carelesse of their owne allegiance, the Mericians with the Northumbrians did vterly cast off obedience, and sweare their fealty to Edgar, not fully fourteene yeeres aged: Edwy then reigning in a still decaying estate, was held of such his Subjects, in no better esteeme, then was Ishuram of Judah, who is said to haue liued without being desired: for very griefe whereof after foure yeeres raigne hee ended his life, the yeare of our Lord 959: whose body was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Mide at Winchester, erected without the Wall in the North of that City.

His Wife.

(4) Ethelgine, the wife of King Edwy, was a Lady of great beauty, and nobly descended, yea, and by some deemed somewhat too neare in the blood roiall, to be matched with him in spousall bed: her fathers name is not recorded, but her mother was Ethelgine, whom some scandalized to haue bene his Concubine, and the onely cause of Dunstan banishment. The Subjects disliking of this vnlawfull marriage, & further instigated by the Monkes, (whose humorous pleasures, or displeasures could very much sway the state in those daies,) failed by degrees to performe their duties to their King, and her they likewise enforced to a separation, in the third yeere of his regardlesse government, and of Christ Iesus, 958. without other mention of her life or death.

EDGAR SVRNAMED THE PEACEABLE THE THIRTIETH
MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XLII.

Edgar, the second son of King Edmund hauing reigned two yeeres ouer the Mericians and Northumbrians, in the dayes of Edwy his Brother, to the great impairing of King *Edwy*s reputation and effeeme; after his death at sixteen yeeres of age was cholen to succeed in all his dominions, and was the thirtieth

Monarch of the Englishmen, or rather now of whole England, all other titles of Kingdomes falling vnder his scepter, and becoming Provinces annexed vnto his absolute Monarchie.

(2) He beganne his raigne in the yeere of Christs Nativity, 959. and was crowned (as some write) the same yeere at Kingston, vpon Thamesis, by Orso Archbishop of Canterbury. But Randolphus Higden in his Polychronicon, referreth it to the twelfth yeere of his raigne: William Monke of Malmesbury to the thirtieth yeere of his age, and the Saxon Chronicle of Worcester Church, to the yeere of Christ, 972; and that in the City of Bath, hee was annointed and consecrated with great solemnity by Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury.

(3) The raigne of this King is said to have bene altogether in a calme tranquillity, and therefore hee was furnished the Peaceable, his vertues were many, and vices not a few, the one gloriously augmented, and the other fairly excus'd, by those Monkish writers, vnto whose professions he was most fauourable: his Guides were Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, Ethelwald Abbot of Glastonbury, and Oswald Bishop of Worcester, three stout Champions against the married Clergie, (for women in those dayes were great bugs in their eyes,) therefore the married Priests hee displaced, & brought in Monks of single life to possesse their roomes, whose liues of incontinency grew after to be great, as the world did then witness, which caused Trensis the translator of Hyden, to blame King Edgar, charging him to be lewdly moued in following their counsell against married Clerks.

(4) So doe Malmesbury and Hyden taxe him with too fauourable affections towards the Dames, who dwelled alike in eury town with the Englishe, though formerly they had sought the destruction of all, and still lay in wait attending for the spoile of his true subjects, who age enough vnto cull, turned the beauly sinne of quailing, and emptying of cups, which King Edgar was enforced to redresse, by enacting a law against excessive drinking, ordaining a fine by certayne pennes in the pot, with penalties to any that should presume to drinke deeper then the marke.

(5) His policie was no lesse prudent (but much more successefull) for the destruction of Wales, that in his daies did great annoyance to the land; for the tribute imposed vpon the Princes of Wales by the Englishe King Ethelstan (as we haue said) be wholly remitted, and in lieu thereof appointed certayne numbers of Wolues yearly to bee paid, and Leauf, or Lage Prince of North-Wales, did for his part pay him yearly three hundred, which continued for three yeeres space, but in the fourth was not a Wolfe to bee found, and so the tribute ceased.

(6) His Naine royal, containing three thousand and sixe hundred shillings, hee diuided into three parts, appointing eury of them to a severall quarter to waite the Seas and secure the coasts from Pirates, and forraine enemies, wherein himselfe eury summer would faile with those in the East parts, vnto those in the West, and sending them backe to their charge, would with the West faile into the North, and with the northerne flecte compassie againe into the East, whereby the seas were sowerd, and his Kingdom exceedingly strengthened.

(7) The like custome vsed he in the winter season in his kyalls, and circuits throughout his Country, so to take account of the administration of his lawes, and the domeinour of his great men, especially of his Iudges, whom severely he punished, so often as he found the execution of their places ballanced either with bribery or partiality; so that there was neuer lesse robbery, deceit or oppressions, then in the raigne of this worthy King.

(8) His state thus flourishing in peace and prosperity, hee caused diuers Princes to bind themselves vnto his allegiance, but perchance it may iustly be doubted, whether in such performance of homage and seruice, as Malmesbury, Florentius, Randolphus, Mercurius, Homerus, and other writers affirme to haue bene at the City Chesler, where (they say) Kennadie King of Scots, Malcolm of Cumberland, Maximus an Arch-Pirate, with the petty King of Wales, Duffnell, Gottifrid, Hauall, Jacob, and Indulth, did wth their owne row his Barge vpon the river Dor, from his Pallace to Saint Iohns Church, and thence againe backe to his Pallace, himselfe the while steering the helme, and saying in his glory that then his forefathers might trulie account themselves Soueraigne Kings of England, when they caryed such a Prerogative of sublimity, and supreme honour: although (saith M. Fox) he might much better, and more Christenlike haue said, God forbid that I should reuer, but in the Cradle of our Lord Iesus Christ.

(9) Warres hee had none in all his raigne; onely towards the end, the Welshmen moued some rebellion, which to prevent, hee assembled a mighty Army, and therewith entred into the County of Glamorgan, sharply punishing the ringleaders thereof, but his souldiers doing great harms in the country, laden with spoiles for the returne, the King out of his bounty commanded all to be againe restored, whereby hee purchased singular loue and honour of the inhabitants.

(10) To his magnanimity was ioined much deuotion, but most especially towards the Monks, for whom, and for Nunnes hee built and repaired forty leuen Monasteries, intending to haue continued their number vnto fifty, as himselfe testifies in the words of his his Charter.

The Monasteries of all Monks as of Virgins haue bene destroyed, and quite neglected throughout England, which I haue now determined to repaire to the glory of God for my soules health, and so to multiply the number of Gods seruants and handmaides: and now already I haue set vp forty seuen Monasteries with Monks and Nunnes in them, and if Christ spare me life so long, I am determined in offering my diuinitie sacrifice to God, to proceed to fifty, even to the last number of a laboure.

And by this his Charter did not onely approve the enlargement of S. Maries Monastery in Worcester and the restoring of Varities in stead of married Priests, but himselfe either new founded or repaired many others, as the house of Ely, Glastonbury, Abington, Burgh, Thorney, Ramsley, Wilton, Wenton, Winborne and Thameslocke with great cost, and large endowments, hauing the Clergie in an high and reuerent esteeme, and most of all his Countesse for Dunstan: but with this wheate, there were tares growing, though the late Monkish Writers bind them vp for good corne: for some men tell (saith Randolphus Hyden) that Edgar in his beginning was cruel to Citizens, and lecherous to maidens, whereof these his actions ensuing beate sufficient witness.

(11) The first was committed against the virgine Welfield, a sacred Nunne as some affirme, though others fowm haue maligning that sacrilegious offence, haue reported, that she to avoid his filthy and lasciuious lust, was forced to take the habite of a Monachion vpon her, and in the same brought to his bed, when in the chaff S. Edith was begot, and for whom, say they, hee underwent his seuen yeeres penance without the wearing of his Crowne.

(12) A like offence hee committed against the virgine Ethelfleda, the daughter of Ordmar a Duke among the Engl-Angles, who for her surpassing beauty was furnished the White-ro whom hee begat his eldest sonne Edward, for which fact as M. Fox affirmeth, hee did his seuen yeeres penance in prison by Dunstan: and indeed by Otkene it appeareth, that Edward was not legitimate, where he writeth, that the child begotten of the harlot, hee baptized in the holy fontaine of regeneration, and so gaining his name to be called Edward, did adopt him to bee his sonne. With whom agree Nicholas Trivet in his Englishe story, written in French, Iohannes Paris in his French story, written in Latine, both of them calling Edward a sonne illegitimate, as also doth Phocasius and Antoninus, howbeit William of Adamalbury, Mathew Paris, Mathew of Westminster, Randolphus and others, will haue her his first and lawfull wife, and Edward a true matrimony to haue descended from them.

(13) An other instance of his lasciuious life in produced by the forenamed Writers, and thus both occasioned and acted. It chanced Edgar to heare a Virgine and daughter to a Westerne Duke, exceeding dingly praised for her incomparable beauty, the touch of which firing from his care refused to his heart, and as it drew him presently into those parts; where coming to Andreas, commanded the damself to his bed: The mother tender of the Virgins honour, brought in the darke her maid, but not her daughter, who, all as well pleased the King in his sinfull dalliance: the day approaching, this late laid maid made haste to arise; but the King loth to part yet with his supposed faire Lady, demanded why she made such haste? who answered him, that her task was great, and hardly would her worke be done, if day should prevent her ere the rose; but yet being blaid about her howre, upon her knees she made this humble Request, that she might be freed from her frowde dame, alleading, it was not fitting, that the woman who had talied the pleasures of a Kings embracements, should endure a servitude vnder the rule of any other. The King perceiving the deceit, and therewith moued to wrath, yet could not recall what hee had done (or rather undone) and therefore turned his copricined wrongs vpon a sick; but so, that hee both sharply checked the deceiver, and kept this damself, (whose night-work and pleasure had fully wonne him) for his Concubine, whereby the rule them that lately had the command of her and to wife the words of Nathan, hee loued this Concubine most entirely, keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time hee married for his lawfull wife Elfrida the daughter of Duke Ordgarus.

(14) His last lasciuious Act, was as David ioyned with blood, and wrought in manner as followeth. Fames lauish report of beauteous Elfrida (the paragon of her sexe, and wonder of Nature) the only daughter of Ordgarus Duke of Deuonshire, sounded so loud in those Westerne parts, that the Echo thereof was heard into King Edgars Court, and eured his eares, which euer lay open, to giue his eyes the scope of desire, and his wanton thoughts the raines of wilk: to trie the truth whereof, hee secretly sent his minion or favourite Earle Ethelwald of East-Angles, who well could iudge of beauty, and knew the diet of the King; with Commission, that if the Pearele proved so orient, it should beesteed for Edgars owne wearing, who meant to make her his Queene, and Ordgarus the Father of a King.

Ethelwald a iolly young Gallant, posted into Deuonshire, and guest-wise visited Duke Ordgarus his Court, where seeing the Lady furpassing the report, blawed Fames over-light for founding her praise in so base and leaden a Trumpet; and wholly surprised with her looe, himselfe beganne to wooe the Virgin, yea, and with her Fathers good liking, soas the King would giue his assent. Earle Ethelwald returning, related that the maide indeed was faire, but yet her beauty much augmented by babling reports, and neither her feature or parts any wise befitting a King. Edgar mistrusting no corniall in his looe, nor dreaming false fellowship in wooing, did with a slight thought passe ouer Elfrida, and puche his affections the fatter another way. Earle Ethelwald following the game now a foot, desired Edgars assistance to bring it to a stand, pretending not so much for any liking to the Lady, as to raise his owne fortunes to be her fathers heire, to which the King yielded, and for his minion solicited Ordgarus, who glad to be shrowded vnder the fauours of such a favourite, willingly consented, and his daughters destinies assured to Earle Ethelwald.

The marriage solemnized and the fruits thereof a short time enjoyed, the fame of her beauty beganne againe to bee spread, and that with a larger Epithite then formerly it had bene: Whereupon Edgar much doubing of double dealing, had his angle faire to take this great gull; and bearing no shew of wrong or suspect, inuited himselfe to hunt in his Parks, and forthwith repairing into those parts, did not a little grace his old seruant, to the great ioy of

Ordgarus the Duke: but Ethelwald mistrusting the caule of his coming, thought by one policy to disappoint another: and therefore recasting the truth to his wife, how in his proceedings hee had wronged her beauty, and deccared his Soueraigne, requested her louing assistance to face now his endangered life, which lay in her power, and of the meanes hee thus aduised:

"Like as (said he) the richest Diamond cough and vncut, yields neither sparkle nor effluence of great price, nor the gold vnburnished giues better luster then the base brasse; so beauty and feature clad in meane aray, is either slightly looked at with an vnfix'd eye, or is wholly vnregarded, and held of no worth; for, according to the Prouerbe, cloth is the man, and man is the wretch: then to prevent the thing that I feare, and is likely to proue my present ruine, and thy last wracke, conceale thy great beauty from King Edgars eye, and giue him entertainment in the meanest attires: let them (I pray thee) for a time bee the nightly curtaines drawne about our new-Nuptiall bed, and the dayly cloudes to bide thy splendent Sonne from his sharpe, and too too piercing light, whose vigour & raies will soone set his waxen wings on fire, that ready are to melt at a furre hotter heat. Pitch (thou seest) desist the hand, and we are forbid to giue occasion of euill: vaine then thy fairenesse with the scarres of deformity, from his oner-lust and vnmaistered eye; for the fairest face draws euery gaze, if not the attempts, and natures endowments, are as the bulke for the wine, which being immediately taken doth surfeit the sense and is a gaine cast vp with as loathing a taste. Of these dredd drunke Amass after his fill of fine Thomy, Herald of Anthony, & Emm of Didon yet, and not to lette examples fyre off, King Edgars variation in his vnstedfast motion doth easily bewray it selfe: for could either holy Walffild, beautiful Ethelred, or the wanton Wench of Andreas, keepe the needle of his compasse certaine at one point nothing lesse, but it was filld by the loadstone of his eart mutable and turning affections. But thou wilt fay, hee is religious, and by founding of Monasteries hath expiated those finnes. Indeed many are built; for which time and posterities may thanke holy Dunstan, from whose deuotion those good deeds haue sprung: but is thy person holier then sacred Walffild, thy birth and beauty greater then Ethelred the White, daughter also to a Duke? the former, of an holy Votary, hee made the sinke of his pollution; and the latter is branded to all ages, by the barefall name of a Concubine, and her sonne among vs esteemed for a Bastard. These should bee motives to all beauteous and vertuous Ladies, not to sell their honours at so low and too-late repented a price. Neither think (sweet Connetesse) that thy husband is ienious, or suspects thy constancy, which I know is great, and thy selfe wholly compleate with all honourable vertues: but yet consider I pray thee, that thou art but young, & mayst easily be caught, especially of him that is so old a Master of the game; neither perswade thy selfe of such strength, as is able to hold out so great an assault; for men are mighty, but a King is much more. I know thou art wise, and enough hath been said, onely let mee add this, that euill beginnings haue neuer good ends, and so with a kind kisse, hoping hee had wonne his Wife to his Will, prepared with the first to welcome King Edgar.

Lady Elfrida thus left to her selfe, began seriously to thinke vpon this Curtaine Sermon, whose text she distilld, being taken out of an ouer-worne and threed-bare cloth prouerbe, as though her fortunes had been wholly reiding, and altogether constiaing in her parentage and apperell, but nothing at all in any parts of her selfe.

"Hath my beauty (thought she) been courted of 12 and now must be hid? Muſt I falſitie and bely Na-13 tures bounties, mine owne value, and all mens re-

14 ports, only to ſave his credit, who hath impaired
15 mine, and belied my worth? And muſt I needs de-16 ſoule my ſelfe, to be his only faire ſoule, that hath 17 kept me from the State and fear of a Queene? I 18 know the name of a Counteſſe is great, and the 19 Wife of an Earle is honourable, yet no more then 20 birth and endowments haue assigned for me, had 21 my beauty been far leſſe then it is. He warnes me of 22 the end, when his owne beginnings were with tre-
23 chery: yet he the examples of others, but obſcures
24 none himſelfe: he is not ſelous, forſooth, and yet I 25 muſt not looke out; I am his faire, but others pitch 26 fire, wine, buſh, and what not? Not ſo holy as Wol-
27 ſeld, nor ſo white as Ethelred, and yet that muſt now 28 be made far worſe then it is. I would men knew the 29 heate of that cheeke wherein beauty is bla-30 zed, then would they with leſſe ſuſpect ſuffer our 31 faces vntameth, to take aſſe of their eyes, and wee no 32 whit condemnable for ſhewing that which cannot 33 be hid, neither in me ſhall come of it what will.

And thus reſolving to bee a right woman, deſired nothing more then the thing forbidden, and made preparation to put it in praſtiſe. Her body the endowed with the ſweeteſt balme; diſplayed her haire, and beſpangled it with pearles, beſtrewed her breſts
and boſome with rubies and diamonds, rich Jewels glittering like ſtarrs depended at her necke, and her other ornaments every way ſutable. And thus, rather Angell, then Lady-like, ſhe attended the approach and entrance of the King, whom with ſuch faire obediſſance and ſolemly grace he receiued, that Edgars gre-die eyes preſently collecting the rakes of her ſhining beauty, became a burning glaſſe to his heart, and the ſparkle of her faire falling into the traine of his love, ſet all his ſenſes on fire: yet diſſembling his paſſions, he paſſed on to his game, where hauing the faire E- thelred at advantage, he ranne him through with a laſtine, and tooke faire Elfrida to his wife.

(15) Theſe were the vertues and vices of this King, little in perſonage, but great in ſpirit, and the firſt vneſtled Monarch of the whole Land, whom all the other Saxons acknowledged their ſupreme, without diſſion of Provinces or title. He reigned ſixteen yeeres and two moneths in great tranquillity and honour, and died vpon roſeday the eighth of July, the thirty ſeventh of his age, and yeere of Chriſt 975.
whoſe body with all ſuneral ſolemnitie was buried in the Abbey of Gleſſenbury.

His Wives.

(16) Ethelſeld, the firſt wife of King Edgar, was ſurnamed in the Saxon Engliſh Eneba, in Latine Ce- caſſida, which with vs is White, becauſe of her exceeding great beauty. Shee was the daughter of a Duke amongſt the East-Angles, named Ordmar, and was married vnto him the ſecond yeere of his raigne, and the eighteenth of his age, being the yeere of Chriſts Natiuitie 961. She was his wife not fully two yeeres, and died the fourth of his raigne, in Anno 962.

(17) Elfrida, the ſecond wife of King Edgar, was the widow of ſlaughtered Ethelred, of whom wee haue ſaid. She was daughter to Ordgarne, and ſiſter to Ordulfe, both of them Dukes of Deuonſhire, and the Founders of Tauſſieke Abbey in that Countie: a Laddie of paſſing great beauty, and as ambitions as faire;
for after the Kings death, ſhe procured the murder of King Edward her ſonne in law, that her owne ſonne

Ethelred might come to the Crowne: and afterwards to pacifie his and her firſt husbands gholt, and to ſtop the peoples ſpeeches of ſo wicked a fact, ſhe founded the Abbeyes of Ambreſſery & Wharwell, in the Counties of Wulſſore and Sauſh-hampton.

His Children.

(18) Edward, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edgar and Queene Ethelſeld his firſt wife, was born in the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne, and a little before his mothers death, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 962. He was a child diſpoſed to all vertue, notwithstanding great meanes was made by his mother in law for the diſinhering of him, and the preſerment of her owne ſon
to the ſucceſſion of the Crowne: yet by provident care taken in the life time of his father, he ſucceeded him after his death, as right heire both of his kingdome and conditions.

(19) Edmund, the ſecond ſonne of King Edgar, and the firſt of Queene Elfrida his ſecond wife, was born in the ſeventh yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace 965. He liued but foure yeeres, and died in his infancy, in the twelfth yeere of his fathers raigne, and was honourably entered in the Monaste-rie of Nunnes at Tauſſie in Hampſhire, which King Ed- gar had founded.

(20) Ethelred, the third ſonne of King Edgar, and the ſecond of Queene Elfrida his ſecond wife, and the laſt of them both, was borne in the eighth yeere of his fathers raigne, and yeere of ſituation 966. He was ver-ruſſouſly inclined, beautilfull in complexion, and comly of ſtature; at the death of his father being but ſeuen yeers old, and at his brothers murder ten; which deed he ſore lamented, to the great diſcontentment of his mother, who for his aduancement had compromiſed the ſame, and wherein at thoſe yeeres he vnwillingly ſucceeded him.

(21) Edgah, the naturall daughter of King Edgar, had to her mother a Lady named Walſeld, the daughter of Walſelm, the loane of Wyrding, the ſonne of Ne- ſing, the two latter bearing in their names the memo-rie of their fortunes: the laſt of them being found in an Eagles neſt, by King Elfred as he was on hunting.
This Edgah was a vailed Nunne in the Monastery of Wyrdin, and according to ſome Authors, made Ab-beſſe thereof by her father at ſixteen yeeres of age, ſaith her Legend. She died the fifteenth day of Se- ptember, the yeere of her age twenty three; the ſixth of her brother King Ethelred his raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus 984. By all which accounts it is manifeſt, that ſhe was borne before Edward, and by Maſter Fox proved, that for him, and not for her, King Edgar did his ſeven yeeres penance. She is greatly commended for her chafitic and beauty, which later ſhe ſomewhat ag-mented with more curious attire then to her profeſ-ſion was beſeeming: for which Biſhoppe Ethelſeld
ſharply reproveth her; who answered him roundly,
that God regarded the heart more then the garment,
and that ſins might bee cooered as well vnder rai-gs as robes.

This Edgah, as Iohn Capgrave reporteth, after the ſlaughter of her brother Edward, the holy Archbiſhop Dunſlas would haue aduanced to the Crowne, & in-neſted her againſt Ethelred the lawfull heire, had hee not by the late experience of Edward ſhe fall, vterly reſuſed that title, which neither belonged to her right, nor was ſafe for her perſon to vnderake. Her body was buried at Wilton, in the Monastery and Church of Saint Deniſſe, which her ſiſter had cauſed to bee built.

CHAPTER XLIII.

An.Do.975.
Edward the Martyr.

Great were the troubles & findings that presently ensued the death of King Edward, about the election of one of his sons to succede Queen Efrida with Alferius Duke of Atercia, and many other Nobles combined for young Ethelred, disavowing Prince Edward as illegitimate, and therefore not reputable for succession: against them and Ethelred stood Dunstan and the Monks, holding their lives dangerous, & their new-gotten footing unsafe, if in the sonage of the King, their their opposites should rule all vnder him, whereas Edward was altogether wrought in their mould, & whose title they abetted, as being lawfully borne, and begot in the nuptiall bed of Queene Efrida. Their claims thus banded amongst these Statesmen, began to be diversely affected amongst the Commoners, and had put the game to the hazard, if the wisdom of Dunstan had not scene to the chace; for a Council being assembled to argue their rights, the Archbishop came in with his banner and crosse, and not staying for further debating de iure, did de facto, present Prince Edward for their lawfull King, and the assembly consulting most of Clergy-men, perswading peace, drew the approbation of the rest, and so was the Prince admitted and proclaimed their Sovereigne.

An.Do.975

(2) He beganne his raigne at twelve yeares of age, in the yeare of Salvation 975, and was soone after by Archbishop Dunstan crowned King at Kingston vpon Thames: being the thirtie one Monarch (since Henric) of the Englishmen. His beginning was miserably afflicted with barrenesse of the ground, famine amongst his people, moraine of cattle, and to their further terror, a fearfull Comet appeared:

which men thought to bee signes from heauen, as sent from God, for the sinnes committed against the married Clergy, whose cause was much pursued, especially of the Nobles, & whose complaints of wrongs they intandly urged, that without delists they were expelled from their ancient possessions; a thing which neither God nor goodmen ever allowed, and was contrary to the perscript rule of Christ, that wille vs to doe, as wee would be done vnto: whereto the Monks answered, that Christ respected neither the person nor place, but onely them that tooke vp the Crosse of Penance and followed him, as themselves in their single life pretended to doe. But they good men little knew the incumbrances of wiuing; for otherwise they would haue felt, that the condition of the married, was more truly a suffering of the Crosse, and enduring of Penance.

(3) Their Church men thus diuided and rent, were diversely sided as affection did moue, and their not onely of the meaner sort, but euen of the Nobles & great Ones; for the Atercian Duke Alferius fauouring the iust cause of married Priests, destroyed the Monasteries in his Prouince, cast out the Monks, & restored againe the ancient reuerence to them & their wives: contrariwise, in East-Angles the Priests went to wracke, where the Monks were maintained by the authority of Eadwin their Duke, who in their quarrell, with the assistance of his brother Alfred, and of Brightwells Earle of Essex, raised a mighty Army, and stood with that power for their defence.

(4) The fire thus blown from a sparke to a flame, was feared to moue higher, if not quenched in time, and therefore by mediation, armes laid aside, the cause was referred to be heard in Council, & at Winchester first the assembly was held, where after long dispute, and much against the Monks, it was greatly suspected their side had gone down, but that the matter was referred from them to the Roode, placed vpon on the reſtorative Wall, where the Councell ſate. To this great Oracle S. Dunſon, deſired them devoutly to pray, and to giue diligent care for an anſwere: who, with as great bounty, as they in deuotion, made it not ſqueuiſh to giue them this aduice. God forbid it ſhould be ſo, God forbid it ſhould be ſo (ſaid he,) you ſhould well ſee, and to change that againe is not good.

This was authority ſufficient to ſuppreſſe the Priests, who now with their wives went downe the wind; and indeed too blame they were to ſuſpect this their fudge, who neuer was heard to giue wrong ſentence before: but they vnſatisfied men, thought once more to blow the coale, though therewith they were likely to burne their owne lips; for perſwading the people, that this was but a ſubtile pra-ctiſe of the Ateneis, in placing behind the wall a man of their owne, who through a troucke vttered thoſe words in the mouth of the Reader; it was therefore inſtantly deſired, that the cauſe might once more come to ſpawning.

(5) This laſtly was granted, and a great aſſembly congregated at Glouc in Wiltſhire, whither re-quired the Prelates with moſt of the States of the land, beſides Gentlemen and Commons an innumerable ſort.

This Synode being ſet, and the controuerſie propounded, a hote and ſharpe diſputation enſued, and a while was maintained with many bitter inuecti-ues, ill beſeeming ſuch perſons: But whether through the weakeneſſe of the foundation, or the ouer-pretſe of weight, or both, the ioyſts of this vpper-loſt, wherein the Councell was held, ſuddainly brake, and down fell the ſcore with all the people thereon, whereof many were hurt, and ſome ſlain outright, onely Archbiſhop Dunſon then Preſident, and moſt of the Ateneis remained vnhurt: for the Poſt whereon his chaire was ſet (and not without miracle) ſtood wholly vntouched.

Thus by this fall, ſet the cauſe of the ſecular Priests; and the Monkiſh foundations vnderpropped with more ſurer pillars, Dunſon vnburdened of many imputations, the peoples affections drawne to the Monks, and the Priests at liberty now to accom-pany their wives without any cure, though not without care; and all this was wrought by the providence of Dunſon, and his ſuage preſeruation on the poſts no leſſe wonderfull then that which with the like truth is related of him, how when a huge beam of a houſe was ſuncke out of the frame, and like to ruinate the whole building, with onely making of the ſigne of the Croſſe thereon, with his fingers hee made it returne to his former place: ſo wonder-fully potent was he in ſuch wooden miracles. To which, why ſhould wee not giue credite, ſince the very Harpe which hee had touched could worke miracles? as when of it ſelfe it ſounded melodious-ly that Hymne, Gaudet in celis anima Sanctarum, &c. Yea ſith the bleſſed virgine Mary her ſelfe, is ſaid to haue come to ſolace him with her ſongs, Cantemus Domino Sicut Erre. For, as for Angels ſinging familiarly vnto him, and Diuels in ſhape of dogs, foxes and beeres, whipped by him, that was but ordinary; as likewiſe his making the ſhee-dial to roare, when coming to tempt him to dalliance, in ſhape of a beautifull laſſe, hee caught her by the noſe with hore burning pinners, and ſo ſpoilde a good face. But to leaue thoſe ſignments wherewith our Monkiſh ſtores are ſtuffed to the deluding of their Readers, and diſhonouring of thoſe, whom thereby they thinke to magnifie, let vs looke backe to yong Prince Edward.

(6) Who in all princely parts was an imitator of his Father, and for his modeſt gentleſſe worthily favoured of all men: but as enay is alwaies the at-tendant of vertue; ſo had he them that much ma-ligned his life, namely, the favourites of Prince E-thebert, whereof Queene Elfrida his mother was chiefe, who laſtly betrayed him, and that in this maner.

(7) King Edward for his diſport was hunting in a forreſt vnto the ſea, vpon the ſouth-eaſt ſhore of the County Dorſet, and in the Iland Parbeck, not farre off, vpon a ſmall riuer, ſtood pleaſantly ſeated a faire and ſtrong Caſtle called Elfrida, where his mother in law Queene Elfrida, with his brother Prince E-thebert, were then therein reſiding: Edward that e-uer had bene louing to both, held it a kind office, now being ſo neere to viſite them with his preſence, and thereupon either of purpoſe or chance ſprung from his attendants, hee ſecretly ſtole from them all, and came alone to the caſtle gate.

(8) The Queene who had long laine in wait for occasions, now tooke this as brought to her hand, and therefore with a face as meaning no guile, ſhee humbly and cheerefully gaue the King welcome, de-ſiring him to grace her and her ſonne with his pre-ſence for that night; but hee with thanks reſuſed the offer, as fearing leaſt his company would ſoone find him miſing, and craued onely of his mother a cup of wine, that in his ſaddell hee might drinke to her and his brother, and ſo be gone. The cuppe was no ſooner at his mouth, then a knife in his backe, which a ſervant appointed by this trecherous Queene ſtroke into him; who feeling himſelfe hurt ſet ſpurs to his horſe, thinking to eſcape to his more faithfull company.

(9) But the wound being mortall, and hee fainting through loſſe of much blood, fell from his horſe, and one foot entangled in the ſtirrups, hee was thereby rofully draged vndowne through woods and lands, and laſtly left dead at Caſes-gate: which hapned the eighteenth day of May, after hee had reigned three yeares and fixe (ſome ſay eight) monethes, the yeare of his age ſixtene, and of Chriſt Ieſus 979. His body found, was firſt buried at Warham without all funeral pompe, but after three yeeres by Duke Aſſerus remoued, and with great celeberty entered in the Muſey of Shuſterbury; and for this vntimely death, hee gained the ſurname of Martyr.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ethelred.

An. Do. 979.

1011. Malmesbury. 5 penit. 10 penit.

*E*thelred the sonne of King Edgar, & brother to King Edward the Martyr, at the age of twelue yeers entred his government ouer the Englishmen, the yeere of mans saluation, 979, and was the two and thirtieth Monarch since King Henric: he was crowned King at Kingston vpon Thames the foureteenth of April, being Easter day, by the hands of Dunstan Archbisshoppe of Canterbury, who did it much against his will.

(2) He was a man neither forward in action, nor fortunate in proceedings, and therefore commonly called the Vnready: his youth was spent in idleness, feeding his senses with all voluptuous baies, his middle yeeres with a careless government, maintaining civil dissensions, and his latter end deservingly in continuall reluctance of the blood-thirsty Danes. With these imputations by writers hee is taxed, though we find no such iust cause in recording his life, but to such extremes are euen great Monarches themselves brought, that their breath and dignity once left and laid downe, they are subiect to the censures of every affectionate and malignant reporter. And that this King lay lyable to such mens humors, the working of Dunstan euer against him, is a sufficient witness, who not onely did refuse to ad his Coronation, but would haue preferred Lady Edgib a bastard before him to the Crown, as we haue said. And besides the generall quarrell of the Monkes and married Priests, to which laier himselfe and his Abettors were better inclined; his iust indignation conuincet against the Bishop of Rochester, and that not pacified without the Bishops submission and payment of money, was cause inough for those Monkish Writers to brand the Lords Anointed with their marks of infamie, vnto whom they impute the miseries of those times, and the destruction of the English by the intruding Danes.

(1) These Danes had kept quiet euer since the disliked raigne of King Edgar, without any notable attempts, for the space of twenty two yeeres: but now perceiving the hearts of the subiects to bee drawn from their Soueraigne, they thought it a sufficient occasion to forward their intendement; and omitting no time, in the second of his raigne with seven ships they arrived vpon the coast of Kent, spoiling the Countrey, but most especially the land Thames, from whence they did greue hurt likewise to the towne of Southampton.

The English led in dislike of young Ethelreds government, were the rather drawne to impute these and other aduersities to this vnfortunate Prince, by reason of a prediction of Dunstan, who had prophesied, That they should not be free from blood and sword, till there came a people of an unknowne tongue, that should bring them to therallens: and that opinion was skrewed deeper into their fearefull conceit, by a cloud appearing of blood and fire, immediately after his vnaffected Coronation.

(4) The next yeere, those rousing Danes entred the Wintsh Sea, and confining to Canterbury destroyed there the Abbey of Saint Patrick, Perland in Deuonshire, and many other places vpon those shores, the like was done vnto Cheshire by the Norway-Farotes, which broke into those parts in the same yeere.

(5) And these calamities were seconded with others as fearefull; for in the yeere 982. the City London was miserably destroyed and defaced by fire, whose beauty then chiefly extended from Ludgate wehward, for, that within the walles, and where the heart of the City is now, was then neither beautiful, nor orderly built; what time also raged a sickness till then unknown in England, which was a strong burning fever, and bloody flux, as also scarcity of victuals, and murraine among cattle. This hand of God thus correcting the sinnes of all, was received as sent for the offences of some few, and wholly imputed to the King and his Rulers; Danstan full prophesying further woe to the land, when him selfe should be dead.

(6) The Danes hereupon more boldly assailed each shire, and in so many places at once, that the Engls were to leske, where first to withstand. In the West they were encountered by Gode Earle of Deuonshire, as faith Simon Dunelmensis, by whom they were overthrowne, though with the losse of his life, as also of Sturme, a man of great cieme and valour in those parts, who stroue there vnder him.

(7) In the East their leaders Instone and Guthmond warred with better success; for at Malden in Essex they gaue Brighten the Earle, a great and bloody battaile, wherein him selfe with most of his people were slaine. The Danes thus prospering, more boldly went forward; and where they set their tallants, there they held fast, and lay on the land like unto Grashoppers. These euils King Ethelred could not redresse, his strengthes being small, and his subjects affections lesse; therefore calling to Counsell his Statesmen & Peeres, demanded their aduice what was best to be done. Some few of these proffered the King their assistance, but more of them perswaded vnto a composition, whereof Scriuu Archbishop of Caterbury was chiefe; and in fine, ten thousand pounds paid to the Danes for their depaer.

(8) This golden Mine once entered, was more eagerly digged into, by these still-thirsting Danes, who finding the branch to be profitable at first, hoped the vein in following, would prooue farre more bountifull, and therefore regardless of promise, the next yeere prepared themselves againe for England, and with a great fleet dispatched to sea: the newes whereof stricke such terror into the Engls hearts, that despairing of hope, they accounted themselues the bond-slaves of misery: The King therefore with much adoe prepared a Nasir, whereof hee made Elfrick Earle of Mercia, who setting from London vnto the sea, had power sufficient to put backe the enemy: but hee once a traitor could neuer proue true; for, hauing beene banished, forgiven, and neuer taken into fauour, found meanes to be false, and to betray his charge; and sending the enemy intelligence of his power and intents, gaue the way to their escape; and another fleet of Danes encountering with the Kings, at first hee faintly and faintly fought against; and lastly, turned to their side; through which treason many Englismen died, and the Kings Fleet and power was greatly weakened; but hee escaping due punishment him selfe, left his sonne to answer the fault, whose eyes King Ethelred caused to be put out.

(9) About which time also another Danish Fleet entering Humber, wailed the countries of Torkshire and Lyndsey: against these King Ethelred sent his power, vnder the charge of three valiant but treacherous Captaines, namely, Frena, Goderic and Frederick; for the battie but began, these with their followers fled away, which was the occasion of a great overthrow of the Engls, notwithstanding the country people notable to digest their intollerable dealings, fell vpon the Danes, slew some, and chased the rest. At what time also other of the Danes with ninety foure ships sailed vpo the river Thames, and laid their siege against London, giuing it a great assault; but the Citizens thereof so manfully defended themselves, that they chased the Danes thence to their shame and great losse: yet fell they so foule vpon Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, that the King was enforced to compound a peace, with the payment of sixteen thousand pounds: for confirmation whereof, Ethelred sent to Southampton for Aulaf these Norwegian King, and honourably entertained him at Andover, where the same time hee received Baptisme, King Ethelred taking him to the Font for his God-fonnes, and with great gifts returned into Denmarke without any further harme done to the Engls.

(10) But God and destiny suffering it, (that would haue the Saxons to fall before the Danes, as formerly the Brittans had done before them) no covenant could be so surely made, but was as flackie in the performed; for albeit this Aulaf honourably kept both faith and promise, yet others of his Country continued their inuasions, and as another Hydra shewed their still-reuiuing heads.

(11) For the nineteenth yeare of King Ethelred most troublesome raigne, and of our situation 997. the Danes with a great fleet sailed about Cornwall, and came into the mouth of Seuer, robbing as they went, Deuonshire, Cornwall, and South-Wales; and marching further into the Countie, consumed Lydford, and the Abbey of Saint Ordulf at Essex; thence passing through Dorsetshire with fire & sword, found not a man in the way to resist them, and wintering in the winter liued by spoiles gotten in Hampshire and Sussex.

(12) The next Spring they put into the mouth of Thames, and so by the riuer Medway arrived at Rechefer: thither the Engls with their strengthes repaired, but vnfavourably fought, and left the field to the Danes, who shortly after boyled their sailes, & with a merry gale arrived in Normandy.

(13) King Ethelred thus rid of these his vnlooked for guests, sought to remove those leigers that lay in Cumberland, whither hee repaired, and with sore warre wasted the Countie, before whose sword the Danes were not able to stand; which somewhat encouraged the spirits of his people, and bettered their conceits towards him: but farre this sunne past not without a cloud, nor was his successe enuiable to be fortunate.

(14) For the next yeare, those Danes that departed from Kent, came now from Normandy with their full sailes, and landing in Exmouth, their first and greatest fury was against the City of Exeter, when they heretofore besieged, they were so valiantly beaten by the Citizens, as that enraged above measure with the ignominy of that repulse, they thence as a sodaine flood bare downe all that flood in their way; and then plainly beganne to appeare the rise of the Danes, which euery where lorded it, where they had to doe, and the fall of the Saxons, whose overtopped Monarchy, and weak wailes now wanted props to hold vp the weights for the Captains of the Engls (faith Hyde) wanting lore in deeds of Arms, their direction neuer prospered; if ships were made they neuer sped well, but were either chafed of the enemy, or destroyed by tempest: if the Nobles euer assembled to consult of the State, that time was rather spent in whetting the spleene each against other, than jointly agreeing how to redresse their present danger, or to repress the common enemy: for most of the Nobles were allied into the Danish blood, whereby not onely the secret of those consultations were revealed, but being employed in seruice, many of them reuolted to the enemy. The Clergy as backward as any, denied the King their assistance, pleading their exemptions from warre, and priuledge of the Church, when the land lay bleeding and deploing for helpe, and scandalized all his other proceedings for demanding their aide: to these were ioined scarcity, hunger and robberies. These miseries caused the summes of their compositions to be augmented, whose last was sixteen thousand, now twenty thousand, immediately twenty four then thirty and lastly forty thousand pounds, vntill the laud was emptied of all the coine; the Kingdome of her glory: the Nobles of courages, the Commons of their content, and the Sovereign of his wonted respect and observance,

(15) The Danes thus prevailling, did not a little glory in their fortunes, and grieved the poore English, whose service they employed to ease and till the ground, whilst themselves sate idle, & ate the fruit of their paines, abusing the wives and daughters of their hosts where they lay, and yer in every place for feare and reverence were called the Lord-Dames, (which afterwards became a word of derision to such sturdy and lazy loach) so that the like daies of miserie the land neuer felt. To redresse which, the carefull King Ethelred was farre too weakke, and therefore intending to doe that by polley, which he could not by strength, he deuised a desperate stratagem that proued the destruction of the Saxons to all blood, and conquest of the land to another nation.

(16) For seeking to disburden the Realme of these devouring Danes, which by open force hee could no waies doe; he attempted in a bloody massacre to destroy them, giving a secret commission vnto every City within his dominions, that at an appointed time they should set vpon, and kill all the Danes; the day was the thirteenth of November, being the festiuall of S. Brice, the year of Christ Iesus 1002, and presently after his marriage with Emma, the Bowet of Normandy, in confidence of which affinity, hee presumed to do what he did. His command was accordingly performed, and with such rigour, that in Oxford the fearfull Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of S. Frideswyd, as into a Sanctuary of venerable antiquity and privileged among ancient Kings; but they in fury regarding either place nor person, set the Church on fire, whereas were burned a great sort of those Danes with many rich ornaments, and the Library thereof vtterly defaced. At which time (if Malmsbury say true) King Ethelred himself was in that City, and had summoned a Parliament both of Danes and Engliss, with which euen the King was much grieved: and therefore at his very great cost heauenfully repaired the Church, and all the losses accruing by the fire, endowing it with large perailledges and donations, as appeareth by his owne Charter, mentioning the tenour of that Daniſh laughter.

In this massacre, Lady Gunbold, sister to Swinone King of Denmarke, a great and continual friend to the English, with her husband and sonne, together were slaughtered, although she lay in hostage vpon conditions of peace, whose husbands name was Palmer (saith de la chery) an Earle of great might, & both of them Christians.

(17) Newes brought into Denmarke of this Suddaine Inuasion, no neede there was to venge them to svenge, or to adde more fuel vnto that ouer kindled fire, for preparation being made, the yeere ensuing, Scoten with a great Navy landed in the West, spoiled the Countrey, and gaue assault to the City of Essex, which by the treachery of one Hugh a Norman (whom in the fauour of the Queen, King Erlieard had made Gouvernour of that City) he razed and scouell'd with the ground, all along from the Esstate to the West.

This treason and stirres great of themselves, but made much more ruffill in the relating, caused Enkel presently to muster his men; over whom he made Earle Arsk for his coeuten lincs furnished Stretton his Generall, who bare a braue shew till he came to the path, and day of battle: but then to cover his treason, he fained him selfe sicke, and left his soldiers to shift as they could. The Danes hereupon fortified Widen, and passing forward tooke Salisbury in their way, to which they were as welcome as water into ships; but hearing that the King himselfe in person was preparing to give them battle, they left the land, and tooke againe to sea.

(18) The next yeare following, (which was the twenty foure of King Eshebede raigne, and of grace one thousand and foure,) King Swaine with a mighty flette of ships arrived vpon the coasts of Norfolke

where landing his men, hee made spoile of all before him, and coming to Norwich sacked the City, with great laughter of the Citizens; then tooke Thesford, and set it on fire, notwithstanding he had entred a truce with them: but for want of victuall which then was scarce in the land, he returned to sea, and so into Denmarke.

(19) Where making preparation for another expedition, increased his Naumic and number of men, and the next Spring arrived at Sandwich, miserably defolating the Countries along the sea side, now staying in any certain place, but to prevent the King's Forces roamed from coast to coast, ever carrying their ships their hooties and prayers, and to encrease the calamitie, the harvest was neglected, and in many places spoiled, both for the want of labourers, by the feet of the soldiers which lay in field that season, who from place to place trauailed, and though in vaine-

Towards the Winter the Danes took into the Isle of Wight, and in the deepest time thereof, passe through Hampshire, into Berkshire, vnto Reading, Wallingford, Colsey, and Elington, making clean work wheresoeuer they came, for that which they could not carry they consumed with fire, with triumphe returninge to their ships.

(20) The King lying in Shrewsbury, vnable to rise, called to him his Councell, to consult what was best to be done; whereof Edm. was a principall, and in so high esteeme with the King, that he created him Duke of Norfolk, and gaue him his daughter Eggh in marriage: notwithstanding, these plotes of fauours wrought onely the digestion of falshood in him, who could not nothing vniuerselle it was faulsh with treason. This man, when the Kings onely Chapellain, perswaded him to pay thirty thousand poundes to the Danes for their peace, whereof no doubt some fell into his owne Coffers.

(21) This insupportable imposition extorted of the Subjects especially at that time when the land was leathable, made many suspect great matters against Edrik, and some did not feare to accuse him to his face, to be the onely cause of this payment, charging him as over-affectionated to the Danes, and have bewrayed the Kings secrets and designs unto them: but he seated in the heart of his Sovereign rubbed off this stain with a few fawnings, and a flattery, being a man in wit subtle, in speech eloquent and for riches inferior to none, (a thought that could carrie even great fireames aside) so that these suspicious of treasons (as proceeding from envy to him for his good services) gave him greater trust, and sent he was Ambassador to the Danes to mediate for peace: where revealing the weakness of the land, and the fears which the English conceived of conquest, treacherously dissuaded them from giving ear to any motions of Truce.

(22) The State of the land thus standing, or rather hanging at suspence, King Esbeked gave order that out of euery three hundred and ten hides of land a shippe should bee built, and of euery eight hides a complete Armour furnished. These meeting at Sandwich and furnished with souldiers, made shew of such readinesse, as had not-beene seen, although the cause was nothing but a shew. For William a Noble man of Staffe (banished for some offence by King Esbeked) with twenty Sailer rowed vpon the coasts, and by Piracy did much hurt among the English Marchants: wherefore Brittain the brother of Esbeked to winne himselfe honour, got the Kings consent to pursue this grand-Piracie, with fourscore Gaile of the foresaid ships, threatening to bring in William either dead or alive: but his fall being spread vnder a faire wind, a violent tempest suddenly arose, and detragiously droue his ships vpon shore, where distressed and come, their boatsmen lay vnable to recouer themselves, or the Sea: William taking advantage of this present misfortune, fell fiercely vpon them, and after much slaughter their weather-beaten warders, for them all on fire, so that all this preparation proved not onely vaine, but also very hurtfull.

(23) At the receipt of the said thirty thousand pounds, the Danes departed, in semblance satisfied, and friends with the English; but how long that lasted the sequel shewed: for the next harvest, and yeere of saluation 1009, a great flecte of their ships throngly appointed landed at Sandwith, vnder the conduct of three Danish Princes, Turkil, Hering and Anlafse: these coming to Canterbury, were compounded with the Citizens, paying a thousand pounds for their departure; who thence in the weight, Suffex and Hampshire made hapoke of all.

King Ethelred seeing no truth in their promises, nor quietnesse, in State, his land thus exhausted of provision and coine, thought it best to adventure once for all, and to commit his cause vnto God, by the fortune of warre. To which end hee gathered his power, and comming vnlooked for, when the enemy was altogether vnprepared, and taken at disadvantage, he had made an end of the quarrell if wicked Edrick had not perswaded him from fight, and put him into a custlesse feare with his forged tales. The Danes thus escaping returned to Kent, and the winter following lodged their ships in the fiuer Thames, whence often they gaue alliaies for London, though to little purpose.

(24) Then took they through the Chiltern woods vnto Oxford, which they fired, and in their returne wasted all the countries on both sides of Thames, but hearing that London was prepared against them, they crossed ouer at Stanes, passing through Surrey into Kent, where they fell to amending their ships, and thence sailing about the coasts of Suffolke, tooke Ipwich, and pitched their battle vpon Rigmer, against Fikel (Governour of Norfolke) and his English, vpon the first of May, where they wonne the day with a great slaughter made of the Suffaxe, Norfolke, and Cambridge-shire men, and after harried those Countries with the borders of Lincolne and Huntingfordshire; burning Thetford and Cambridge, and rifling all the Abbies and Churches that stood in their way, and then through Essex returned vnto their ships.

(25) Neither rested they there long in quiet, ere, as people wholly deuoted to spoile, they brake into Buckingham, Bedford, and Norhampton-shires, the chief Towne of which last, they set on fire after much slaughter of the Inhabitants; and thence entering Wiltshire depopulated all before them, which was the fewest Shire in number that they had laid waste like a solitude.

(26) And now not satisfied with spoil nor blood-spilling, they prepare a new expedition for Canterbury, and in September beleaguered the Citie, which by treason of a Church-man they wonne, tooke Elphegus the Arch-Bishop, and few nine hundred Monks and men of Religion, besides many Citizens, without all mercy: for they tished the captiue multitudes after an inverted order, slaying all by nines, and restoring onely the tenth to live; so that of all the Monks in the towne there were but foure saved, and of the lay people foure thousand eight hundred, by which account M. Lambert collecteth that there died in this massacre forty three thousand and two hundred persons.

The Archbishop Elphegus, for that he refused to change his Tenants with three thousand pounds to pay for his ransom, they most cruelly stoued to death at Gretenwich the nineteenth of April following.

Turkil the Leader of these murderers, tooke into his possession all Norfolke and Suffolke, ouer whom he tyrannized in most lauage manner. The rest compounding with the English for eight thousand pound forwarne a while quiet among them.

(27) But King Swaine hearing of the diffusions, and weaknesse of the land, in the yeare of Grace, 1013, with a great number of ships arriued in the mouth of Humber, and entering Trent landed at Gainsburgh, whole terror stroke so deepe into the Norhambrics concities, that they with them of Lyndsey yielded themselves to the yoke of his subiection, so that now ouer all the North from Wallingfleet he reigned sole King, and exalted pledges from them for their further obedience. From the North hee sought to spread his wings farther into the South, and leauing his sonne Cano to take charge of his shippes, and new conquered countries, sped himselfe through Mercia to Oxford and Winchester, bringing all vnder the power of his command: with which gales of his fortunes, hee was so puffed vp, that thinking nothing vnpossible for him and his Danes to doe, in the heat of his courage he came vnto London and presently begirt the walles with a streit siege.

(28) In the Citie lay vnfortunate King Ethelred, who (as Simon Monke of Durham reporteth) had with him, and vnder his pay Turkill the Danish Prince before spoken of, and forty five Danish ships to defend the coasts. King Swaine at his first comming fiercely assaulted the Citie, hoping his fortunes would haue proved as before; but the presence of the King, and London the eye of the land, made the Citizens about measure courageous, who beat the Danes from their walles, and iallying forth of the Gates, slew them on heapes, so that Swaine himselfe was in great danger, had hee not desperately runne through the midst of his enemies, and by flight escaped their swords marching both day and night in great feare vntill hee had entred Bath, where Ethelmers Earle of Devonshire with his Welshire people submitted themselves vnto him. But this last overthrow, and wast of victuals, caused him after he had received a certaine summe of money, to hark into Denmarke, minding with more power, and better advantage to prosecute the quarrell.

(29) Not long it was ere he returned, and immediately was met by the English, where betwix them was stricke a fierce battaile, which had been with good successe, had not the treasons of some hindered it, in turning to the Danes. King Ethelred therefore seeing himselfe, and land betrayed in this manner, to those few true English that were left, heeuid this speech as followeth.

(30) If there wanted in me a fatherly care, either for the defence of the Kingdome, or administration of iustice in the common wealth, or in you, the courage of Souldiers for the defence of your native Country; then cruelly silent would I bee for euer, and beare these clamories with a more dejected mind: but as the case stands (be it as it is) I for my part am resolved to rush into the midst of the enemy, and to lose my life for my Kingdome and Crowne. And you (I am sure) hold it a worthy death that is purchased for the liberties of your selues and kindred, and thereto I pray you let vs all die, for I live both God and death against vs, and the ruine of the English nation brought almost to the last period; for wee are overcome not by weapons and hostile warfare, but by treason and domesticall falshood; our Navy betrayed into the Danes hands, our battaile weakened by the reuolt of our Captaines, our designs betrayed to them by our owne Counsellors, and they also inflicting compositions of dishonourable peace, I my selfe distressed, and in some tearmed Ethelred the cowardly, your valour and loialties betrayed by your owne leaders, and all our poverty yeerly augmented by the payment of their Dane-gilt, which how to redresse God onely knoweth, and we are to seek; for if we pay money for peace, yea, and that confirmed by oath, these enemies soone breake it, as a people that neither regard God nor man, contrary to equity and the lawes of warre, or of nations: and so farre off is all hope of better successe, as we haue cause

(31) This lamentable Oracion deliuered from the passions of a fully-penitent King, touched the hearts to the heares, and asmuch distracted their afflicted minds; to abide battell they saw it was bootlesse, the treason of their leaders in many times defeating their victories; to yield themselves to the enemy, would but beginne their seruitude and misery, and to flee before them, their eternal ignominy and reproch.

Thus their opinions were vanused, but nothing put in practise, whereas meane whiles the Danes went forward with victories, and had got the most part of the land, yea and London also by falshehood, wherewith vntowardly Ethelred more and more deceited, sent his wife Emma with his two sonnes by her, vnto her brother Richard Duke of Normandy, and for his owne selfe refuge committed himselfe vnto Turkel the Dane, in whose shippes he remained a while at Greenwich, and from thence went into the Isle of Wight, where he abode most part of the winter, and thence sailed into Normandy to his wife and brother, leasing the Danes lording it in his realme.

(32) These were the daies of Englands mourning, free being vnable to maintaine her defenders, and yet enforced to nourish and cherish her deuourers: for the Danes in two factions most cruely afflicted the land like two millions crathing & grinding the grain. Swaps an absolute King, extorted of the English both victuals and pay for his souldiers:
and Turkel on the other side, in defranchise of the English, commanded the like for his ships and men; so that the Danes had all land the English maintained at.
Neither were churches free from their spoils, (whom other Conquerors haue held most impious to violate,) but either suffered the flames of their consuming fire, or were forced to purchase their standings with great summes of money. Such composition King Swaine demanded for the preferuacion of S.
Edmunds Monastery in Suffolke, which because the Inhabitants refused to pay, he threatened spoile both to the place, & to the Martyrs bones there entred;
in the midst of which iollity (saith H. rounde) he fu-dainly cried out that he was stricken by S. Edmund with a sword, being then in the midst of his Nobles, and no man seeing from whose hand it came:
and so with great horrour and torment, three daies after vpon the third of February ended his life at Thetford (others say at Gainsborough) but with his death diuined not the title of the Danes, who immediately aduanced Canutus his sonne for their King.

(33) The English that liked nothing lesse then bondage, especially vnder such tyrannizing interdors, thought now or neuer the time to shake off the yoke; and therefore with great ioy and ball sent in to Normandy for their native King. Ethelred now not credulous for the recouering of his right, foreclosed no meanes either to halten or strengthen the enterprise, and hauing the assistance of his brother of Normandy, in the Lent following landed in England, vnto whom resorted the people from all parts, accounting it their gratefull ioy to see the face of their King.

(34) Canutus then at Gainsborough, Souldier-like maltered and managed his men, and holding it good politic to keepe that by bouney, which his father had got by tyranny, made no spare to purchase the hearts of the English, by which meanes those of Lynsey became his Creatures, with an agreement to hind him both horse and men against their owne King and Countrey.

Ethelred therefore now raging for reuenge, with a mighty host entered Lynsey, where he burnt all the Countrey, and put the inhabitants to the sword.

Canute not able to resist this puissant Army, held the sea more safe for him then the land, and entering Humber, sailed to Sandwich, where being fore-griued at the miseries of these his confederates, requested King Ethelred friends with the like, and commanded that those pledges which had beene deliuered by the Nobles vnto his Father, should haue their owne life, and their hands cut off: which cruelly acted, hee failed to Denmark, as hope-lesse of any good issue in England.

(35) But Turkel the Dane, retained (as we said)
into King Ethelreds pay, seeing successe so sodainly altered, sore repented him of his treult from the Danes, and knowing now the time to recouer his reputation, with nine of his shippes sailed into Denmark, instantly importuning Canute to addressse against England: alledging the feares and weaknesse of the people, the beauty and fertility of the land, an Eden, in respect of their owne barren sea, and (which did most moue) himselfe would assist when the English least thought it: with these and the like hee spurred him on, who of himselfe was forward in a full carriere.

Canutus therefore with the aide of his brother
Harold, rigged forth a Naue of two hundred saile, all furnished with souldiers and abiments of warre;
whose terror landed in England before him, and his power by report made greater then it was; and to encrease the terror of this fearefull enemy, the sea with a spring-tide brake into this land, and destroyed both townes and many inhabitants: a signe fore-showing (as was thought) the successe of this fleet, borne hitherward vpon those waves, and to encrease
the English miories, thirty thousand pound was then collected by way of Tribute to pay the Danish auxiliary Naue lying before Greenwich. The States also conuening in a grand Councell at Oxford to determine vpon the great affaires of the Kingdom, were diuided into factions, and two Noblemen of the Danes there murdered by praefille of Edrick the Traitor. These (say) were accouted ominous amongst the English, that made each mole-hill to seeme a mountaine, and euery shadow the shew of an enemy.

(36) In the meane while Canutus had landed at Sandwich, and giuen a great overthrow to the English; entred Kent, and by his sword had made way through the Countreies of Dorset, Sommerfet, and Wiltshire.

Ethelred lying dangerously sicke at Causton, the managing of these warres was transferred to Prince Edmund his sonne, who preparing to meete the enemie with his Army in the field, had sodainly noticed that Edrick his brother in law ment to betray him into his enemies hands; which newes stricken a great astonishment vnto his heart, and caused him to retreat his host into a place of security; wherby Edrick perceiving his trecherous purposes were discovered, gaue more open proofe of his intend-ments, flying to the enemy with forty of the Kings shippes; wherupon all the west Countreies subma-ined themselves vnto Canutus.

(37) By this time King Ethelred had recouered his sickness, and minding reuenge on his most wilked sonne Edrick, with purpose to trie his last fortunes by hazard of fight, summoned all his forces to meete him at a certayne day and place; where being assembled, he was instantly warned not to giue battall, for that his owne subjects ment to betray him.

King Ethelred euer vntowardly in this, to find treasons amongst them that ought him most trust, withdrew himselfe to London, whose seruice against the Danes he had lately scene, and therefore accounted his person most sure in their walls. Prince Edmund with his power posted ouer Humber, where the Countreies of Stafford, Leicesters, and Shropshires, not sparing to exercise any cruelty vpon their inhabitants, as a condigne recompence for their revolt. Neither did Canute for his part spare the Kings subiects, but through Buckingham, Bedford, Huntingdon, Nottingham, Lincoln, and Yorkshires, made spoile of all, so that the miserable English went to wracke on all sides, insomuch that Vreda so forsaking Edmund, became subiect to Canute: whereupon Edmund halted to London to ioinc his strength with his Fathers, and Canute with no lesse speed sailed about the Coast into Thames, preparing his Armie for the siege of London.

(33) At which time King Ethelred, either faine into relapc of his last sickness, or tired with the many troubles, and daily renewed treasions against him, gave vp his ghost, and found rest by death, which neuer hee could attaine by life, the twenty third of April, and yeere of our Salvation 1016, when he had most vnfortunatly reigned thirty seven yeeres, and nine daies: his body was there buried in the Cathedral Church of S. Paul, and bones as yet remaine in the north-wall of the Chancell in a chest of grey-Marble, reared vpon foure small pillars, covered with a copped stone of the same, adjoining to another of the like forme, whercin Sebbi King of the East-Saxons lieth intombed.

(39) Of Parsonage he was very seemely, and of countenance gracious, affable and courteous to his Subiects, and a maintainer of iustice among them, as by his excellent Lawes which himselfe made, and by his sharpe, but godly and wife censures against valcarned, bribing, delaying, partiall Iudges & Lawyers, and their purloining officers (at large let down by M. Fox) is very apparant. Very loeing and tender affectionated he was to his brother King Edwards for whose death he made such lamentation, that his mother beat him with a taper of waxe that hood before her, yea and so fere that he could neuer after wel endure the sight of a taper. Favourable he was to the married Priests, and least esteemed the opulent and idle lines of the Monkes, whose pens therefore (as in such cases we euer find them partial) have been very laith in his dispraise, accusing him with sloth and vnreadinesse of Armes, of voluptuousnes and lechery, conceitnesse, pride and cruelty: whereas in following the records of his life, laying aside the Danish mallice, we find no such liues, neither any mention of Concubine that euer hee kept, or name of child vnlawfully begot, having had many by his wives, which were as followeth.

His Wives.

(40) Elgiva, the first wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of an English Duke named Thored, who is reported in the history of that time, to haue done great seruice against the Danes. She was married vnto him when he was seauenteene yeeres of age, in the first of his raigne, being the yeere of grace 984. and was his wife seauenteene yeeres, who deceased in the twenty foure of his raigne, and of Christ Iesus, 1003.

(41) Emme, the second wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Richard the second Duke of Normandy, and sister of Duke Richard, and Duke Robert Father to William the Conqueror, her mother was sister to Herfast the Dane, Grandfather of William Fitz-Osbert afterward Earle of Hereford. She was a Lady of passing beauty, and therefore commonly called the flower of Normandy, married vnto him in the twenty and fifth yeere of his raigne, & yeere of Salvation, 1003, with whom she liued thirteene yeeres, and suruiuing him was remarried to King Canute the Dane.

His Issue.

(42) Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne about the eight yeere of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of Christ, 986: hee liued vnto the age almost of twenty yeeres, being then by great likelihood yet off by vnaimely death in the warres of the Danes, raging then most extreemely, which was the thirte chird of his Fathers raigne, and of Christ Natiuitie 1012.

(43) Egbert, the second sonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgiva his first wife, seemeth to haue bene borne two yeeres after his brother Ethelstan, in the tenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of our Lord 988, and to haue deceased in the very prime of his youth before the death of his father, or of his elder brother, and before hee had done any thing in his life worthy of remembrance after his death.

(44) Edmund, the third sonne of King Ethelred & Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne in the eleuenth yeere of his fathers raigne, and of Grace 989 and of all his fathers Children proued to be the only man that let his helping hand to the redresse of the estate of his Countrey distressed by the miserable oppressions of the Danes, which hee pursued with such exceeding toyle, and restless hazards of his body, as he was therefore furnamed Iron-side, and when hee had followed those warres with great courage the space of seauenteene yeeres vnder his Father, being come to twenty seuen of his owne age, hee succeeded him in his Kingdome and troubles, as presently shall be shewed.

(45) Edred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne about the fourteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of Grace 992. His name is continually set downe, as a witness in the testies of his fathers Charters, vntill the thirte fifth yeere of his raigne, by which it appeareth that hee liued vnto the two and twentieth yeere of his owne age, although I find no mention of him, or of any thing done by him in any of our histories, and it seemeth he died at that time, because his name is left out of the Charters after that yeere.

(46) Edwy, the fifth sonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgiva his first wife, suruiued his father and all his brethren, and liued in the raigne of Canute the Dane, who being iealous of his new-gotten estate, and fearefull of the dangers that might accrew vnto him by this Edwy, and such others of the English blood retall, practised to haue him murdered, which was accordingly done by them, whom hee most fauoured, and least suspected, the yeere of our saluation, 1017.

(47) Edgar, the sixth sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne about the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord God nine hundred ninetie and eight. He seemeth by the Testies of his fathers Charters, to haue bene liuing in the one and twentieth of his raigne, but being no more found in any of them after, may be supposed by all coniectures, to haue died in, or, about the same yeere, being but the eleuenth after his owne birth, and the seuenth before his fathers death.

(48) The eldest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiva his first wife, although her name be not to be found in any writer of those times, appeareth notwithstanding, to be married to one Ethelstan, a Noble man of England, who was the principall Commander of Cambridge-shire men, at the great battle fought betweene them and the Danes, wherein the English-men had the ouerthrow, and this sonne in law of King Ethelred, with the rest of the chiefe Leaders, were slaine in the yeere of Christ Natiuitie 1010, being the two and thirtieth of his father in lawes raigne.

(49) Edith, the second daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiva his first wife, was married to Edrik Duke of Mercia, who for his countourlesse in getting was furnamed Streathme: This Edrik was the sonne of one Egbert furnamed Leofwin, an elder brother to Egbert the grandfather of Canute Duke of the West-Saxons; and being but meanelly borne, was thus highly aduanced by this King; notwithstanding be

(50) Elfgone, the third daughter of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgisa his first wife, was the second wife of Vired surnamed the Bold, sonne of Earle Waldefe the elder, Earle of Northumberland, by whom shee had one onely child, a daughter, named Aldgith, married to a Noble-man called Ataldred, the sonne of Crinan; shee was mother of Cassatrice, who was Earle of Northumberland in the time of William the Conquerour, and forced by his displeasure to fly into Scotland, where hee abode and was ancestor to the Earles of Dunbar and of March in that Countie.

(51) Gode, the fourth and youngest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgisa his first wife, was first married to one Walter de Maigra a Noble-man of Normandy greatly fauoured by King Edward her brother; who liued not long after the marriage, and left issue by her a sonne named Redulfe, whom King Edward his vncke created Earle of Harcford. This Earle Redulfe died the one and twentieth of December, in the thirteenth yeere of his vncles raigne, and was buried at Peterborough; leaving issue a young sonne named Harrold, created afterwards by King William the Conquerour, Baron of Sudeley in the Countie of Gloucester, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandell of Sudeley now being. This Lady Gode, after the deceate of the said Walter de Maigra, was remarried to Bosface the elder,

Earle of Bouligne in Pictury, a man of great valour in those parts of France, and a most faithfull friend to King Edward her brother; which Earle was grand-father to Goffrey of Bouligne, King of Iherusalem albeit it seemeth he had no issue by this Lady.

(52) Edward, the seventh sonne of King Ethelred, and his first by Queene Emme his second wife, was borne at Slupe in the Countie of Oxford, and brought vp in France all the time of his youth, with his vncke Richard the third of that name, Duke of Normandy, mistrusting his safety in England vnder King Canut the Dane, although he had married his mother; but hee found the time more dangerous by the vsage of his brother Edfred, at his being heere in the raigne of King Harrold sonne of the Dane. Nowwithstanding hee returned home, when Harold the other sonne (being his halfe brother) was King, and was honourably receiued and entertained by him, and after his death succeeded him in the Kingdom of England.

(53) Edfred, the eighth sonne of King Ethelred, and his second by Queene Emme his second wife, was conueied into Normandie for feare of King Canut, with his eldest brother Edward, and with him returned into England to see his mother, then being at Wincheſter, in the second yeere of King Harrold surnamed Harcote; by whose practise hee was trained towards London, apprehended by the way at Guilford in Surrey, deprived of his eie-sight, and committed prisoner to the Monastery of Eberis his Normans that came with him most cruelly murdered, and hee himselfe soone after deceasing, was buried in the Church of the said Monasterie.

ged the Cite before the death of King Ethelred, caused his ships now to be towed, and drawne vp the Thames vnto the west side of the bridge, and from the river with a deepe and large Trench encompassed the City, shutting vp all entrance or egress of any: but the Citizens manfully stood in resistance, whereto the coming of their new King for their succour, did not a little encourage them, and daunted the Danes, who now thought it best to breake vp their siege and be gone: and the latter (as the Author of Economicum Ennema) for that King Edmund sent Canst a peremptory challenge of single combat, which he neither accepted, nor yet staied the siege to trie his chance; but waying his anchors sailed along the Coast to the Ile of Sheppey, where he wintered with his Naue and men.

(3) But looke to lose opportunity, when time served for warre, on the fodeane he assailed the west of England, and brought much of those parts vnder his command: to meet whom the restless Iron-side prepared, and with such small power as his leasure would admit to leaue, he halted into Dorsetshire, where Canst was forwarding his owne fortunes, and at Penham neere Gillingham, each met other in the field, wherein a fore battle was fought, and bloody to the Danes, where many of them were put to the sword, and the rest to flight.

(4) Canst immediately tooke into Winchester, to secure himselfe from danger, and therest escaped towards Salisbury, and there begit the Cite with a strait siege. King Edmund as ready to succ, as they to destroy, made presently thitherward with his small and outwired company; whom Canst, waiting for advantage, followed with a great host, and in Wiltshire, at a place called Sherston, in the sight of his enemy pitched his battail. To the aide of Edmund came many of the English, so that his Army was greatly encreased, and their courages inhaumed, which made the Danish souldiers somewhat to droope.

(5) Notwithstanding, vpon the twentieth of June, 1016. their battails joined, and with equall fortune continued all the day, vntill the night constrained them to part.

(6) But their blood not cold, the next day they buckled together againe with no lesse courage then before, till at length the Danes were going down, & the English in great forwardnes of victory: which when the Traiour Edrik perceived, he cut off the head of a souldier, whose name was Osmear, like vnto King Edmund both in haire and countenance, and shakng his bloody sword with the halfe-gaping head, cried vnto the host of the English: For see wretches, flee, and get away for your King is slain, behold here is his head, therefore seeke now to save your owne liues.

(7) But Edmund having present notice of this treacherous stratageme, and seeing his men ready to gae ouer the night, halted himselfe where he might be best seene, encouraging his Army to stand to it like true Englishmen, and posling from ranke to ranke, both performed the parts of a wise General, and vnderwent the dangers of the meanest souldier. his men seeing his presence, & the apparant treachery of Duke Edrik, bent their bow against the traitour, and had shot him to death, had he not presently avoided to the enemy: but the night approaching, patred againe the battail of this second day: Duke Edrik excusing his fault, as being moerely mistaken in the countenance of the man, and thirsting to saue the blood of the English, was taken againe into favour, and bare himselfe outwardly faire for his Country.

(8) The third day appearing, both the Armies prepared for battail, but yet stood still without any attempt, onely refreshing their wearied, and almost tired bodies, and burying the dead slaine in the two daies fights before.

(9) The night following, Canst in great fa-lence brake vp his Campe, and marched very fast towards London, against whose Citizens he carried great spleene, and most earnestly desired the conquest of the Cite, which in a fort was still besieged by the Danish ships.

(10) The Centinels the next morning certified King Edmund (who was addressing himselfe for the battail) of the suddaine departure of his enemies, wherupon hee as ready to prevent their designs, followed them by traile euen vnto London: where with small adoe, hee removed their siege, and entered the City in manner of triumph. The Danes thus discomited, great hope was conceiued, that these faire proceedings would haue a prosperous end.

(11) Edmund, therefore following the aduantage of their discouragements, two dayes after at Brentford had them battail, and that with their great ouerthrow; notwithstanding, in passing the Thames at the same place, he lost many of his men, who were drowned before they could recover the shore: vpon which losse the Traiour Edrik plained, who earli had much feared the downfall of the Danes. For hereupon hee perswaded his brother in law King Edmund to come to tract with Canst, which as he confidently assured, should be to the great benefite and contentment of Edmund: Canst himselfe so plotting it, that by his meanes he might continue his hopes, and bring his enemy into his danger.

(12) The affaires thus standing, King Edmund returned into the West, and Canst with spoiles vnto his shippes that were in Medway, not far from Rochester, where hea while lay still to learne what Edmund meant to doe; who contrariwise louing nothing lesse then to linger his busineses, made preparation against those truce-breakers that had wasted the Countrey in their recurrence with a great Army cutted Kent, where he pitched down his tents neere vnto Oxford.

Canst, who had prepared himselfe in most warlike array to meete his approach, beganne the battail in a furious manner, which continued verie bloody for foure howres space, vntill the foot of his vaward beganne to shrink, which when hee perceived, he drew his horsemen for their aide; but whilst the one gaue hastily back, & the other made as slowly forward, the array of the whole army was broken, and the Danes slaine on all hand: for it is reported that Canst lost foure thousand five hundred men, (and King Edmund onely six hundred) the rest of these Danes trusting to their legs: whom if Edmund had pursued in chase, it is thought, that day had ended the warres betwixt those two Nations for euer: but Destiny, that would haue the Saxons downe, who had raised themselves by the fall of the Britainer, made Edrik her instrument, & mall of the English, who kept King Edmund's halfe foot from following his enemies, by guilefull vying the danger of ambush, and the ouer-weared bodies of his souldiers, so that Canst thereby had leasure in safety to passe ouer into Essex.

(13) Where beginning againe, with the increase of his power to depouler the Countrey before him, brought fesse to the inhabitants, and to himselfe submission of many English. King Edmund therefore made preparation thitherward, and at Abstone three miles from Saffron-Walden, gaue battail to Canst, wherein a bloody slaughter ensued, though a while with equall chance of foile or of victory, vntill lastly the Danes beganne to giue backe, which when the euer-traitorous Edrik perceived, he went with his strength, vnto their side, and maintained their battail, which otherwise was at point to be lost, whereby the Danes regained the day, and the betrayed English the ouerthrow. There died of Edmund's Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Gostwin, Duke Aethelward, Duke Aethelwin, and Earle Willel, with Caduoth Bishop of Lincolne, and Welfy Abbot of Kauky, besides other of the Clergy that were come thither to pray for the preservation of the King and his Army. The remembrance of which fact is retained unto this day, by certain small hills there remaining, whence have beene digged the bones of men, Armour, and the water-chains of horse-bridles.

(14) King Edmund thus traitorously forced to retire from the field, on foot marched unto Gloucester with a very small Army, leaving Cannet overthrown in conceit for this his great victorie, unto whom then the Londoners submitted, and so did many other great townes of Name; after which hee followed Edmund into the West, who now like a Tygar robbed of her Whelpes, seeking the revenge of his lost day, gathered a most puissant Army, meaning to trie the viertmost chance of Fate, or Battaille. Their hostes meete at Deerhurst were unto the river Suonne, where they were refolowed byns to establish the onestate with the others downfall; and now being ready to ioyne, a certaine Captaine of valentine name, slept forth (as is reported) betwixt the two Armies, and vntered in effect this speech.

"(15) Many battailles have bene fought, and too much blood already spilt for the soveraigntie of this Land, betwixt these two fierce Nations, and the valours of the Generals, Capraines and Souldiers sufficiently tried; wherein euen fortune her selfe seemeth to have bene conquered; for if one Battaille were wonne, it was not long kept, neither the loser so weakened, but that hee had both courage and power to winne the next: what is the marke then that you aime at? is it honour and fame? Titles indeed which accompany war; but neither long enjoyed, nor much attained unto by the common Souldiers, hy whose valours and blood it is for the most part wonne. Let him therefore that would weare the Duademe, beare the hazard himselfe, without the consoule of so many men, and either trie the fortune of a single combat, who shall command, and who obey, or diuide betwixt them the Kingdom, which may suffice two, that hath maintained feren.

(16) Some affirme that this speech was Duke Edrick; but I hardly believe so good a motion should proceede from so bad a man, by whom so euerttered, it was acceptably received by Edmund and Cannet, who therupon in sight of their Armies, entred into a small bland, embraced about with the armies of Suonne, called Alney, adjoining unto the City Gloucester, where those princes in complete Armour at first assailed each other most dangerously on horiebacke, and after as valiantly on foot. The Ironside was strong, and fought for his Kingdome; the Dane not so tall, but every way as stout, fought for his honour, and so the combat continued with an absolute resolution, till at length Cannet having received a dangerous wound and lacing himselfe overmatched in strength, wished a compromise, and thus spake to Edmund with a blood voice.

"What necessity should thou move vs most valiant Prince, that for the obtaining of a Title, we should thus endanger our lives? better it were to lay man and Armour aside, and to be condempned to a lasting agreement: let us therefore now become fverne brothers, and divide the Kingdome betwixt us, and so such league of amity, that each of us may be the other part as his owne; so shall this land be peacefully governed, and mutually assigant to each others necessity.

Wherupon they both cast downe their swords, embracing as friends with the great ioy and shooting of both their Armies, who stood before doubtfully wauncing betwixt hope and feare, and looking for their owne fortuace, according to the successe of their Champions.

Thus was the Kingdome divided betwixt those two Princes; Edmund enioying that part that lay coasted vpon France, and Cannet entring vpon the rest.

(17) Thus then the Saxons Monarchy spent to the last period, and their tottering crowne fast graiped with a hard Danish hand, was suddainely torne from the Ironside helmet, by his complicted and hastined death. For Duke Edrick a very compound of treacions, glutted with the furoars of both these Kings, to scue himselfe deeper into Cannet his conceit, contrived the end of renowned Edmund: who being retired to a place for matures necessity, was thrust from vnder the draught into his body with a sharpe speare; which done, the treacherous Edrick cutting off his Soueraignes head, prefined it to Cannet with these fawning salutations. All haste, thou new false Monarch of England, for, here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy sake I have adventured to cut off.

Cannet, though ambitious inough of soveraignty, yet of princely disposition abused, & sore grieved at so voworthy and dishonour an attempt, replied, and vowed, that in reward of that service, the braverer head should be advanced about all the power of his kingdome. Which high honour whiles this prodigious wretch greedily expected, (and indeed for a time, such Malmesbury, hee found some sort of favour with the King;) soone after, by the Kings command, his head had his shouldlers fawcill, and was placed vpon the highest Gate to overlooke London.

(18) The traitorous death of this worthy Prince, as some affirme, was acted at Oxford; yet the Author that wrote Examenium Emmae, and liued the same time, blancheth the matter, saying that hee died of a natural death in London: God minding his owne doctrine, that a Kingdome divided in it selfe, cannot long stand, and pitying the English, took away Edmund, lest if the Kings had continued long together, they should both have liued in danger, and the Realme in continual trouble.

That hee died in London, Simon the Monke of Durham agreeth, and saith further, it chanced about the Fealt of S. Andrew and Marianus is of the same opinion, being the yere of Christ, 1016. Whensoever, or howsoever, his Raigue was but seven monethes, and his body buried at Gloucester; were unto his Grandfather King Edgar.

(19) Hee was of personage tall, for courage, hardy, strong of limmes, and well could endure the trauels of warre, in somuch that some deeme the surname Ironside, given him onely vpon that occasions. With him fell the glory of the English, and the aged body of their fore brused Monarchy seemed to bee buried with him in the same Sepulchre.

His Wife.

(20) Alghis, the wife of King Edmund, was the widow of Sigefrith, the sonne of Engin a Danish Nobleman of Northumberland; which Sigefrith, with his brother Mercar, was murdered at Oxford by the trealon of the neerer-faithfull Edrick: & this Lady being of great beauty, and noble parnage after the death of her husband, and the scisure of his lands, was by King Ethelred, committed in charge to the Monastery of Malmesbury, where Edmund lacing her, grew in great love, and there married her against the liking of his father, in June 1015.

His Issue.

(21) Edward the eldest son of King Edmund, and Queen Alghis his wife, was surnamed the Outlaw, because hee liued out of England in Hungary as a banished man, through the raigue of Cannet, and of his sonnes the Danes. But when his vnckle King Edward the Confessor, had obtained the English crown, he was by him recalled, and most honourably in his Court entertained, till lastly, hee was taken away by death in the City of London, the yeere of Christ, 1057. He married Agatha sister to Queene Sapaea, wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and daughter to the Emperour Henric the second; by whom hee had Edgar, surnamed Etheling, confirmed heire apparent by Edward Confessor, his great Uncle; which title notwithstanding, proceeded no further, for that hee was deprived thereof by Harold his Protector.

The daughters of this Edward, as after shall be said, were Margaret and Christina, the younger of which became a valed Nunne at Ramsay in Hampshire, where shee in that deuotion spent her life, and was there interred.

Margaret the elder, and afterward sole heire vnto the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third of that name, King of Scotland, and commonly called Canmore: from which princely bed in a lineall descent, our high and mighty Monarch, King JAMES the first, doth in his most roiall person vniue the Brittaines, Saxons, English, Normans, and Scot- ish imperiall Crownes in one.

(22) Edmund, the second and yongest sonne of King Edmund, and of Queene Alghith his wife, after his fathers deccesse being a Child, was with his brother Edward, sent by Cnut to Olave King of Sweden his halfe brother, to the intent, that he by murder should make them both away: but this King taking pittie on the innocent Childrens estate, sent them to Salomon King of Hungary, to the intent to haue them suued, where they were receiued with great fauour and honour: and Mathew of Westminster reporteth, that this Prince married the daughter of the same King; and other Writers of thier times, that he died in the same Country without any issue of his body.

(23) These two ionnes of the Transe thus posied away, and the crowne already set vpon the Danes head, had not the means of themselves to displace it, nor the English, hearts to assist them to their right: so that they rather secured themselves from violent deaths in this their exile, then made claime to that which was vurecoverable; and left the Danes quietly to possesse the land, which so long they had molested with their sturdy Armes.

CHAPTER I.

He Spirit of God in his sacred writings, to these his all-commanding power over Kingdomes and Nations, compareth the transigrations of people from country to country, vnto the transiſion
of wine from vesseſ to ves-ſell: and those that are at rest with sinne, to the setting vpon their lees, as Moſes did, against whom hee cursed that hand that was negligent in his worke of reuenge, and the sword that was not sheathed in their bloud. Euen so the ſinners of the Saxons growne now to the full, and their dregs as it were Iuncke vnto the bottome, they were emptied by the Danes from their owne vessels, and their bottles broken that had vented their red & bloody wines: in lieu whereof, the Lord then gaue them the cuppe of his wrath, whose dregs hee had formerly (by their own hands) wrung out vpon other nations.

(2) For these Saxons that had enlarged their king-domes by the blood of the Brittains, and built their neſts high vpon the Cedars of others, (as the Prophet speaketh) committed an euill couenent vnto their owne habitations, and were stricken by the ſame meaſure that they had meaſured vnto others.
Whenas the Danes often attempting the lands inuaſion, and the ſuborſion of the Engliſh estate, made way with their ſwords through all the Prouinces in the realme, and laſtly advanced the crowne vpon their owne helmets; which whiles it ſo ſtood, was worne with great honour, eſpecially of Canute the firſt and their great ſt.

(3) As touching this Nations originall, and firſt place of reſiding, ſeeing themſelves know nothing at all, we cannot determine, but ſuppoſing them with Franciſcus Irenicus, to be a branch of the ancient Germani, and knowing them by the teſtimonies of others, to inhabit in the ſame Country among them, we need not to doubt, but that their conditions and cuſtomes were much alike. Of the former, what we haue obſerued, is already ſet downe,

where we ſpoke of our Saxons, & now of theſe latter,
what is ſuppoſed for truth ſhall be produced.

(4) Theſe Danes ſo often mentioned by our hiſtorians, for the great afflictors of the Engliſh ſtate and peace, were a people deſcended from the Scythians, as Andrew Felley a learned Danish Writer reporteth:
but Dudo of St. Quentin (an ancient Author) will haue them to come from Scandia, a ſmall ſituated north-ward, not farre from the continent of Denmarke: which his opinion ſeemeth vnto ſome to be ſtrengthened by Ptolemy the Alexandrian, who in his Geography placeth the people Danones (the ſuppo-ſed Anceſſors of thoſe Danes) in this Iſland Scandia, at ſuch time as himſelfe wrote, which was in the raigne of Hadrrian the Emperour, and about the yere of Chriſts natiuitie 133. But whereſoeuer the root had beginning, the branches did ſure ſpread themſelves into the vpper Germany, and parts of Norway, and Swedon, whole faire fruit more particularly illed that promontory, which tongue-like lieth into the Ocean on the north, being anciently called of the learned, Cambroica Cheſneſſus, where (as Tacitus ſaith) was the utermoſt end of Nature, and of the world, a ſtrange conceit indeed; and yet more ſtrange was their opinion, who were perſwaded that the ſound and noiſe of the Sonne was there heard at his daile riſing and ſetting in thoſe ſeas. But from more warrantable wiſedoms it is reported, that this was the very place which the Inter and Angles abandoned, when they remoued their Colonies for Britaine.

(5) In this place then the Danes had firſt the foundation of their Kingdom; which, from the word Mare, ſignifying not a limbe, but a region, was named Deno-mare. But touching the former part of that compounded name, the truth and originall ſhall not be ſo ſoone found out: for the leaſching eye of truth hath long ſince ſene into the receiued fable of Dananus their firſt King, and Guene-like ſonne of Hamburgh

though Perfogus of late holds it more certaine in the search of originals, to follow the grounded opinion that ancient Tradition hath held, then at random to seeke them else-where: as these Danes (saith he) from Dan, and the Britaines from Brute; which truly for truth I hold much alike, and will herein make doabt as many more of riper iudgement before me haue done.

*Isidorus, Antiq.
lib. 14. cap. 6.*

(6) For Caropius Romanus deducteth the name Dane from Dan-hen, signifying a Henne, or rather (as some will) a fighting Cocke; Tanum, from Des, signifying Fire-mee, which the name there abound. Andreas Vellus from a people in Scythia named Daha, of whom Isidorus maketh mention in his eighteenth booke, and placeth them by the Saxa.

Jonas Lamb.

Ethelward our English historian will haue them named from the faire City Dania. And Iomas Lambardus Penolanius, a diligent searcher of Antiquities, out of Pempanius Antels, findeth the names of certaine Reys, opening into those parts, which now the Danes inhabit, to haue beene ancientlie written CDAN and CDANONVM; which Orthographic and Pronuntiation to the Latines was both harsh and hard, and therefore they added a vowel, and wrote CODANVM and CODANONIA, whereof (it may be thought) these people giue much to piracies, were knowne and called by that name, as breaking out of those Codanus seas. Some others from Ptoleme haue thought, that from his Deaciones placed in Scandia, and corruptly so written for Danciones, the name of these Danes hath beene deriued; whereto the neere-ness of the place induceth much.

Dudo.

(7) For Nations Originals may well bee compared vnto a spring, whose current furcharged with continuall supply of more, first filleth the neere Channels; which done, they passe further, and at length are (oftentimes) diuided into many and great streames: and euen so these Danes, (saith Dudo of S. Quintin) after they had in heart, and lasciuious lust ingendred an innumerable offspring, swarmed out of Scandia like bees out of their hives, & that both on diuers occasions, and in very barbarous manner; for growne to ripeness of yeeres, & falling at strife with their Fathers and Grand-fires, yea, and most commonly, among themselves for lands and liuely-hood, necessity compelled them to disburden the land thus ouerflowed, for the better maintenance of the residue, and to banish by lot (after their ancient custome) a multitude of their youth, that might conqueere by their swords, in forraigne Realmes, places to liue in.

These then thrust out of their owne, fell vpon other lands with no lesse danger then the falling of a fire out of the sheath, or rather, as the breaking in of a tempestuous sea vpon the neighbouring grounds, sore distrelling their neighbour nations; & among them England not the least, as shalbe said.

Cambd. Britan.

(8) And yet their name was not much notified to the world before the reaigne of Iulianus the Emperour, about the yeere of mans saluation, 570, but then rising vpon the coasts of England, & France, in exercising Piracies, were noted by writers by the name Wicingi, for that Wicinga in the Saxen tongue, as Africanus witnesseth doeth signifie a Pirate; they were also called Pagani, for that they were not Christians; but by the English Densican, and alio Heathen-men, as being Ethellic.

The Religion of the Danes.

(9) The manner of their Religion, or rather superstition and Idolatry, was much like vnto the other German and Saxen, whose principall God and Nationall reputed-Patron, was Thor, vnto whom the fourth day of the weeke for his seruice was assigned, whereof as yet it beareth his name Thurs day; who in his robes was set vpon a sumptuous bed; the Canopie whereof was belagued with flares of gold; vnto him they performed their chiefe deuotions, and ascribed all their fortunes in their affaires; as the foretold Dudo doth more particularly relate. They (saith he) sacrificed vnto Thor, whom they worshipped in old time as their Lord, for whom they killed not many sheepe, oxen, or other cattle, but offered vnto him mens blood, thinking that to be the most pretious oblation of all others; whom, when the Priest by calling of him had designated to death, they were all at once deadlie smitten vpon the head with necyres, and eury one thus chosen by lot, hauing at one stroke his braines dashed out, was laid along on the ground, and there with a narrow prying was sought out the Yfira, or veine of the heart on the left side, whence drawing the blood, as their custome was, and therewith besmeuring the heads of their dearest friends, forthwith they hoise sailes, thinking their Gods well pleased with such sacrifices, and fere-deeming happy success to their intended voyage.

Perfogus.

Dudo.

(10) Disinarius the Bishop (somewhat auienter then Dudo) recordeth another detestable superstition vied by the Danes to purchase the fauour of their Gods. Because (saith he) I haue heard wonderfull reports of the ancient sacrifices which the Danes and Normans used, I will not let them passe vntoucht. In those parts there is a place, and the chiefe it is of that Kingdome, called Ledcrum, in a Province named Selon, where eury ninth yeare, in the month of January, after the time in which we celebrate the Nativity of our Lord, they all assemble together, and there they kill and sacrifice vnto their Gods ninety and nine men, and as many horses, with dogs, and also cocks, in stead of bowles, offering themselves; that hereby their Gods are fully pleased and pacified. And thus much may serue for a taill and view of their customs, names and originals.

THE DANES FIRST AT-TEMPTS AGAINST ENGLAND.

CHAPTER II.

An. Do. 787.

Though many were the Piracies of the Danes on the coasts of France and this our Island in former times; yet their arrival here, which gave first breath to their ensuing conquests, was not till the wane of the Saxon Monarchie, about the yeere of Christs Incarnation seven hundred eighty seven, in the raigne of Brightrik King of the West-Saxons; in whose dominions, after some prosper at Forland, they first came to land at Teigne-mouth in Deuon-shire; becoming sent then with three Ships onely, to espie the wealth of this Countrey, the forces of the Inhabitants, the commodities of the Hauens, and aduantage of arrivall for a greater power, which was to follow them. The Kings Lieutenant and Prefect for that place, vnderstanding of their landings, went himselfe to demand the reason thereof; and attempting to lay hands on some to carrie them to the Kings presence, hee was there slaine; which they tooke as a fortunate preface of the victories wherewith they afterward overranne this Kingdome; though for the present the inhabitants enraged with the losse of their Chiefe, addresting them in great numbers to revenge, forced some to lose their liues by the sword, the rest to save them by flight to their ships.

Consider in Danes, John Grew, Lambert in Pres. ent, mention with their Landing at Teigne-mouth in the North, the necessity of the name (it becomes) descended him.

Fabian. cap. 38.

(2) Notwithstanding their former preparations, they were contented to deferre their returne till the dayes of King Egbert, whose raigne (as elsewhere we haue touched) they disquieted with three several insasions; the first in the North, the second in Wales, the last in Kent; in all which, the King though with many losses, and hazards of his own person, yet with great resolutions persisted, till hee had disburdened his land of so dangerous guests. But those Flesh-fur having once tasted the sweet, though often beaten off, would not long bee kept away, but could easily take, or make occasions of fresh attempts; insomuch that after their first footing they continued here their cruelties, rapine and spoile the space of two hundred and eightene yeeres, neuer intermitting, till they had got the garland vpon their owne heads. The way wherunto was made vpon this ensuing occasion.

(1) Oswight a Northmerian Victroy, deputed by the West-Saxons, by chance, as hee followed his disport in Hunting, came to the house of a Noble man, named Bearn-Bador, whose Lady of passing stature (in his absence) gave him honourable entertainment, and intreated both himselfe and traine, to repose themselves there a while, after their wearisome delights. The Fier-ray already ensnared with her beauty, accepted her courteous offer, not so much to tast her meates, as to surfeite his eyes with her rare beauty, and lasciuiously to dote in his owne affections. The dinner ended, and all ready to depart, as though some weighty matters were to be handled, he commaunded an avoidance from the Presence, and taking the Lady into a withdrawing Chamber, vnder pretence of secret conference, greatly tending to the aduancement of her Lord & selfe, most vnnobly, being not able to preuaile by smooth persuasions, did by force violate her constant chastity. Which dishonour thus received, and her minde distracted like to Thamar, at her husbands returne, all ashamed to behold his face whose bed had so become wronged, with fouds of teares there thus let open the fluxes of her passions.

a. Sam. 13. 19.

(4) Had thy fortunes accorded to thine owne defect, or thy choice proceeded as by vow was obliged, then had no stain of blemish touched thine honour, nor cause of suspicion once approached thy thought: or had my selfe become my selfe, these blushing cheekes had not inuited thy sharpe piercing eye to looke into my guilty and defiled breast, which now thou maist see disurailled of honour, and the closer of pure chastity broken vp; onely the heart and soule is cleane, yet feares the tainture of this polluted caske, and would haue passage (by thy reuenging hand) from this loathsome prison and filthy truncke. I must confesse our lexe is weak, and accompanied with many faults, yet none excusable, how small fouler; much lesse the greatch, which shame doth follow, and inward guilt continually attendeth; yours, is created more inuolable and firme, both against allurements and enforcements: by whose constancy as our flexible weakness is guarded, so our true honours by your iust Armes should bee protected. O Bearn-Born, (for husband I dare not call thee) reuenge therefore my wrongs, that am now made thy shame and scandale of my sex, vpon that monster, say Diuell, Oswight, (O that very name corrupts my breath, and I want words to deplore my griefe) who hath no law but his lust, nor measure of his actions but his power, nor praisledge for his loathsome life, but his greatness; whiles we with a selfe-fear, and servile flatterie make our baseness with crouching obedience, & beare the wrongs of his most vile adulteries. Thou yet art free from such delected and degenerate thoughts, nor hast thou smoothed him in his wicked and euil-working vices: be still thy selfe then, and truly Noble as thou art. It may be for his place thou owest him respect; but what therewith the losse of honour thine affection, but not thy bed; thy Loue but not thy beloued, yet hast thou lust at once all these; and he thy only beuauer: thou wast my stay whilest I layed by thee; and now being downe, re-

"venge my fall: the instinct of nature doth pitty our "weaknesse, the law of Nations doth maintaine our "honour, and the sword of Knighthood is sworne by
"to be vnbeate for our iust defence; much more
"the linke of wedlocke claimes it, which hath lockt
"two hearts in one; but alas, that ward is broken,
"and am thy shame, who might haue bene thine
"honour. Reuenge thy selfe therefore both on him
"and mee, else shall this hand let out the Ghost that "shall still attend thee with acclamations, till thou re-
"uenge my stained blood.

(5) Born vnwonted thus to bee welcommed, much amazed at his wifes maladies, with gentle words drew from her the particulars of her inward griefe, who revealed (as well as shame, and teares, and sobs, would suffer) the manner of the deed, full vrging reuenge for the wrong. Born touched thus to the quick, to pacifie his distressed wife, did not a little dissemble his wrath, and exculing the fact,
with the power of a Prince that might command,
and her owne weaknesse vnable to resist the strength of a man: Comended much her loue and constancy, and allcading his wrongs to bee equal with hers, if not greater, in regard of their sexe, willed her to set her firing to his true till fire opportunity would ferue to strike: but thee distilling that sweet comfort, wrestled her passion into so high a strain, that nothing could be heard but reuenge & blood.

(6) Born thus infligated by the continual cries of his wife, whose rape already of it selfe had given sufficient cause of wrath: first consulting with his nereest friends, was offered their assistance against that wicked and libidinous Prince, and then repairing to his Court, in presence of them all, made knowne his vnusuall wrongs, and with vtter defiance departed, threatening his death.

This Nobleman in his youth had been brought vp in Denmarke, and is reported to haue beene ali-ed into the Danish roiall blood. Hee therefore accounted this nation the surest vnto himselfe, and the surest will and power to enter his quarrells so comming to Godenot King of that Country, made his case knowne, instantly desiring his aide against the villanie of Osberg.

Godenot glad to haue some quartrell to enter Fritane, leured an Armie with all speed, and preparation made for all things necessarie, sendeth forth Inguar and Habba two brethren to command in chiefe, ouer an innumerable multitude of his Danes: which two hee thought at this time the fittest for the attempt, not onely for their well approved resolution and valour, but also for that hee knew them to bee, on particular motives (which usually more affect then doth a common cause) implacably enraged against the Englysh, on an occasion vnfortunately hap-ping, but most lamentably purified: which it will not bee amisse here to rehearse.

(7) A certaine Danish Nobleman of the roiall llage named Lathbroke, Father to this Inguar & Habba, being vpon the shore, his Hawke in flying the game fell into the Sea, which to recouer, hee entered a litle Schiffe or Cock-boar, nothing foreseeing the danger that immediately did ensue: for a fadine tempest arising, carried the boat into the deepe, and droue him vpon the coast of Norfolke, where hee came to land at the Port called Radham, and was no sooner scene, but hee was taken for a spie; and presently sent to Edmund, King then of that prouince, who in his answers sufficiently cleared that suspition, when also declaring his birth & misfortune, he was honourably entertained in the Court of the East-Engles: whom the King much esteemed for his other good parts; but for his dexterity and expertnesse in hawking, held him in a speciall regard; in somuch that the Kings Falconer named Berke, conuicted both such secret enuie and deadly hatred thereat, that hauing him alone in a wood, he cowardly murdered him, & hid his dead body in a Bush.

(8) Lathbroke in the Kings presence and Court was soone mist and diligent inquisition made could not bee found vntill his Spanell, which would not forsake his dead Masters corpe, came fawninglie vnto the King, as seeming to begge reuenge on so bloody an Act, which he did more then once, & at length being obserued and followed by the trace, the dead body was found; and Berke conuicted for the murder, his iudgement was to bee put into Lathbrokes bow, and that without either tackle or Ore, as he thereto arrived, and so left to the fies mercy to be sued by destiny, or swallowed vp by iust delect.

"But behold the event; the Boat returned to the same place, and vpon the same coast arrived from whence it had bene driuen, even in Denmarke, where Berke being known, and hands laid on him, to free himselfe from the punishment of his butcherly fact,
he added treason to murder, laying it to the charge of innocent King Edmund.

(9) In reuenge whereof, and likewise in Godenots quartrell, Inguar and Habba, sons to the murthered Prince, being now made Generals of the Army of the Danes, first arriving at Holdernes, burnt vp the Countrey, and without mercy massacred all before them, sparing neither sexe, nor calling, nor age; and surprizing York, which Osberg
had taken for his refuge, there slew that illustrious Prince with all his forces, and possessed that City;
and afterwards barling into Norfolke, sent this message vnto King Edmund. That linguist the most vicious Prince, dread both by sea and land, hauing subdued diuers Countreies vnto his subiection, and now arriued in those parts where hee meant to winter, charged Edmund to disdaine him his riches, and to become his vassall and seruant.

The King aloued at this strange and vnexpected Ambassage, consulted with his Councell, where one of his Bishops (then his Secretary, and a princi-pall man) vied persuasions to him to yeeld, for preuenting greater mischief; who notwithstanding returned this answer: God tell your Lord, that Edmund
the Christian King, for the love of his temporall life, will not submit himselfe to a Heathen and Pagan Duke.
Whereupon Inguar and Habba, with the furious troupes of their Danes, pursued the King to Thes-ford; and (as Fabian saith) to Framingham, others to Halesden; where hee pitying the terrible slaughter of his people, yielded himselfe to their persecutions;
and for that hee would not deny Christ, and his Christian faith, was bound to a tree or Stake, and with their arrowes so shot to death: whose body was afterward there buried, and thereupon tooke the name of S. Edmunds-bury; as we haue formerly touched in his raigne, Lib. 7. cap. 11.

(10) Whether these were the very true causes, or some other, which drew these Danes hieher, most certaine it is and too lamentable experience shewed, that hither they came (by Writers account) of about the yeete of Christ eight hundred, and in the daies of King Erighelm. Neither want there Authors who ascribe certain predictions to haue fore-runne the yeere 800. made vnfortunate by their first attempts; fore-shewed seven yeeres before, by showes of blood falling from heauen, and bloody Crosses made therewith vpon the garments of men, reported by the learned Aluianus, who was instructor to Charls the Great, and borne in the ciucity of York, where this wonder happened: which himselfe saw & testified vnto Enkelbert King of that Province, as Malambury hath written, and was thought by Horden, Higden, Fabian and others, to haue bene sent for signes before their bloody affaires, which beganne at the day-spring of the Saxons Monarchy, when it promised a most faire al-scent to their heires succeeding, but mounted to the highest, againe declined as the setting Sunne, and fell vnder the cloudes of their owne ruine, so carried by the iust reuenging hand of God: for those

lames of their land and right, by blood and warre, were by these Pagan Danes so vncessantly molested, that no place was freed from their tyranny, nor any state sure, long to hold that, which they enjoyed, nor their liues secured from a daily expectation of their savage swords.

(11) Whole many insasions and cruell proceedings against this land and nation, are already shewed in the reigns of these Saxon Kings, who then felt their heavy brookes in warre, hauing nothing almost memorable otherwise, to enlarge their fames and floecies with, besides these their valours in resisting so mighty and almost vnrepugnable an enemie. Therefore omitting to repeat such things as in their successions are handled, we will fall neerer the time of the wished harvest of their full Conquests: some what remembering the Reader here, of those bloodie affaires, which the Engls at severall times felt and endured.

(12) Such was the murder of holy Edmund King of the East Angles, with Danish arrows martyred to death as hee stood bound vnto a stake, euer-calling on the name of Iesus: Of Ella and Osbert Gouernours of Northumberland by them slaine, and that Prouince for a long time after by them enioyed, and made subiect to their furies: Of Burdeth King of Mercia, by them expelled, who with his Queene Ethelfrith, were forced to abandon their Kingdome, leauing it to the possession of these Pagan intruders, and to seeke their securities in forreine Countreies, where at Rome in Italy hee dyed, and at Padua his wife, as hath bene said: Of Ethelred King of the West-Saxons, that in one yeeres continuance fought nine bloodie battles against them, in the last whereof at Merton hee receiued his death wound, and this Kingdome an vncurable blow: Of Elfred that most famous and learned King of the West-Saxons also, shruen by them to such distresse, that hee was forced to leaue his Princely Court, and to remaine secret in a poore Cow-hearts house vnknowne and disguised, in the life of Ethelone in the Countie of Somerset, and thence to aduantage himselfe among the Danish host, as a base Minstrell and Contemptible make-sport, till hee had perfectly learned their secrets, and after with his sword through the thickest of those Enemies, made a way to his owne most glorious Monarchie.

(13) To speake nothing of the desolations left in euerie Prouince, Towne, and Place, where they came, laying all leaue with the ground, as prints of their loote-steppes where they had troden: Their cruell and merclesse dealings towards holy and religious persons, with the iunation of Churches, and other places for Oratorie, is most lamentable to bee rehearsed or remembered: and among many others, the faire & beautifull Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterbore, Ely, and Collesingham, were made subiect to their desolations: In the last wherof, Lady Ebbe with her chaff Nunner, to auoid their usage and filthy pollutions, curse off their owne noses and vpper-lippes, least the baste of their beautes should prouee the bane of their bonodors & house.

The most greivous tribute and exactions laied vpon the poore Inhabitants in generall, and great sums of money, paid in such afflicted & vnfortunabie times, impuled by the name of Dane-gilt, did from ten thousand, arise to forty thousand pounds, yearly gathered for them in England. Their sturdy behaviour and Lord-like carriage against the Engls, in all places where euer they ioiournd, was with such subiection of the poore Owners, that they abused both wife, daughter, and maide, and were of all called the Lord-Dane, till lastly they were Lords in deede of the Land, and swaied the Scepter at their owne pleasures; which how it was attained vnto, we haue before declared, and how it was worne and continued, wee are now presently to speake.

CANVTVS THE FIRST DANISH KING RAIGNING IN ENGLAND AND THE THIRTIE FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER III.

An.D. 1017.

He failes of the Danes thus ouer-filled with the gales of their swelling fortunes, and themselves arrined at the Port of their long fought soveraignty, cast anchor as it were at the haven of their wished desire, and prepared themselves to a settled rest: for Canutus possit of halfe the Kingdome by composition with Edmund, now after his death seized vpon the whole, and that all things (as was pretended) might proceed with iustice, and concord, he called a Councell of the English Nobility at London; wherein was propounded, whether in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of title to the Crowne, had beene referred, for King Edmunds brethren or sonnes. The English that had paid a very deere rate for their ouerbold resistance before, not daring now to buy, with too late repentance, the wrath of this Dane, absolutely answered, No; and having learned to appeale Princes with flattery, offered their words against any such claimes, and tooke themselves the Oath of allegiance vnto Canutus; who beeing a very wife and politicke Prince, thought neuer the better of them for such their doings; whose truths thus failing towards their naturall Princes, could neuer (hee well knew) stand firme for him or his foereine posteritie.

(3.) But being thus cleared of all other opposites, hee prepared with great roialty for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Lynningus surnamed Elyssaw, Archbishop of Canterburie, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 1017. beeing the second King of Denmarke of that Name, the first of England, and the thirty fourth Monarch of this Land. His first designs for the establishment of the Crowne to himselfe and Danish issue, was a care to prevent others neere vnto the claime, and therefore, taking counsell with Edrike, brother of Edwin, who for his melancholy and regardless deportment, was commonly called, the King of Charles, son of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund; notwithstanding, hee was guilefully recalled, and treacherously murthered by his owne men, whose bodie they buried at Taneford in Deuonshire.

(1.) One cloud thus ouer-blowne, two others appeared, far more dangerous to Canutus sight; namely Edward and Edmund the sonnes of the Ironside, whom albeit their yongae yeeres might haue freed from suspicion of conspiracies, and their gentle dispositions from enuying his glory, yet the bright raies of a Diadem so dazzled his ielous eye, that euer he saw (to his owne seeming) the reflection thereof shine from their faces: but ashamed (such Hizden) to lay hand on them himselfe, sent them to his haife brother of Sweden, to be made away, as we haue said. In the doubtfull times betwixt Edmund and Canute, when the scale of warre was held of either hands alike, Queene Emma had sent Edward, and Affred (her sonnes by King Ethelred) vnto her brother Duke Richard of Normandy; whereby (we see) the Land was emptied of the English blood Roiall, and the Crowne left for the Dane without competition.

(4.) Who now seeking to hold fast the Scepter thus grasped, sought the alliance of the Norman Duke by the cōpousing of his sister, faire Emma; a suite sounding but harshly in the eares of the English, yea and most of all vnto her selfe, as deeming the linke of loose verie slender, that might bee broken by the same hand, which was the death of her Husband: Notwithstanding,

Canutus care and policies to settle his Crowne.

withstanding after good deliberation, knowing him childlike of my lawfull successor, vpon councaine agreed, that the life of her body by him, should inherit the English Crowne: the suit was granted, hoping also, if that failed betwixt them, to establish her other loones by King Ethelred.

This pious respect pleased the subjects,
that it both drew the hearts of the English vnto Canute, and their looe vnto Emma in a surpassing measure, as the booke penned to her praise, and written in that age, intitled Encomium Emmae, sufficiently doth shew.

Mat. 209.

(5) Neither was her louing care limited onlie to her sonnes, but further extended towards the Common-wealth, being much pestered then with his Danes, that lay lazie and idle as drones in the hie:
who at her intigations were sent into Denmark; &
left they should through discontents make any stirres either here or there, had a largesse (to buy their contentment) of fourecore and two thousand pounds.

(6) Canute his next cure for the maintenance of his owne safety, and the continuance of his new got Empire, was the establishment of good lawes (which if duly executed, are the very finewe and strongest guards of all States) to be administered and practised both on the English and Danes alike: wherefore calling a Parliament of his Peeres vnto Oxford, where established many wholsom Acts both for the Clergy and Laie to obserue, some of which were distinguished by the praise-worthy care of a studious Antiquarie, and a few as touching Religion, as a reliquie of the rest, we thinke it not amisse to giue the Reader a tall
of.

(7) And first, for the celebration of Gods most diuine service it was ordained, that all decent ceremonies tending to the encrease of reuerence and deuotion, should be vied as much required.

That vpon the Lords Sabbath, publicke Faires, Markets, Synods, Conuenticles, Huntings, & all secular actions should not be exercised, vnlesse some weighty and vrgent necessity required it.

That every Christian should thrice in the yeere address himselfe to the receiving of the blessed sacrament of the Lords Supper.

That if a Minister of the Altar killed a man, or else committed any notorious crime, hee should be deprived both from his order and dignity.

That the married woman consorted for adultery should haue her nose and eares cut off.

That a widow marrying within the space of twelue moneths after her husbands decease should lose her iointure.

(8) Theft & many other were made, whereby sinne was much restrained, and this realm peaceably and iustly gouerned. As likewise sundry other Countries were by his godly and toall cares, as is especiall is recorded of a young Gentleman of the Danish roial blood, named Odin, whom King Canute brought ouer with him into England, to be here trained vp in learning, where he profited so well, as also by his travells through France (whereby hee much encreased both his knowledge and experience) that he attained the surname of Sapient, and the Philosopher, and therefore was called Odin-cher, for the deepe echeane wherein all men held him. This man by his preaching in Finland, Zealand, Scandie, and Swe-dland, conuerted great multitudes to the faith of Christ.

(9) But in Denmark things proceeded not so well, for in the absence of Canute, and year of Christs humanity to 1019, the Fandals fore annoid his subjects:
hee therefore, in the third of his reigne, with a great host of the English passed ouer the sea, and bad his enemies battell, which as Matthew of Wymsinster writeth, went fore against him the first day and preparing againe for the next, Earle Godwine, who was Generall of the English, attempted a great enterprise: for in the dead of the night, hee with his souldiers set vpon the Campe of the Fandals, and with a great slaughter of their souldiers, made the two Princes, Vilue and Aslane to flee the field.

Canute ignorant of this acted enterprise, had notice in the morning that the English were fled, for that their station was left, and not a man founde wherefore following the track, euen to the enemies campe, by streames of blood, and dead bodies of the Fan-dals; hee saw the great overthrow that the English had giuen them, for which hee euer after held them in great estimation.

(10) Albertus Krantz, the Danish histon, reporteth that Olafus King of Sweden, having assisted Canute against Edmund the Ironside, and seeing himselfe
to be neglected in the composition betwixt them, moued such stirres in Denmark, that Canute was forced thither againe; where by the prowess of his English hee repulsed Olafus, who lastly was slaine by his owne subjects.

(11) William of Malmebury and Mathew of Wymsinster record, that in the yeere 1032, hee undertook an expedition into Scotland, with prosperous success against Malcolme the King thereof, with two other Princes called Malhelme and Teismar. But being at length overburdened as it were with his own greatesse, and surfeited with glory, which sometimes he had so greedily desired (as euen the greatest earthly delights haue their fumes) hee rested on a more placable course of life, and to assest a higher and heavenly glory, which hath neuer satiety or end.
And therefore his deuotion being great vnto God-ward, on a zealous intent, (such a zeale as S. Paul commended in the deuout Israelites) hee tooke a iourney to Rome, to visite the sepulchres of S. Peter and Paul in the fifteenth yeere of his reign; & thence sent his letters to his English Bishops and Nobility, beginning thus.

(12) Canute King of all England, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, to Albanus Metropolitan, &c.
Wherein hauing first set downe the reason of his pilgrimage to Rome, which was especially to honour
S. Peter, as hee had bene taught by Wijconen, that S. Peter had received from Christ the great power of binding and loosing, and was also the Key-bearer of heauen-gates, for which cause (left S. Peter should not open the same vnto him when hee should come thither) he held it most behoofull for him to procure his Patronage more then all the rest of Saints; then making relation of his honourable entertainment with the Emperour, Pope, and other forreine Princes, thence with what complaint hee had made against the excesseive exactions and huge summes of money extorted by the Pope from the English Arch-Bishops, at such time as they received their Pallies from Rome, for redresse whereof, and of other abuses, the Pope in a solemne assembly of foure Arch-Bishops, twenty Bishops, and an innumerable multitude of Princes and Nobles obliged himselfe: And thence proceedeth in vowing the whole remainder of his life and reigne, to the ouerly seruite of God, and due administration of iustice to his people; to which end, hee first giues command to his Counsellours, that thence forward they dare not, for whatsoever respect, to giue way or coniuinace to any the least iniustice in his Kingdom;
and next to his Officers of iustice, that as they tender his toall fauour and their own liues, they sweere not from Equitie in execution of their places, in respect of any man whatsoever, no not, for the enriching of the Kings owne Coffers, because (saith hee)
I hold it not needefull, that treasure should be heaped together for me, by any vnjust exactions: and to con-cludeth with a strict charge to all his Bishops and iusti-ces, vpon their allegiance both to God and himselfe, to take order in his absence, that Gods Church, and his Ministers, bee not defrauded of their Tithes and rights, whereof hee vovues at his returne to take a most seuer account.

(13) By this his great care of his owne saluacion, and his peoples tranquillity, we may see the zeale of those darke daies, to haue bene accompanied with the workes of true pietie; whose carnall applications of the spirituall texts, may well condemne these cleer-times, and daies of more brightnes, wherein wee know, that this Key-keeper of heauen, is no other but the verie Christ, who hath the Key of David, which openeth, and no man shutteth, and shutteth, and no man openeth. And that this Kings scale might bee further sente, by his magnifick workes, he beganne to manifest it even at Rome, where gaining many large gifts vnto S. Peters Church, hee also made free the Saxons Schoole from all tribunes.

(14) In Essex hee built the Church of Abdon, where hee had the victory against King Edmund. In Norfolk the Abbey of S. Benez, which saui he greatly reuerenced; and in Suffolke with an especiall deuotion built and endowed the Monastery of S. Edmund, which Saint he most dreadly feared: for it is reported, that the seeming-ghost of Edmund often affrighted him; for which cause, as also to expiate the finnes of his father, who had done great damage to his possession, hee incurred the same with a deepe ditch, and offered vp his Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. Most rich and roiall Jewels hee gaue the Church of Winchester, wherof one, is recorded to bee a Crosse, worth as much as the whole reueneue of England amonned to in one yeare: vnto Canterbury hee gaue the Arme of S. Augustine the great Doctor; which he bought at Bapa in his returre from Rome, and for which hee paid an hundred talents of siluer, and one of gold.

(15) The magnificent greatnes of this glorious King, is outflowed in the mouthes of his flatterers, that they extolled him, with Alexander, Cyrus, and Cesar, and to be possessed with power, more then humane: to conuict these his fawning over-prizers, being then at Southampton, he commanded (saith Henry of Huntington) that his chaire should be set on the shore, when the sea beganne to flow, and then in the presence of his many attendants; spake thus to that Element. Thou art part of my dominion, and the ground whereon I sit is mine, neither was there euer any that durst disobey my command, or breaking it, escaped vnpunished; I charge thee therefore presume not vpon my land, neither wet thou these robes of thy Lord: but the Sea (which obeyeth only one Lord) giving no heed to his threats, kept on the usuall course of tide, first wetting his skirts, and after his thighs; when suddenly rising to gage way for the still approaching waves, he thus spake in the hearing of all: Let the world inhabitants know, that vaine and weak is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy the name of King, but he that keeps both heauen, earth and sea in obedience, and bindeth them in the enchainling law of subiection. After which time he would neuer suffer the Crowne to bee set vpon his head, but presently crowned therewith the picture of our Saviour on the Crosse at Winchester: vnto such strong illusions were those godly Princes lead, by the guises that euer made gaine of their deuotions.

(16) From the example of this Canutus (saith Peter Pi Ganensis Chancellor of Paris) arose the custom to hang vp the Armes of worthy men in Churches, as offerings consecrated vnto Him, in whose battails they had purchased renowne, either by victory and life, or in their Countreys seruice attained to an honourable death. And surely, howe soeuer this King is taxed of ambition, pride and vaine-glory, for which some haue not sticke to say, that he made his iourney to Rome, rather to shew his pompe and riches, then for any humble deuotion or religious intent; yet by many his intercurrent actions and lawes of piety enacted, hee may iustly bee cleared of that imputation; as also by the testimony of Simon Monk of Durham, who reporteth his humility to be such, that with his owne hands he did helpe to remoue the body of S. Aspley at the translation of it from London vnto Canterbury, whom the Danes (notwithstanding his Archiepiscopall & sacred calling) before had martyred at Greenwich: and by the testimony of Gauis, Polydore, Langset and others, he was a Prince of such temperance and iustice, that no other in this West of the World was so highly renowned, or might bee compared vnto him in heroicall vertues, or true humiliry.

(17) Saxo Grammaticus, & Althelm Krantius the Writers of the Danish histories, deduce Canutus by a lineall succession through the line of their Kings in this manner: Hee was (say they) the sonne of King Swane (furnamed Ting) beg by Sigred his wife, the widow of Erck, by whom she had Olofe Skotterning King of Sweryden: vnto which Swane she bare also Ofrid a daughter, the mother of Thora, the mother of King Syngne the yonger. The elder Syngne was the sonne of King Harald, furnamed Baatand, by Gombild his Queene, who bare him also Ting King of Northumberland, and Gombild Queene of North-Wales. The father of Harald was King Gormund, whose Queene was Thora the daughter of King Eilfred, the twenty third Monarch of England, who bare vnto him the said Harald, and another Canute both most valiant Princes; which two Gallants inuading this land, were (for their braue resolutions) by their Grandfather proclaimed heires appaunte to all his dominions: the credie of which relations I leane to my forenamed Authours; but Canute (the elder brother) died very soone after, being deadly wounded in the siege of Dublin in Ireland; where perceiving death at hand, hee gaue first charge to his attendants, to keepe the same verie secret till the City were taken, that so neither his owne Army should be daunted, nor the enemy encouraged by the losse of the Generall. Gorme, his aged Father, (to digresse but in a word) so incredibly loved him, that hee had vowed to kill with his owne hands any person whoe soeuer that should tell him the newes of his sonnes death: which when Thora his mother now heard of, free vied this policie to make it known to the King her husband. Shee prepared mourning appaurell for him, and all other things fitting for funnell exequies, laying aside all Regall robes, and ceremonies of princely state, without inuiming any cause of this sad solemnity; which the old King no sooner perceived, but he lamentably cried out, woe is me, I know my sonne is dead; and with exertsue griefe he presently died. But to returne from that Canutus, to close vp the raigne of this our Monarch in hand.

(18) In whom the Danish glories hauing ascended to the height, beganne now againe to decline towards their wane by the death of this great King; who, after hee had in great glory reigned aboue nineteen yeeres, deceased at Shetisbury in the county of Dorset the twelfth of November, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, 1035, and was buried in the Church of the old Monastery at Winchester, which being after new built, his bones with many other English Saxon Kings were taken vp, and are preserved in gylt coffers fixed vpon the walls of the Quire in that Cathedrall Church.

His Wives.

(19) Aelgine, by most writers, a concubine to King Canutus, was the daughter of a Mercian Duke named Elsheime, who is said to haue bene Earle of Northampton; and her Mothers name was Ylfrune. Inheritor of the Towne Hampton in Staffordshire, from her called Ylfrun-Hampton, now Wellerhampton: This Lady Aelgine to make Canutus more firme to her loue, her selfe being barren, is reported to haue fained Child-birth and to haue laid in her bed the sonne of a Priest, whom Canute tooke to be his owne, and named him Swaine; him afterwards hee created King of Norway, which lately hee had conquered from Olofe called the Martyr. The like policie, saith Higden and others, others, then wiled in bringing forth Harold her second sonne, who was (say they) the sonne of a Sowter; notwithstanding I thinke the condition of the mother, who lived in disdaine, and died in disgrace, rather caused this report to be blazed, then any such balaines of birth in the sonnes.

(20) Emma, the second wife of King Canute, was the widow of King Ethelred the First; and from the time of her first marriage was called in England, Elsigine after the name of most of the former Queens, which had succeeded Saint Elfgut. Shee was married vnto him in the moneth of July, and yeere of Christ Iesus one thousand and fowerenteen, beeing the first yeere of his raigne: whose wife shee was eightene yeeres, and disuruing, kept still at Winchester, vnto which Church shee gave nine Manours, according to the number of those fure Plow-shares that shee was forced to goe vpon, for her purgation, in the raigne of Edward her sonne, as shall bee said. This Church shee adorned with many goodly vestures, and verie rich Jewelles: and deceasing in this City the sixt of March, the yeere of Grace one thousand fiftie and two, and ninth of her sonne King Edward raigne, was buried in the Church of S. Swithune neere vnto Canute her husband.

His 1st Iue.

(21) Sweyn, the eldest sonne of Canute by Lady Elfgine, was borne before his father was King of England, and before his fathers death, was constituted King of Norway, lately conquered from King Olofe the Martyr: where hee beganne his Raigne, in the yeere of mans saluation one thousand thurty and foure, beeing the eighteenth of his fathers Raigne in England; and after he had with dislikes ruled that Realme, the space of five yeeres, hee was reiected of the Norwegians his subjects, and deceasing without heire of his body, left the Kingdom to the naturall heire, Magnus, the sonne of Olofe, who had bene wrongfully dispossest by Canute.

(22) Harold, the second sonne of King Canute and of Lady Elfgine, was also borne before his father obtained the English Crown, & for his exceeding swiftnesse was furnished Hare-foot. He remained with his father in England, after he had dispoled of Denmark to Harold, and Norway to Sweyn, his brethren, expecting something in reuerfion. But perceiuing at his fathers death, that England was also appointed to his brother Harold, hee tooke the aduantage of his absence, and assumed the Souerainety of this Kingdom to himselfe.

(23) Harold, the third sonne of King Canute, and his first by Queene Emma his wife, was borne about the beginning of his fathers Raigne, and towards the end of the same, was constituted King of the Danes, and deligned to succede him after his death in the Kingdom of England: But beeing absent then in Denmark, was disappointed by his brother Harold, who succeeded his father, after whose death he also succceeded him.

(24) Gunkilda, the daughter of King Canute, and of Emma his Queene, was the first wife of Henric the Third, Roman Emperour, sonne of the Emperour Cosmo, the second of that name furnished Salke: shee was a Lady of a surpassing beauty, which either moued her husbands mind vnto lechouie, or the ouer-lustie report thereof to breede farmize of incontinencie; for accused shee was of adulterie, and to defend her causie by combat, none could be found, till lastly her Page, brought with her from England, seeing no other would aduenture for her innocencie, entered the list, himselfe but a youth, in regard of the other Combatant beeing a Giant-like man; yet in fight at one blow, cutting the sinewes of his enemies legges, with another hee feld him to the ground, where presently with his sword, hee tooke his head from the shoulders, and so redeemed his Ladies life. After which hard viage, the Emperesse Gunkilda forsooke her husbands bed, and by no meanes could bee brought againe vnto the same, but tooke the holy vaine of a Nunne in the Town of Burgen in Flanders, where shee spent the rest of her life, and after her death was buried in the Collegiate Church of S. Donatian, being the principall of that town; where her Monument remaineth besides the north dore of the same Church vnto this day.

(25) Another Lady of the like sanctity, is reported to be the daughter of King Canute, and the second wife of Godefricke Prince of the Fendels, by whom hee had Henry King of that Nation. They both are said to haue suffered Martyrdom for the faith of Christ; he first at the City of York, and the after at Nicholsburg, being most cruelly tortured to death with whips. This Lady vpon sundry strong inducements cannot be reputed legitimate, which moued Andrew Felley, a Danish Writer in our time, to be therein of a diuers opinion from Adam of Breue, and Helmoldus who liued five hundred yeeres before him, Fleming's.

ANVTYS being dead, & Hardecante his sonne by Queene Emma then in Denmarke, Harold his elder (but base brother) foreflew not the opportunity offered, for seeing himselfe in his fathers life time neglected, and by will at his death, England with that of Denmarke heaped vpon Hardecante: as quicke in apprehension, as hee was of footman-shippe (whereof arose the surname Hare-foot) made through his side by the Londoners and Danets, Mercians, & Northumbrians very many, yea and some great Personages amongst them, affecting his claime: but Godwin of Kent who had the Queene and her treasure in keeping, stood in his way, pretending himselfe Guardian of her Children, & the will of Cannus, who appointed his sonne by her to succede.

(2) The opposition grew strong, and the factions ripened, euen ready to feede, onely the lingering of Hardecante gaue leaue vnto Harold to better his side by daily supplies, and the feares of ciuill sedition moued the Nobility to argue with wordes and not weapons, the title depending betwixt these two brethren. At Oxford they met, where the presence of the one, downe-peized the absence of the other, so that their voices went onely with Harold, and presently proclaimed and consecrated him King.

(3) He began his raigne the yeere of Christs humanity, 1036. and was very solemnly crowned at Oxford by Elnoth Archbishoppe of Canterbury, though for a time, hee was very vnwilling to performe that seruice; for it is reported, that hee hauing the regall scepter and Crowne in his custody, with an oath refused to consecrate any other for King, so long as the Queenes children were liuing; For (said he) Cannus committed them to my trust and assurance, and to them will I give my faith and allegiance. This Scepter and Crowne therefore I here lay downe vpon this Altar; neither doe I denie, nor deliuer them to you; but I require by the Apostolike authority, all Bishops, that none of them presume to take the same away, neither therewith that they consecrate you for King: as for your selfe if you dare, you may usurpe that which I haue committed to God on this his Table.

Notwithstanding that great thunderclappe was allaid with the shewres of golden promises, of his iust and religious Government intended, though present experience manifested the contrary.

(4) For such the ancient Writer of the booke called Eucronium Emmae: Harold no sooner was established King, but that he sought means how to rid Queen Emma out of the way, and that secretly, for openly hee durst not attempt any thing against her: Shee in silence kept her selfe quiet, looking for the issue of his designs. But Harold maliciously purposing, took counsell how hee might traine into his Hape the sonnes of Queen Emma, that so all occasion of danger against him might at once for all be cut off: many praieles propounded, this lastly took effect: that a letter should be counterfeited in Queen Emma's name, vnto her sonnes Edward and Alfred, to iustifie them to attempt the crowne usurped by Harold, against their right, the tenure whereof we haue thought good hereto insert.

(5) Emma, Queene onely in name, to Edward and Alfred her sonnes, tenderth motherly greetings. Whilest feuerallly wee bewaile the death of our Soueraigne, my Lord and your Father, and your selves (deare sonnes) still more and more distressed from the Kingdome, your lawfull inheritance; I greatly maruaile what you determine to do, Emma.

Emma.

"dote, sith you know, that the delay of attempts
"gives the usurper more leasure to lay his founda-"dation, and more likely to set thereon his in"tended buildings; for incessantly hee posseth
"from towne to towne, and from Cisy to Ci"ty, to make the Lords and Rulers thereof his,
"either by threats, prayers, or preient rewards.
"But this in private they signifie, that they had ra"ther one of you their Natives should raigne over "them, than this usurper & Danish stranger. Where"fore my desire is, that either of you secretly, and
"with all speed come unto mee, whereby wee
"may advise together what is to be done in this so "great an enterprize: then whole good successe, I "desire nothing more. Falte not therefore to send "word by this my messenger, how you meane to "proceed: and so fare yce well, my dearest bowels, &
"very inwards of my heart.

(6) These letters thus carried and cunningly de"livered, were digested as favouring of no falsehood,
"and by the hingers, others returned, that Alfred
"should come shortly over to attend his mothers
"designes: these, brought unto Harold, the coasters
"were fore-laid, and longing expectation attended
"the prey. Alfred as forward to set on his voyage,
"made Baldwin Earle of Flanders his; and some few
"Bullies increasing his Fleet, hee tooke the seas
"for England: where coming to shore, Earle Godwin
"met him, and hindring his assurance with his
"corporall oath, became his lige-man, and guide to
"Queene Emma; but being wrought firme for Har-
"old, treacherously led these strangers a contrary
"way, and at Gosford lodged them in severall com"panies, making knowne to the King what he had "done: who forthwith apprehended them even in "their beds, and in the morning as chained prisoners,
"committing them to slaughter, contrary to the
"wonted manner of military decimation, did spare and exempt onely every tenth man for service or "sale: Prince Alfred himselfe was sent prisoner to

"the Isle of Ely, where hauing his eyes inhumanely
"put out, lived not long after in torment and "griefe.

(7) Some adde unto the former, as other,
"much more horrible kind of cruelty, as that his
"belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawn
"out, and fastned to a stake, his body pricked with
"sharpe needles, or poinards, was forced about till
"all his entrails were extracted, in which most savage
"torture hee ended his innocent life.

(8) Harold thus freed from one, the other hee
"thought would no further attempt; and therefore
"the more boldly set himselfe against their mother
"Queene Emma, whose goods he confiscated, and ban-
"nished her out of the Realme: who thus distressed,
"was honourably received, and for three yeeres space
"maintained by Baldwin Earle of Flanders.

(9) The Dane then seeing his hazards thus pre"vented, sought so to secure himselfe, and with six-
"teene shippes of the Danish Fleet kept the seas,
"which continued ever in a readinesse, and waded
"from Port to Port; to the maintenance whereof, he "charged the English with great paymets, to their no lit"tle grudge & repining; whereby he lost the looe of his "subjects before it had well taken root in their hearts.

(10) Neither yet held hee on long in these disor-
"diall courses, for that his speedy death did cut off
"the infamy of a longer life; and is said to have died
"at Oxford in the month of April, the year of Christ
"Iesus, 1040, after hee had reigned foure yeeres &
"some moneths: whose body was at first interred at "Westminster, hauing bene eether in warres so har"dy, nor in government so prosperous, as his Father,
"Cano before him had bene, nor left behind him ey-
"ther wife or children, to suruiue his person, or reuiue
"his name.

HARDICANUTE, THE THIRD D- NISH KING THAT RAIGNED IN ENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE SIXT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarch 36

CHAPTER V.

Aa.D. 1040.

Simeon Dunel.
Mat. W. Gifford.

He States of the land, afwell English as Danes, that had stood for Harold, both in obtaining and keeping the Crowne, now seeing him fallen, thought it best to make way for their peace, before Hardicanut
by his sword should purchase their subjection ;

therefore with all hast they sent into Denmark,
with proffers of the scepter, and their forward allegiance only unto him. Those parts beyond seas, were not then so subiective, as to build his hopes there vpon any sure ground; for the Norwegians had thrust out his halfe-brother Sweyne, and had elected Magnus the son of Oloffe for their King, so that small assurance could he perceive of any quiet common-weale among them ; and therefore fore-slowing not the offer, immediately imbarked his men of warre, and with so favourable a windooke seas, that he arri-ued vpon the coast of Kent, the first day after hee had set saile out of Denmark, and with great pompe conueied to London, was there proclaimed Englands
King.

(2) Hee beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Grace one thousand and forty, and was crowned in London by Elnothus Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury, being the thirty sixt Monarch of the Englishmen :
his raigne was spent in doing nothing, vntill hee will say, in doing euill hee did something.

(3) For no looner had he a power to command,
but he forthwith commanded the body of his halfebrother the deceased King, to bee digged vp, and with spottfull disgrace to bee throwne into Thames, where it remained vntill a Fisherman found it, and huried it in the Church-yard of s. Clement without

Temple-Barre, commonly called Saint Clement-Danes, for that (saith Stow) it was the burying place of the Danes : this crueltie shewed, was pretended for the hard vsage of Queene Emma his mother, though partly spiced with reuenge for his vsurpation
of the Crowne against him.

(4) Yet is worthily to bee commended, for the reuerent regard hee bare to his Mother, and louing affection to his Brother ; for no sooner was hee risen out of the throne of his Coronation, but that hee sent honorable Embassage vnto Earle Baldwine, with many thanks to him, for her princely vsage, and for her to returne into England to her former estate, and place of Queene. His brother Prince Edward comming ouer to visite them both, was most honorably receiued, retained, and dismissed ; and these were the vertues regardable in this King.

(5) But his vices were more, and concerned more personnes ; for a great Epicure hee was, and giuen much vnto Cuppes, whereby hee trained the body to belly cheere, and sense to bee subiect to sloth and drunkenesse ; foure times every day were his tables spred, and plentifully with all Cates furnished, care commanding that his courtiers, guests, and seruants, should rather leaue, for superfluity, then call for lack ;
which howeouer it was in him accounted for Riall boonny, yet it caused in the people (who vse to praise the Soueraignes vertues, but imitate his vices) a riotous loosenesse, and the Common-weale to lie sicke of consumptions, bred by such excess of those grosse humours in her body.

(6) This wrought in him a carelesse neglect of government in Seate, so that the whole managing thereof was committed to his mother Queene Emma, a woman extremely couetous, and to Godwine, the rich and pollicie Earle of Kent, who seeing the present state carried wholly away with present pleasaies, thought that a fittie subiect for him to worke vpon; for the King not married (vntill it were to his lewd will) and Edward likely to succede, of an oier soft temperatour; hee thought these both might proue aduantageous to his ambition, and therefore be thought him, how the crowne might bee worne by him or his.

(7) Therefore, to separate the hearts of the subiects from the Prince (then which, there can bee no greater a wound vnto both,) hee caused the King to impose heavy tributes vpon the English, onely to pay the Danes in his Fleet, appointing euery common Souldier and Mariner, to receiue eight markes in money, & euery officer and Master twelue, which amounted to the summe of thirty two thousand, one hundred forty seven pounds: for the payment whereof, there was so great a grudge, that two of the Collectors, Thurstan and Stender were slaine by the Citizens of Worcester, which caused their City to bee burnt, and part of the countrey spoiled by the Kings command, and their Bishop Alfred expelled the See, till with money hee had purchased his peace. This Hardi-canut (as was said) were deepe in the murder of Prince Alfred, the Kings half brother, whom we spake of; yea, and Godwin himselfe was put to his perigayn by oath, for the clearing of his suspitions in that treacherous and brutish fact: which oath was the lighter wrged, and the easier receiued for his rich and bounteous gifts, immediately before presented to the King, and that was a shippe, whose sterne was of gold, with foare score souldiers therein placed, all vniiformly and richlie suited. On their heads they all wore guilt Burgenets, and on their bodies a triple guilt habergeon, & sword with guilt hilts girded to their waistes; a battle-axe (after the manner of the Danes) on their left shoulders, a target with guilt bolles borne in their left hands, a dart in the right, their armes bound about with two beaclets of gold, containing fixteene ounces in weight.

(8) Amundus Bremonstrie writing the Stories of those times, sheweth, that the three sonnes of Canute were possided of the three Kingdomes, England, Denmarke, and Norway, though the father by Will, had disposed of the first otherwise; which moued Hardi-canute much to maligne the roialtie of Harald, whose Crowne by birth and couenant belonged to him; and therefore with great preparation, intending to reconer his right, hee entered the Sea, and came into Flanders, where hearing notice of the usurpers death, his rage was raised, and he peaceably came in, and receiued the Crowne.

(9) And that Swen (called the Younger) King of Denmarke, to assist his vncle Hardi-canute against Harald the usurper of England's Crowne, with a great Armie prepared thitherward; and taking the Seas, were by tempest driuen vpon the coasts of Hedlow, where his Armie doing some hurt, was set vpon and discomforted by the souldiers of the Arch-bishoppe: himselfe amongst them being taken prisoner, and brought into the presence of the Arch-bishoppe, was by him most honourably receiued, and conueied vnto Breme, who there entered a league with him, and with gifts and other complements, after a few daies, suffered him to depart; who likewise hearing of the death of King Harald, returned backe to his owne Countrey, where shortly after hee was much molested by Magnus the sonne of Olef, then reigning King over the Norwegians.

(10) Hardi-canute in England, hearing of those stirres, thought it his part to aid his Nephew King Swen, against the insualions of Canutus; and therefore hee sent one Swen his kinsman, with an Armie of the English, to reestablish King Swen in his Throne. These ended Norway, and the Field against the Norwegians, but by them were so ouerlaid, that hee left Magnus the vanquisher, and returned againe for England; but before hee could arriue the Shore, King Hardi-canute was dead, with whom dyed the issue of that warre; whose death was suddaine, and after this manner.

(11) At the celebration of a great marriage, contracted betwix a Danish Lord, called Cami-Franden, and Lady Githa, the daughter of a Noble-man, whose name was Osgot Clappa, in a solemne assembly & banquet at Lunden the eighth of Iune, reuelling and carolling amidst his cups, hee suddainly fell down without speech or breath: whose losse was the lesse lamented for his excessiue, riotousnesse, and vnnuoted exactions: but chiefly because a much better was then to succcede him; having himselfe had neither wife nor child that is read off. Yea, so farre were all sorts from bewailing him, that in regard of the freedome from the Danish yoke, which they attained by his decaise, euery fine among the common people; the day of his death is annuall celebrated with open pastimes in the streets (as the old Romanes kept their fugalia, for chasing out of their Kings,) which time is now called Holide of Hueside, signifying a time of forming or contempt, which fell vpon the Danes by his death.

His body with all due obsequies was interred at Winchester by his fathers, after hee had voluptuously reigned two yeeres lacking ten daies, and departed his life and kingdome the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1042.

(12) With the death of this King died all rule of the Danes in this land, and the sacred sparke of the Saxons fire (through three of their successions) buried in their owne ashes, begonne now to take flame and to burne most bright, which was Prince Edward (now commonly called the Confessor) the sonne of King Ethelred, and albeit there were others betwix him and the crowne, as namely, Edward and Edmund the sonnes of the Iron-side, yet the one dying in Hungarie without issue of body, the other there liuing as a banished man (by farname the Out-law) was neither so well regarded, nor thought so worthy of government, as this other Edward was, whom therefore they sent for, and with so great applause and acclamations proclaimed, that the precise ioy seemed to prognosticate a perpetuall happinesse to the English, who had become most miserably afflicted by the Danes, for the space of two hundred forty two yeeres, though this line againe failed, before it was well begunne.

SONNE OF KING ETHELRED, THE THIRTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, VER,

CHAPTER VI.

An.D. 1042.
Henry Blois.

Edward, the Third of that Name before the Conquest, half-brother to the deceased Hard-Cnut, and sonne to King Ethelred by Queene Emma his wife, was by the president care of a Mothers affection, (when the variable successes of Warre, doubtfully depended betwixt Edmond the English, and Cnutus the Dane) sent into Normandy to Duke Richard her Brother, there to bee secured from all domesticall stirres: and now, before the dead corps could be entred, with a generall consent of the Nobles was elected their King.

(2) I know well that in the legend of this holy mans life, more things are recorded, then with sacrifice of truth may be either beleaved, or deliuered, as that he was chosen King by consent of Parliament, when as yet he was in his mothers wombe, Ethelred his Father at the same time having many other sonnes alive; as also when the destroying Danes had extinguished by their warres almost the whole Royal issue of the English, the holy Monke Brighwald, of Gleesbury deploing their losse, and the Lands miserable estate, had in vision thus Edward, then an Exile, presented vnto him by the Apostle S. Peter himselfe, who then appointing him King in his sight, telling him that his Ruigne should be peaceable, and twenty three yeeres for continuance; Brighwald yet vnslaind who should next succeed, demanded the resolution, and was answered by Peter, that the Kingdome of England was Gods owne Kingdome; for whose successors himselfe would provide. With such vaine predictions our otherwise true Stories are over-charged; which moued Cassiodorus the worthy French Historian, to tax the English with our much credulitie that way.

(1) But most true it is, that the English Nobilitie disclaiming all Danish Subjection, presently vpon the death of King Harold, enacted, That none of their blood should any more raigne ouer them: putting thus their decree in execution by calling all Danes from the Castles, Forts, and Garrison Townes throughout all the Land, whence some euen of their Blood Royall were forced to depart. Then finding securitie into Normandy, with proffer of the Crowne: vnto Prince Edward, had his consant, and assistance of Duke William his cozen germane.

(4) This Edward (as elsewhere hath been said) was borne at 11 daye nexte vnto Oxford, and tenderly educated by Queene Emma his mother; and after his Fathers death, for safety sent into France, where, by his sweet conseruation hee gained the love of all, and as much himselfe affected those strangers, which was some blemish of policie in the face of his gouernment, when he had got the Diadem, as being of disposition ouer-soft, and euer too pliant (an imperfection in a Soueraigne) to take the imperfe of any stamp. In which moneth, the alpinge Godwin Earle of Kent, doth cutt the fabrick of his owne delignes; who had made away Alfred, his younger, but of a more resolute spirit, that to the basis of his owne pillar (whose top in time he hoped to crowne) might be set, if not vpon yet with the needfull to the Throne.

(5) Hee therefore, the forme both in will and power, vied both to establish Prince Edward in his right, and being seconded by Leofric Earle of Gloster, and Lyming Bishop of Worcester and indeed with the generall assistance of all the English, who now were so ialous of all foraine powers, that they forbade an ouergreat traine of Normans, (though comming for his aid) to attend their new-chosen King.

(6) His Coronation was at Winchester, with great concourse of people, and the celebration performed by Edmunde, Archbishop of Canterbury, vpon the very day of Christi his resurrection, (being also new-rising day to the English Nation) the yere of grace 1042. himselfe being aged then towards forty, and was in number the thirty seventh Monarch of England, where he reigned with such Justice & Piety, that he obtained the venerable name of Saint, and vnto posterities is distinguished from the other Edwards by the aduocet Confessor.

(7) In the entrance of his gouernment, to winnes his looe to his people, hee sought every way the furtherance of their wealth and afterwards remitted the most heauy Tribute of forty thousand pounds yearly gathered by the name of Danegut, which had bin imposed by his Father, and payed for forty years continuance, out of the lands of all, except only the Clergie, because, (say our ancient lawes,) the Kings repaier more confidence in the prayers of holy Church, then in the power of Armes. Then, from the distres Lower of the Mercians, West-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he selected the best, and made of them one body certaine, and written in Latin, (that all men of anie learning might know whereon to rely) to be the touch of his Common-wealths Pleas, and the iquie by which he would haue eaery right to be measured; being (in a fort) the fountaine of those, which at this day we terme the Common Lawes, though the formes of pleading & proceesse therein, were afterward brought in by the Conqueror.

(8) The raigne of this King by most writers records, was more spent in peace & works of true piety, then in warres, and blood, though some diffensions happened both domestical, and forreine: for about the yere one thousand forty five, and third of his Raigne, a royal Navy was rigged in Sandwich haue, against Magnus King of Norway, who then intended to invade England, and indeed had so done, if the wars of Swerea King of Denmark had not diuerted his purpose.

(9) This Swerea was the sonne of Duke Haste of Gifford his Duchesse, sister to Harde Canute, who as I had written in the manuscript of Almonius Bremensis, being in possession of two kingdomes, prepared his Na-uy for the conquest of England. But, (saith hee) King Edward, knowing that Kingdome with great Justice and Law, should rather be peace with proffer of Tribute, and promises that after his death the Crowne should be his, yet though himselfe should haue children: howbeit this seemed not to sound for truth; For Swerea finding his Ambassadors vnto Edward to craue ayde against Magnus (his greivous and mortall Enemy), could obtain none; and Harold Harfager, the successor of Atagnar, and enemy to Swerea, presently therupon lent vnto Edward for a league of amity, which was ratified firmly betwixt them.

(10) Neither may we think that earl hee meant his Crowne that way; for that besides the decree enacted against all Danish claims, his desire to establish it in the English blood is most manifest, by lending for Edward his Nephew, the sonne of Edmund Iron-side, remaining in Hungary, and that so loe out of England that hee was called the Outlaw; who comming oer, brought with him his wife Aethels, and children, Edgar his sonne, and Margaret and Christian his daughters; him Edward meant to haue made heire to the Crowne, had he not beene prevented by halcy death, whereupon the King deligned young Edgar, his sonne, the here apparent, and gave him the surname of Aetheling, a name of great honor appropriated to the Princes of the blood, and men capable of the Crowne.

(11) Besides these former attempts, certaine Danish Pirates entered the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-Coasts of Essex they spoiled, and in Flauaders made Marchandise of their prey. The 1150 likewise with thirty five shippes entered Swerea, and with the assistance of Griffith King of South-Wales burnt or slew all that they found, against whom Alfred Bishop of Worcester went and fought, but with such lucke, that many of his Souldiers were slaine, and the rest put to flight, which made the Willmors far more bold, and Keu, the brother of Griffith, make many incursions to fetch preyes out of England, till at length he was slaine at Bawden, and his head presented to king Edward at Gloucester.

(12) His domestical molestacions, were chiefly by Earle Godwin and his sonnes; and thole first springing vpon this following occasion. Eadgar the elder, Earle of Salisburie, who had married Goda, sister by the fathers side to King Edward, came into England to visite him then lying at Gloucester, and returning homeward, at Canterbury his Herberge dealing roughlie with a Burgesse for lodgings, caused his owne death; which when his Lord heard of, thinking for reuenge, he slew eighteen Citizens in the heat of his furie: the Canterburyans in as greata rage gotte them to armour, and slew twenty of his reuenc, wounding many more, and made the Earle to recoile; whose greivous complaint comming to the King, he commanded Godwin to see execution done vpon the offenders. Earle Godwin not haulte to follow his commission, aduised the King to examine the cause before he massacred his true subjects at the indignation of Strangers; whereat King Edward was highly offended, and Godwin thereby gained great looe of the Commons. This occasioned Robert Gometiesse a Norman, first made Bishop of London, and after Arch-bishop of Canterbury, to spread the Cartaine of disfauour betwixt Godwin and the King, vtiing his refusal as an Act of Contempt, wherein more dangers might lie hid then were to be suffered; whereupon Edward called an assembly of Eldates, appointing a day of meeting at Gloucester.

(13) The Commons (whose common gnise is, deedly to hate all strangers, though many times well deservuing) now seeing Earle Godwin in danger for their good, were easily drawne to assist him and his cause, and in warlike manner garded his person, at Borelstone not farr from the King. The Eldates assembled, and Godwin sent for, he refused to come, pretending sicke against the 1150, then ready to make inroades, and that his presence was more need-full there, then at Court; albeit the Welsh-men cleared themselves by sending their Ambassadors unto the King. The suspicions increasing, great preparation on both sides was made; to assist the King came Leofricke the worthy Earle of Chester, Seward the front Earle of Northumberland, and Radulfe Earle of Hereford his sister Gada sonne, by her first husband Walter de Maizay.

(14) To Godwin repaired his people of Southern and Kent, and to him were brought by Swaine his sonne, the men of Oxford, Somerset, Hereford, Gloucester, and Perk-shire; unto whom, Harald his other sonne, joined thole of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntingdon-shires, so that his host was exceedingly great, and his mind thereby so inflated, that from Langton, where hee lay, hee sent a bold and Traiterous demand to the King, to haue Earle Eustace of Bullainne with all his French and Norman (that kept then in the Castle of Doner) to bee delivered unto him, and his sonnes: which beeing (as good reason was) refused, the Battle was prepared, and brought to the verie point of hazard and ruine of all: For in that quartell were assembled the greatest Pierres, and Lords of the Land, the Kings loue swaying very much with many, but yet the hatred towards Strangers possessing the hearts of more. The beginning thus doubtfull, and the end like to prouide dangerous; the matter both with great fore-sight and providence was referred vnto Parliament, to bee holden at London with all convenient hall, whereunto pledges were both giuen and receiued on either part.

(15) King Edward strongly guarded with an Army of the Mercians and Northumbrians, entred London, and Godwin with his sonnes in warlike manner came into Southern to his owne house. But his Army waivering, and (as bad causes & consciences make men doe) suspecting the cause, by little and little shrank away from him: which knowne to the King, he presently pronounced sentence of banishment vnto Godwin and his five sonnes, without further proceeding by way of Parliament, as was determined. Godwin therefore with great riches and his three sonnes, Swaine, Tostig, and Guth, sailed into Flanders, and Harald with his brother Leofricke, from Briflow passed into Ireland; who were no sooner gone, but the King proclaimed them Out-lawes, and gaue the Earldome of Harald vnto Alger, the son of Leofricke, Earle of Chester. This Leofricke is he, which at his Connettes request freed the Cite Canterburie of their importable tribute imposed, as we haue elsewhere said.

(16) In the second yeere of *Godwin*s banishment, both himselfe and thole his sonnes with him, hane gotten ships conuenient for warre, in manner of Pirats came vpon the coasts of Kent and Suffolke, doing much harme, and returning with spoiles: the like did Harald and Leofricke from Scotland, vpon the western coasts of Somerset and Devonshires, who thence coasting about the point of Cornwall, joined their Fleet with their Fathers, in the Ile of Wight.

(17) Against them King Edward prepared, & himselfe, though aged, with a Naue of sixtie ships well furnished for warre, meane to haue made an end of that business, by the destruction of his aduersaries: but the Nautics ready to ioune battell, God tooke the cause into his owne hand, and with a thicke fogge so ouer-spread the seas, that one Fleet could not thereby see another; in which, Godwin and his complices by contrary winde were driuen to the place from whence they came. King Edward still in ialousie of *Godwin*s returne, rigged forth forty tall ships to secure the seas, which kept not so strong a watch, but that Godwin got by them, folliciting the people of Kent, Suffolke, and Surrey vnto his aid, and entering Thames, did the like vnto them in London, who accepted of this arriuage, though King Edward lay there: so that without disturbance his Naue fell vp with the tide, through the fourth Arch of the Bridge, & a mighty army to his aid mustered vpon the same side of the river.

(18) The Nobilitie then seeing side against side, and all of them meere English, ready to hazard their blood in the quarrels of strangers, wrought with Edward and Godwin, that they came vnto peace, and pledges were againe deliuered for the performance, whereof Wilmot the sonne of Earle Godwin, and Harold the sonne of Swaine his eldest, were sent to Duke William of Normandy: so great a trust hee euer reposed in strangers. This Swaine, vpon a remore of conscience for the blood hee had spilt, and especially for the slaughter of Beorne his colin & interceder, who shied to the King for his peace, undertooke a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and in his returne died in Leita, whether through an extremity of cold, or by the hands of Saracens, that spoiled all they met, it is vncertaine.

(19) Godwin now reformed, and in great credit with the King, cast the eye of disdain vpon the Arch-Bishop Robert (as commonly fauorits emulate each others, and himselfe being a man eloquent and politticke, so possessed the King both against him and his Normans, that he required his owne banishment, with theirs out of England, some few excepted, that were fauoured by the English: and now promising himselfe much honour and authority; was suddenly cut off by the stroke of death, surprising him as hee sat at Table with the King vpon Monday in the Easter weeke, but died not till the Thursday following, which happened at Winchester, where hee was buried.

(20) Besides these former forraine and ciuil molestations, other calamities happened to the land; for in the yeere of Grace 1047. and moneth of Ianuary, there fell so great a Snow, which couered the ground vnto the middle of March, that Cattle & Fowles perished abundantly: and on the first day of that Month the yere following, a strange and terrible Earth-quake happened, which seemed to rent the ground asunder, and withall such Lightning, as burnt vp the Corn, growing in the fields, whereby an excessive Dearth followed: so that his reign was neither so peaceable nor prosperous, as Brightwald the Monke dreamed it should be. But as all these were scourges sent from God vpon the Land for sin, so both Prince, Pastors, and people, had all generally their part thereof, as being iointly the causes of the same.

(21) For the King, in case of these Strangers, put the Land more then once in danger to bee lost: and himselfe restraining the bed of his vertuous wife committed thereby the offence forbidden by the Apostle, and caused her to have Queene, either to commit or be accused to haue committed adultery. The Clergie likewise altogether vallemmed, wanton, and vicious: for the Prelats neglecting the offices of Episcopall function, which was to tender the affaires of the Church, and to feed the flocke of Christ, liued themselves idle, and coauesous, addicted wholly to the pomp of the world, and voluptuous life, little caring for the Churches & soules committed to their charge; and if any told them (saith Higden) that their lues ought to be holy, & their conuersation without Countinues, according to the sacred prescript, and vertuous examples of their Elders, they would scoffingly put them off with, Nunc aliud tempus, alio pro tempore maren (Times haue mutations, so much means saluacion: and thus, saith he,) they plained the roughnes of their doings with smoothnes of their answers. Briefely, the whole people were so loose and riotous, that as Gervasius Doreboruensis recordeth, they fell so fast to commit wickednes, as to bee ignarant of Sins crimes, was then hold to be a great crime it selfe. And by the testimony of Malmsbury, the sinnes of those times evidently foretold a generall destruction: for the Englishmen (saith hee) transformed themselves into the strange manners of the French, and that not onely in speech and behaviour, but in their deeds, and Charters: their use was then to goe fantastically appointed, their garments reaching but to the mid knee; their heads shorne, and their beards shauen all but the upper lippe, which grew with long mustaches; continually wearing misse bracelets of gold about beat their armes, carrying markes upon their skines poured in of January Colours; and the Clergie contending themselves with triviall literature, could scarcely haue and keep the words of the Sacrament. These then were Englands dolorous times both of blindness & lewdnesse, drawing downe Gods wrath for their destruction.

(28) But howeuer this King is reported to bee losing and facile towards strangers, (which in it selfe is princely vertue if it be opportunely and warily vlied:) yet tobia owne Mother, and Wyfe, vnaturally ouerrigorous, imprisoning and berauing them both all Prince-like honour. Against Queene Emma, his Mother, were stigilg Robert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and Earle Godwin of Kent, the two greatest fauourites of the King. The causes objected were, her marriage with Canot the Capitall enemy of England; her regardlesse of succouring himself and his brother in their exiles, whom (as was alleged) shee continued to haue made away; and that vnder colour of priuilege deuotion, she had vied the company of Alfrine Bishop of Winchester ouer familiarly to her great dishonour and the Kings disgrace: for these and the like, hee took away all her Jewels, and other-buifance, and committed her to safe custody in the Abbey of Werewick.

(31) Indeed Almsbury doth tax her to haue been insatiably covetous, and that shee was more tenderly affectionate to her Daughters, then English children, whereby her loue was measured to their fathers. But for the imputation of her incontinencie, shee washed it off with as sharpe a trial as any that is recorded for truth, by vndergoing that ouer-hard law Ordalium, when in presence of the King her Son, & many of his Peeres, shee passed ouer betwene nine plough-shares glowing red hot, bare-footed & blind-folded, without any hurt: vying this speech to her leaders, as not knowing life was past all danger, O Lord when shall I come to the place of my purgation: but hauing her eyes vncovered and seeing her selfe secretly escaped, fell vpon her knees, and with teares gaue thanks to her Deliuerer, whereby shee recovered, both the loue and her former estate of the King, with the good esteeme and applause of the people: in memory whereof shee gaue nine Mannors (according to the number of plough-shares) to the Minister of Winchester, (wherein shee had that trial,) and adorned the same with many rich ornaments; likewise the King repenting the wrong hee did her, bestowed ouer the same place the Island (so then it was called) Portland in Dorsetshire, being about seuen miles in compass: for so the chance, in those daies, was, that whoeuer lost, the monks did winne.

(34) Neither were this Kings proceedings better with his owne Wife, howe soe forme haue cloaked that Fraud (so the Apollie termes it) vnder the faire robe of Chastity. For hee marrying Editha, a Lady incomparable both for beauty and vertue, in whole breest (saith Malmeburie) there was a Schoole of all Liberal sciences, refused her Bed: but whether it were for his debility, or hatred to Godwin her father, or loue of Virginitie, I determine not; but am fully perswaded, that the accusation of Adultery wherewith Robert the Arch-bishop did charge her, was more vpon enuy to her father, then truth of so foule a fact in her, whose vertues were so many, and so memorable, by report of Authors, that had often-times conference with her, doth thus of her relate.

There was giuen (saith hee) vnto King Edward for his Queene and wife, the daughter of Godwin, a most beautifull Damoyses, Eglia by name, excellent well learned: in her demeanour, and whole countenance of life a Virgin most chaste, humble, and conformed body, no way ianuarie of her Fathers, or Brethrens haubouring, but mild, meek, faithfully, and innocent, nor euer hurtfull to any, inasmuch, that this verse was applied to her:

Sicut Spina Roſam, vntus Godwinus Eglitam.
From prickled flake, as sweetest Rose.
So Eglia Rose, from Godwin greene.

All these notwithstanding, the King expelled her his Court and Bed, and that with no little disgrace; for taking all her goods from her, euen to the vttermost farthing, committed her prisoner to the Monastrie of Winton, attended onely with one maid, where shee, for a whole yeeres space almost, in teares and prayers expected the day of her release and comfort: All which vnprincelike and vn-Spoulike vage, as the King vnderstood, and said, was, because shee ought should not live in comfort, when as her Parents and Brethren were banished the Realm: as vnwill fencelessely, and vnderstanding a Saint, thus to punish the sinnes of the fathers vpon their children, contrary to the prescript rule of God, who by his Prophet complaineth against such iniustice, and regulateth it with this iust verdict, That foule that smeth shall die, and for her pure and vnviolated chastity, humiliate in his death-bed spake, saying, that openly she was his wife, but in secret ministered as his enemye sifter.

(35) Yet behold the blindness, and partiality of those times, wherein for this his only refusal of iustiall duties, the penulties of those that should haue shewed his true face to posterities, haue so embellished the portraiture and lineaments, that vnto the beholder hee seemeth now no mortall creature; his miracles and foretelling answerable to most of the Prophets. Which here to inferre in so worthy a subject and holy Kings life, were both to fill vp with a needfull surcharge, whole leaues of Times waste about, and to breed a suspicion of those other things in him, which we know for found truth; as was his gift from God, through his holy inuocations, and touch of the place affected, to cure the disease called Struma, now the Kings Eall, which vnto this day in his successors, hath been experienced vpon many such healings, by the touch of those gracious hands who haue held the Scepter, as Gods Viceregents of this most blessed and happy Kingdome. That hee had the spirit of Prophecie, many haue thought; as also the notice of his owne death, some constantly affirme; by a Ring sent him from Ierusalem, the same that hee long time before had giuen to a pilgrime: but the like with his other miraculous cures, his sight of the Danes destruction, and the Seuen Sleepers in the Mount Cellion besides Ephesus, with iustine ones, I leave to his Legend-writers, and Aluredius Rinalensis to relate, who haue written his many miracles with no sparing pen. Most true it is that of a little Monastrie dedicated to S. Peter in the west of London by the river of Thames, he made a most beautifull and faire Church, where he likewise provided for his owne Sepulchre, and another dedicated to S. Margaret, standing without the Abbey: this of Westminster he endowed with very rich reuenues, and confirmed their Charters vnder his Broad Seale, being the first of the Kings of England, who vied that large and stately impression in their Royall Charters and Patents: the very true form whereof, according to the rude sculpture of those elder times, we haue portrayed in the front of this Chapter, as we intend likewise to doe in the rest succeeding; whereof this vie at least, (if no other) may be made, that by benefit of those patterns, men may know from what Princes they first receiued the Charters of their ancient possessions and Patentes of their honours, which the Princes stile (many being of our name) cannot sufficiently make knowne.

The said Church of Westminster he built for the discharge of his vowed pilgrimage to Ierusalem, & that in such sumptuous manner, that it was in those daies the Pattern to all other stately buildings. He founded also the Colledge of S. Mary Ouer in the county of Devon, and gaue nois the Village of Ottery, and removed the Bishoppes See from Crediton to Exeter, as a place of farre more dignity; where the King taking the right hand, and the Queene the left, led Leofricke from the high Altar, and installed him the first Bishop of that See: Finally, when hee had reigned the space of twentie yeeres, six moneths, and twenty seuen daies; hee died the fourth of January, the yeere of Christ Iesus one thousand sixtie six, and was with great lamentations and solemnitie buried in his Church at Westminster, the morrow after the feast of the Epiphany.

Hee was of person well proportioned, of countenance lober, and of complexion faire; naturally courteous and gentle to all (and thereby too prone and credulous to suggestions) loving to his subjects, and over-loving vnto Strangers. A Prince of much vertue and integritie of life, notwithstanding which, had it not bene vailed vnder the fauour-shew of Chastitie, he had not so easily been canonized for a Saint; wherein yet the seeming wisdome taxed his wildome, whilst vnder a goodly pretext of Religion and vowed Virginity, hee cast off all care of hausing issue, and exposed the kingdom for a prey to the greedy desires of ambitious humours.

His wife.

Elixa, the wife of King Edward, was the daughter of Godwin, Duke of the West-Saxons, and Earle of Kent: her mother was Gith the sister of Sweyne the yonger, King of Denmarke; she was married vnto him the yeere of Christs humanity, 1041. and fourth of his raigne. She was his wife eighteen yeeres; and suruiving him lined a widow eight more, and in the eight yeere of King William the Conquerours raigne, died in December, the yeere of Christs birth, 1074 and was buried by her husband in S. Peters Church at Westminster.

HAROLD THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, THE SONNE OF EARLE GOODWINE, AND THIRTIE EIGHT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS LIFE, RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER VII.

The people sorrowing for the death of their King, and the Statesmen perplexed for choice of a new, Edgar Athelings rule was worthy of more vnpartiall respect then it found: for him they held too young for government: besides, a stranger borne, scarce speaking Englis: and withall, the prophesies of Edward touching the alienation of the Crowne, the Interest of the Danes, and the claim that Duke William made, (both by gift and consanguinity) bred great distraction of desires, and opinions; but nothing concluded for settling the Seate; no man either assuming or profering the Monarchiall diademe, because none had the power, or right to adorne therewith his owne head. In this Calme conference a sudden gale arose, which blew all the failes spread for that winde into one Port. And that was Harold sonne to Earle Godwine, a man (duly prizing his Whyle kingly ftate before wee toage, it fhall not be amiffe to lengthen his fhort reign with his A&ts and Life, as hee was a Subiect, both with and againft his Lord and Predecessor.

And growne againe into fauour with the King, carried himfelfe anwerably vnto both.

(1) Some iaculofly conceited, Edward without any caufe, banished Alger the fon of Leofrike Earle of Chesler, who with the helpe of the Irish and Welshmen, vnder the conduct of Gruffith an Irish Prince of North-Wales (who had married his daughter,) did much hurt to the Englifh, putting Radulph Earle of Hereford to flight, with the slaughter of five hundred men; spoiled the City, burnt the Minfter and became Mafters of mif-rule in thofe parts. Againft thefe was Harold fent, and with fuch manhood purfued his flying enemies, that paffing through North-Wales, vpon the Snow-hill hee pitched his Field: The Earle and Prince Gruffith, not daring to abide his prefence, fled thence vnto Smith-Wales, and again tooke into Hereford, whereof Harold hauing intelligence halfted thitherward (leauing fufficient in the Snow-donnet to mate the Welsh), and recouering the City, with a deepe trench and high rampire fortified it about, where for the fauing of more bloud (and not vngatefull to Alger, who without grudge had refigned to him his Earldome, and whole Ruonewes at his returne from exile) a peace was concluded, and at *Harold*s request, Earle Alger and Prince Gruffith were pardoned.

The Duke then hauing prefent warre with the Brittaines in France, tooke this his new friend and gaft with him for his companion at Armes, whofe ready policies followed with forward praftice, was him great estimation with the Duke, whereupon betwixt them a covenant was made for the refecration of the Englifh Crowne to the Normans, if it chanced King Edward to die without children, and the fameratified by *Harold*s corporall oath, with the affiancing of Lady Adeliza, the Dukes fift daughter, then a child and Harold a widower, which afterwards fell to his owne destruction, and the lands fubuerfion, as fhall be feid.

The originall of thefe two brethrens quarrels beganne at Wandfor, where in the prefence of the King they fell from words vnto blowes and that in fuch manner, as if relice had not come, Tofte had died; for which difgrace, hee fecretly hied him into the Marches of Wales, and neere the City Hereford at Porteflyth, where Harold had a houfe, then in preparing to entertaine the King, he flew all his brothers feruantes, and them cutting perccemeale into gobbets, falted fome of their limmes, and call the reft into vfeles of the meath and wines, lending his brother word, that hee had furnifhed him with powdered meates againft the Kings coming thither, which barbarous aft caused detestably his name to be odious vnto his Northmen, and was laftly repayed with his owne death.

rine and spirit, was violently borne into the river Thames, and so suddenly drowned. Thus much being premised of Harold before he was King; his raigne, life and death, wee will now addresse to declare.

(10) Edwards life ended, and nothing determined touching his successor, Harold the second day after, being the day of his buriall, made himselfe King, none of the Nobility disliking what hee had done; for courteous hee was of speech and behaviour, and in martiall prowesse the onely man, as Wales well witnessed, more then once, frended by affinity with many of the Nobles, and by his new marriage with Editha the daughter of Algar (sister of the Earles Morcar and Edwin, and late wife to Gruffith ap Ithelwyn Prince of Wales) hee expected to bee both sided and assisted, if his cause came either to trial or voice.

(11) And the time hee well saw fitted his entrance, for Sweyne King of Denmarke (most dread by the English) was entangled with the Swedes wars; and William the Norman (that made claime from King Edward) at variance with Philip the French King; the friends of Edgar in Hungarie, and himselfe a stranger, ouer young for rule: all which concurres made Harold without deliberation, or order from the state, to set the Crowne on his owne head, regardless of all ceremony and solemn celebration; for which his act, as a violator of holy rites, hee too too much offended the Clergy.

(12) The day of his Coronation was vpon Friday, the fifth of January, being the feast of the Epiphany, and yeere of Saluation to 566: none either greatly applauding, or disapproving his presumption, except onely for the omission of manner and forme; to redreeme which, and to regaine the good will of all; no sooner affirmed hee the state toll, but hee remitted or diminished the grievous customes and tributes which his predecessors had raised, a course euer powerfull to winne the hearts of the Commons; to Church-men hee was verie munificent and careful of their aduancements; and to grow more deeply into their venerable esteeme, hee repaired their Monasteries; but most especially that at Waltham in Essex, which hee most sumptuously new built, and richly endowed, giuing it the name of Holy Crosse; vpon occasion that such a Crosse found farre westward, was brought thither by miracle, et tradunt: and therefore hee chose out this place to powre forth his supplications, before hee marched to meete Duke William in the field. Moreover, to satisfie such Nobles as affected young Edgar inuirtute, hee created him Earle of Oxford, and held him in speciall fauour: in briefe, vnto the poore, his hand was euer open, vnto the oppressed hee ministered iustice, and vnto all men was affable, and mecke: and all to hold that vpright which on his head hee had set with an vn-cuen hand: and depriued him of, vnto whom hee was Protector.

(13) Three seuerall reports are affirmed of Edwards dispose of the Crowne: the first was to the Norman Duke, who made that the anker-hold of his claime; the second was to young Edgar, vnto whom hee was great vnckle; and the last vnto this Harold himselfe: for so saith Edmerus, and also Norriamus, who liued at the very same time, and writeth that Harold thereupon was sacred and crowned by Abelardus Archbishop of Torky; so that hereby hee is freed by some from the imputation of intrusion and wrong.

(14) His State thus standing, and his Subjects contentment daily increasing, presently it was somewhat perplexed by an Ambassage sent from the Norman, putting him in mind of his couenant, and oath, as well for the custody of the Crowne to his behoofe, as for the solemnization of the marriage contracted betwixt his daughter and him.

(15) Harold, who thought himselfe now surely seated in the hearts of his Subjects, and therefore also sure in his Kingdom, answered the Ambassadors, That hee held their Masters demand vnjust, for that an oath extorted in time of extremity, cannot bind the maker in conscience to performe it, for that were to iayne one fine with another; and that this oath was taken for feare of death or imprisonment, the Duke himselfe well knew: but admit it was voluntarily, and without feare, could I (saide he) then a Subject, without the allowance of the King, and the whole State, giue away the Crowne succession to the prejudice of both? surely a Kingdome is of a better account then to hee so determined in private onely betwixt two. With which kind of answers hee sent the messengers away.

(16) The Norman, who till then thought Englands sure to be his, and had deuoted his hopes from a Duke to a King, stormed to see himselfe thus frustrated on the sudden, and in stead of a Crowne to haue scornes heaped on his head; therefore nothing contented with this sleight answer, returned his Ambassadors againe vnto Harold, by whom hee laid his claime more at large; as that King Edward in the Courts of France had faithfully promised the succession vnto him, and againe afterwards ratified the same to him at his being in England, and that not done without consent of the State, but confirmed by Stigandus Archbishoppe of Canterbury, the Earles Goodwin and Syward, yea and by Harold himselfe, and so firmly assured that his Brother and Nephew were deliuered for pledges, and so that end sent vnto him into Normandy: that hee had now by come constrained, hee appealed to Harolds owne conscience, who besides his voluntary offer to succeed, contracted himselfe to Adeliza his daughter (then but young, and now departed life) vpon which foundation the oath was willingly taken.

(17) But Harold who thought his owne head as sic for a crowne as any others, meant nothing lesse then to lay it downe vpon parley, and therefore told them flatly, that howsoever Edward and hee had tampered for the Kingdom, yet Edward himselfe coming in by election, and not by any title of inheritance, his promise was of no validity; for how could hee giue the wherof he was not interested, nor in the Danes time was euer like to be? And tell your Duke (saide he) that our Kingdome is now brought to a settled estate, and with such love and liking of the English, as that they will neuer admit any more a stranger to rule ouer them. And as touching the contract with his younger daughter, hee well seeth, that God hath taken away that occasion of alienating the Crowne; and surely his Law hath likewise provided remedy against such rash words; whose precept I mean to follow: and therefore (saide he) will your Duke to weigh my estate with his owne, both his and mine now in quiet, sufficient for two, and either of them, employment enough for one mans Government, and therefore both of them too much to be well gouerned by one, seeing that God himselfe had set a sea betwixt them. With these and the like speeches hee shifted of the Dukes Ambassadors; without all princely entertainments, or courteous regard.

(18) The messengers returned, and Harolds answers declared, William lion-like enraged, casteth his thoughts about plotting reuenge, and making some oddes euen that might impeach his designs, prepared all things for open warre. Harold likewise not sleeping his businesse, made ready his Fleet, mustered his souldiers, and planted his Garrisons along the Sea-coast. But in these his proceedings, behold a great and fearfull Comete appeared (scidoun a signe to Princes of fortunate successe) vpon the twenty fourth of April, and lasted onely seven dayes, which drew the minds of the English, into great suspence, now ready to enter into a double warre.

(19) For as William the Norman for his part claymed Englands by right, to Harager the Dane did hy succession; the rumors of both which, greatly terrified the heartes of the inhabitants: and yet behold, a third terrour vnexpected, contrary to nature

ture, and most mens opinions, suddenly arose, for Tostig the cruel Earle of Northumberland, and brother to Harold, expelled by his people, and provoked by King Edward, fled into France, where by the instigations of William, whose wives sister hee had married (both of them the daughters of Balwine Earle of Flanders) he got for his revenge a Fleet furnished with men at Armes, and thus prepared; his first fury was shewed in spoiling the Iles of Wight, then coasting the shore, shrewdly endamaged Kent, whence hoiding faile, fell foule vpon Lincolshire; where Marcus and Edwine Earles of Cheshire and Yorkshire joined with the Kings Neice, droue him from thence, though with some losse of their men.

(20) Tostig for more succour fled into Scotland, where of King Malcolme he had but cold comfort, himselfe being bafled with ciuill broiles; but howsoeuer his expectation there failed, yet his purposes were continued with the assistance of Harold Hargreue (that is, the Fare-locker) King of Denmarke, who with three hundred shippes had entered the river Tyne for Englands invasion, after his conquest of the Iles of Orkney. Tostig therefore joining his Fleet to these Danes, in warlike brauerie, both of them enter the mouth of Humber, and drawing vp the river Ouse, at Richbald landed their men, making spoile of the Countrey whereoeuer they came. To meet with these, the foresaid Earles Edwin and Marcus, in a cumulous battail raised their powers, but were so ouerlaid by the Norwegians, that many were slaine, and more drowned, in passing ouer that river.

(21) The enemy grown proud by this late victory, halted towards York, the chiefe Citie of the North; where placing his siege, it was presently yeelded vp, and hollages deliuered vpon both parts for the performance of euocates. The Danes thus prospering, had most strongly encompassed themselves, for backed they were with the German Ocean, flanked on the left hand with the riuer Humber, wherein also their Fleete rid at Anker, and had on their right hand and afront the riuer Derwent, so that it seemed impossible to raise this siege.

(22) But Harold thinking the coast cleere from all danger, the Equinoxiall at hand, and Navigation now past, the victuals in his Fleet spent, and notice from Earle Balwin of Flanders; that Duke William meant not his voiage that yeere, was about to disband his Army. When this sudden newes from the North pierced his eare, no need it was then to bid him make haste thither, the case standing so neere him as it did. Therefore recalling his Army, posted to York, and from thence marched against the Norwegians, who lay secured with such advantage, as wee haue said. Notwithstanding Harold couragiously ordered his battell, and assaid to passe the Bridge called Stanford, built ouer Derwent, which one onely Dane made good for a time against his whole host, and with his Ax slew forty of his men, till lastly this Dane was slaine with a dart.

(23) The Bridge gotten, and the English reduced into their ranks, Harold most boldly let vpon his enemies euen in their Campe; where the battaile with equall valour and fortune, was maintained a time, till lastly the Norwegians dismailed and scattered, were slaine outright; and among them the two Chieftaines, Hargreue and Tostig, with many others of worth and account, lost their liues. Olave the sonne of this Harfager, and Paul Earle of Orkney, who kept their Fleet at Seas, whither his Father and followers sought vpon land, were brought to King Harold, and to haue their liues spared, abured the Land, and therewith to attempt no hostilitie against the English peace, and with twenty small vessells to cary away their slaine and hurt, were suffered to depart, bringing heavy newes into Denmarke of the losse of their King, and overthrow of his Army.

(24) By this victory thus happily obtained, fell vnto Harold an exceeding rich booty, both of gold and silver, besides the great Armado of Tostig and Harfager; whereby his mind was soone set aloft, and he began to grow both proud, and odious vnto his Army, the rather, for that he disaied not the spoiles vnto them that had dequered it; a wrong that the common Souldier doth continually murmur at, and commonly endure.

(25) Now in this current of King Harold's fortunes, William the Norman had the more leasure to strengthen his owne, and often conferring with his Captaines about Englands invasions, found them either resolute and cheerefull that way; the difficultie onely rellied, how to provide money enough, the very sinewes whereby the vast body of an Army must be knrt, & strengthened for a shildy being propounded vnto the assembly of the Norman States, it was answered, that a former warre against the French had empouered much of their wealth, that if new wars were now raised, & therein their subsistence spent to gain other victs, it would be thereby so waisted, as that hardly it would be sufficient to defend their owne; that they thought it more safety to hold what he had, then hazard of their owne to invade the territories of others; & that this war intended, iust though it were, yet seemed not necessary, but exceeding digreuous; besides (said they) the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to Military seruices in forrein parts, & therefore such paymets could not bee assild vpon them. And although William Fitz-Osborne, a man in high fauour with the Duke, and as gracious among the people, endeauoured by all means to effe it, yet, and (so draw on others by his example) proffered to set out forty tall Shippes vpon his owne Charges towards this warrey yet would it not bee: Therefore Duke William best thought him on another way.

(26) The wealthiest men among all his People he first for, and severally one by one conferred with, shewing them his right and hopes of England, wherein preferment lay eue to the meanest amongst them, only money was the want, which they might spare; neither should that be giuen, nor lent without a plentiful increase: with such fair words he drew them so on, that they stroue who should giue most, and by this policy hee gathered such a masse of money, as was sufficient to defray the warre: Then went hee to his neighbour Princes, namely to the Earles of Julius, William, Alayne, and Ballayne, promising them faire possessions in England, yea and vnto Philip the French King, in case he would aide him, hee voluntarily offered to become his vassall and Leige-man, and to hold England by oath and fealty vnder him. But it being thought nothing good for the State of France, that the Duke of Normandy, who already was not so pliable to the French King as was wished, should be entered in his estate by the addition of so mighty a Kingdom (the power of Neighbour Potentates being euer suspected of Princes) so farre was the King from yeelding any helpe, that he secretly malignd, & openly dissuaded this his attempt of invading England. This French jealousy, the Normans soone perceived, which made him to call about yet another way.

(27) For making his claime knowne vnto Alexander the second, then Pope of Rome, with the wrongs done vnto Robert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, by Harold and his Father, (a tear that might not bee read without a gloss) he was so fauoured of his Holiness (whose See was euer glad to interet itself in disposing of Crowns, that he both allowed well of his enterprise, and sent him a consecrated Banner, (Saint Peter himselfe had none such in his Boate) to bee borne in the Ship, wherein himselfe in that expedition should take faile for England, and accursed all them that thold opposite themselves against him: for euen then the Popes had begun to vsurpe authority ouer Princes, & with their leaden blades to hacke into the iron Swords of Emperours.

(28) Thus furnished on all sides, he assembled his forces, and with a mighty Navy came to the Towne of

of Saint Valerius, which standeth vpon the mouth of the Riuer Somewhere a long time he lay wind bound to his great discontentment, and with many vowes importuning the fauour of that local Saint, heaped daily number of gifts and oblations vpon his Altar; till lastly his desire was obtained, and then with three hundred Ships fraught full of his Normans, Fleminges, Frenchmen, & Brittaines, weighed Anchor, and with a gentle gale of wind arrived at Pevensey in Suffex, vpon the twenty eight day of September, where Landing his men, to cut off all occasion or hope of returne, he fired his owne fleet, and vpon the Shoare erected a Fortresse to bee if neede were, a retiring place for his Souldiers.

(29) At his arriuaage from Sea, as our Historians report, his foot chaunced to slippe, so that not able to recover himselfe, he fell into the mad, and all to be-mired his hands; which accident was presently considered for a lucky prefige: for now (said a Captaine) O Duke, thou hast taken possession, and holdst that land in thy hand, wherof shortly thou shalt become King: As Cæsar is said to haue done, when hee entered into Africa, who from ship-board as his landing fell into the sands, and merily said, I doe now take possession of thee, O Africa.

(30) From Pevensey Duke William departed towards Hastings, where raising another fortification, diuulged to all the causes of his coming, as pretending to reuenge both the death of his Normans, slain by the treachery of Godwinus & Harold, and the wrongs and banishment of Robert Gemetous Archbishop of Canterburie, pretences very slender, and enforced out of season: but surely had not a third fate nearer his heart, the two former would haue passed without the spleene of reuenge; namely, the donation of King Edward deceased, whereon he built his claim to the English Crowne. And there also by his Edict, he strictly charged his souldiers not in hostile manner, to wrong any of their persons, who shortly were to become his Subjects.

(31) Harold in the North hearing of these news, halted with his Armie (whose Armour yet reaked with the blood of the Norwegians) towards the south and with such power as possible hee could make, entred London, where immediately a messenger fro Duke William was preferred vno him, demanding no lesse then the Kingdome, and Harolds vassalage; vrging the same with such instant boldnesse, that Harolds furious indignation could hardly forbear, against the law of Armes, to lay violent hands vpon the Ambassadot; so great a pride and confident hope had entred the heart of this late Victor: to shew both, with very great boldnesse, he dispatched his Ambassadors to William, and by way of irefull checkes menaceth him, vnlesse forthwith hee departed backe into Normandy: when presently mustering his men at London, hee found them much lessened by his battaile against the Norwegians, notwithstanding, many Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the loue of their native Conntrey inflamed, did ingage themselves for the field, against his common and dangerous enemy. He therefore with an vndamted courage, led forth his Armie into Iustice (against the importunate suite of his mother, who sought by all means to slay him) where on a large and faire plaine, scarce ten miles from the enemy, he pitched downe his battailes, and sent forth his Espials to descry his power.

(32) These coming into danger, were caught by the Normans, and presented to their Duke, who commanded them forthwith to bee led from Tent to Tent, to be sealed, and dismissed, without any harme or dishonour done. These returning to Harold told what they had scene, commending the Duke in his Martiall Prouisions, and his clemency to themward, only said they, his Souldiers seem to bee Priests, for their faces were all shaven, whereas the vie of the English was then to reserve onely the vpper lippe vn-cut, retaining or renewing the old manner of the ancient Brittaines so described by Cæsar: but King Harold, who had bin in that country, well knowing their error, replied that they were men of great valour & stout Souldiers in fight. Vpon which speech, Gith, his younger brother, a man much renowned for martiall exploits, tooke occasion to aduise the King from being present at the danger of the Field: for (said he) it stands not with the rule of policy, to hazard all in the trial of one battell, nor to depend vpon the event of war, which ener is doubtful, victory being as oft gotten by fortune, as valor; mature deliberation doth oft produce the safest issues, & a prouided delay is held to be the greatest furtherer of martiall projects; whether will any thing strike greater terror into the Normans, then thou to be leuying, & enrolling a new Army, whereby they may euer expect, and feare succeeding Battails. Again (said he) thou best knowest what oath thine owne mouth hath made vnto William; if lawfull, and willingly, then withdraw thy selfe from field, lest for that thy sinne the whole Host perish; for there can bee no power against God. I am free from such guilt, and therefore may the bolder fight, and either defeat this dangerous enemy, or more cheerefully dye in the defence of my country, & if thou wilt commit the fortune of Battaille into my Governance, assure thy selfe I will perform to thee the part of a louing Brother, and to my Countreimen of a valiant Captain.

(33) This wise aduice notwithstanding, desiring to draine him, hee game stood, imputing it a part of dishonour, and not besitting a Souldier, (as hee alwaies had beene,) to leaue the field Coward-like, when greatest glory was to be wonne, or in case of fortunate successe, to be deprived of a part, and therefore reproached his brother for making this motion, and with disdainfull speeches, vnderualue and embated the worth of the Normans.

(34) Duke William now entred the field, & both the hosts standing ready for fight, the Normans, to spare the effusion of Christian blood, vpon a pious action sent a Meeke as a Mediator for peace, with offers to Harold of these conditions, either wholly to resigne the Kingdome vnto him, and from thence forth to acknowledge the Duke for his Soueraigne: or els in single combat to trie the quarrel with him, in sight of the Armaies; or lastly, to stand to the arbitrement of the Pope, touching the possession and wearing of the English Crowne. But Harold, as one whom the heauens would depeste, accepting neither domestick counsell, nor the Normans offers, referred the deciding of the matter vnto the Tribunal of God, and answered, that it should bee tried the next day with more swordes then one.

(35) That next day was the 14. of October, which vpon a credulous error, hee held euer to bee fortunate, because it was the day of his Nativity, and with hopefull assurance, desired greatly the approach of the same: His souldiers likewise as men whose heads were to bee crowned with the Laurels of victory, gaue themselves to licentious reuels, and in riotous banquets, with clamour, and noises, spent the night; whereas contrariwise, the Normans, more wisely, and seriously weighing the businesse in hand, bestowed the time in prayers and vowes, for the safety of their Armie, and victorious successe: neither had the morning sooner spread it selfe but their battell was ordered, and prepared for fight.

(36) Harold also with the like forwardnes, marshaled his battaile, placing in the Vant-guard the Kentish men (who by an ancient custome had the front of the battaile belonging to them) with their heavy axes, or halberts. The Attila-fex-men & the Londoners were in that Squadron, wherof himselfe with his brother had the leading.

37 His enemies Vanguard was led by Roger of Meungemery, and William Fitz-Osborne, the same consisting of Horsemen out of Essex, Perch, and little Brittain.

That will.

Their Maine-Battle consisted of Peasants and German, Giffrey Martell, and a German Pensioner commanding them: In the Ree-guard was the Duke himself with the whole manhood of Norman, and the flower of his Nobility & Gentry, all which battalions were intermixed with companies of Archers.

(13) The Normans without any confused, or disorderly shout, founded the battle, and advanced forward, discharging a fierce volley of arrows like a tempestuous hail, a kind of fight both strange, and terrible unto the English, who supposed their enemy had been already even in the midst of a-mongst them: when precisely a furious charge was given to the Va-ward of the English, who resolutely had determined to cover the place with their bodies rather than to give one foot of ground, and bending all their forces, kept themselves close together, whereby they valiantly, and with the slaughter of many, put back the enemy: which was so farre from daunting the Normans, that by it they were more whetted to re-enclose themselves upon them: when with an horrible noise, the battalies of both sides gaue the stroke, and now come foot to foot, and man to man, coped together in a most cruell fight. The English banding thicke, and close, as if they had bene flacke one to another, abode the brunt, and charge of the Normans, and with such welcomes, that after many a bloody wound received, they were at point to recolle, had not Duke William, whose crown lay now at stake, both brantly performed the part of a Leader, and with his presence, and authority restrained them. The fight thus continuing, the Normans boisterous brake into the troups of the English, and fore distressed the Souldiers on foot, yet notwithstanding they still held out, and kept their array broken: for Harold (no lesse carefull to keep, then the other to gaine a diem), as a most valiant Cap-taine bore him self worthily every where. The Duke well perceiving that with fine force, and true valour, no good end could be got, betooke him selfe to a stratageme, and commaunded his men to sur-render, but kept them still in such order of array, that they gaue backe in as good discipline as they came on.

(19) The Exigü supposing the Normans to have fled, and themselves the masters of the field, began in eager pursuit carelessly to warwl, and display their ranks, when on the sodaine, the Normans charging their wiiled opportunity, and winding about, charged the enemy a fresh who now being fearfully disranked and out of all order, were slaine down on all flides, not able to recouer their battaile; many thus borne downe and slaine, none by flight sought to escape the field, but rather to maintain their honour in Armes, call themselves into a round, choosing there to die in the case of their Countrey, then cowardly to forsake the Seandard of their King; and therefore with bold resolutions encouraging one an other, they turne head and refits long time: but showers of arrowes like a stormy tempest falling thickeamong them, one, moff fallall, and vnloquy for the Exigü, wounded Hareld into the benies through the left eye, so that falling from his horse to the ground, was vnder his owne standard slaine.

(40) And yet Girardin Cambresis (I know not by what inducement,) relates the issue of this Bataille somewhat otherwise, affirming, that Harold with loss of his Eye, but not of his life, from the field fled to the City of Weslesdier, and there long after led a holie life, and made a godly end, as an Anchorite in the Cell of Sainte James, built by the church of S. Iohn. With Harold died his Brethren Gyth, and Leofine, with most of the English Nobility, besides the slaughter of sixty seven thousand, nine hundred sevenety foure of their Souldiers: Bremocah hath an hundred Thousand.

(41) Duke William in this Battle had three horses slain under him; God (saith Mariannus) so defending his person, that though multitude of darts were thrown against him, yet not a drop of his blood was split by the Enemy, and this Battail wonne with the loffe onely of sixe thousand, and thirteene of fairs men.

Whose woddren bowes (as Iohn Rangle is of opinion) gained the Norwegians that great victory: for the An-tewes shot keell, or directly forward, wounded the English thus stood in the fronte, and vpright; the other shot on high, galled at the fal, those that were more remote, and the backs of such as stooped to sunne the dancer.

(42) This ozale was fought in Salfox 7 miles from Hasting, vpon Saturday the fourteenth of October, and yere of King 1066. Wherin the dolefull destruction of the English fell, and the glorious Sun of the Normans euen in the shutting of the day did arise when perished the Royall blood of the Saxons, whose Kings first had made this Kingdome into Norman, and afterward of them so glorious a Nomarchy, that it was not inferior to any in Europe, and her Monarchs so renowned for princely magnanimity as that many of them were ranked with the best in the world: But now the all-ordering hand of God (vato whose becke not only this Ball of the Earth, and the Rulers thereof, but euen the Heauens themselves, and all the powers thereof in all bow) either for the finnes of the English which were many, and great, or to graffe on more fair and longer continuing bud vpon this dried and decayed stock, brought that foretold offspring into this his nursery of Brittain, whose branches as the vine, haue spread both fruitful and faire; and whose roots are fastned as the trees of Eden: now the Kings thereof, euen from the loines of this Great Conqueror, holding on a royall succession for the space of these five hundred forty five yeares, their liffes ratched with the highest Cedars of the world, & their branches spread thoroughout all Christendome, which were pray may still procede and continue, whilst the Sun and Moone haue their being.

(43) This victory thus obtained, Duke William wholly ascribed vnto God, and by way of a solemn supplication or procession gave him the thanks; and pinching for that night his Panibō among the bodies of the dead, the next day returned to Walsings, there to consult vpon his great and most prosperously begun enterprize, giving first commendement for the buriall of his flaine Souldiers.

(44) But Mareux and Edwin, the unfortunate Queens Brethren, by night escaping the battle, came unto London, where with the rest of the Peeres, they began to lay the foundation of some fresh hopes, pulling thence their messengers to raise a new supply, & to comfort the English (who through all the Land were stricken into a fearful astonishment with this unexpected news) from a despairing feare, shewing the chance of warre to be mutable, their number many, and Captaines sufficient to try another Field. Alfred, Arch-bishop of York, there present, and President of the Assembly, stoutly and prudently gave his counsell forth with to consecrate, and crowne young Edgar Atheling (the true heire) for their King, to whom consented likewise both the Sea-Capitaines, and the Londoners. But the Earles of Yorkshire and Cheshire, Edwin & Mareux (whom this fearful state of their country could not dissuade from dissolute and ambitious plotting secretly to get the Crowne to themselves, hindered that wife and noble designe. In which while, the forswornall Queens their sister was couched to Wesst-chester, where, without lesse or trespasse of Queene, she led a solitary and quiet life.

(45) The Mother of the slaine King did not so well moderate her womanly passions, as to receive either comfort, or counsell of her friends: the dead body of her sonne she greatly desired, and to that end sent to the Conqueror two Lige Berthen of his Abbeys as Walsham, who had accompanied him in his unfortunate expedition. Their names (as I finde there recorded in an old Manuscript) were offred and Ailrie, whose message to the Conqueror not without abundance of teares, and feare, is there fit down in the tenor as followeth.

of the learned Knight, Sir
Robert Cotton.

"(46) Noble Duke, and ere long to be a most great and
 "mighty King: yet thy most humble servants, desirous
 "of all comfort, (as we would we were also of life) are
 "come to thee as sent from our brethren, whom this dead
 "King hath placed in the Monastery of Waltham, to at"tend the soul of this late dear faithful battell, (wherein God
 "favouring thy quarrell, he is now taken away, and dead,
 "which was our greatest Comforter, and by whose only
 "honestyfull goodnesse, we were relieved and maintai"ned, whom hee had placed to serve God in that Church.
 "Wherefore we most humbly request thee (new our dread
 "Lord) by that gracious favour which the Lord of Lords
 "hath shewed unto thee, and for the reliefe of all their
 "soules, who in this quarrell have ended their daies, that "it may be lawful for us by thy good leave, safely to take
 "and carry away with us the dead body of the King, the "Founder and builder of our Church and Monastery: as
 "also the bodies of such others, as who, for the reverence
 "of him, and for his sake, desired also to be buried with us,
 "that the state of our Church by their helpe strengthened,
 "may bee the stronger, and endure the firmer. With
 "whoe so humble a request, and abundant teares,
 "the victorious and worthy Duke moved, answered,
 "(47) Your King (said he) unwearied of his faith,
 "although hee have for the present endured the worthy pun"ishment of his faule, yet hath he not therefore deferred
 "to want the honour of a Sepulcher, or to be interred:
 "werit but that hee died a King, howsoever hee came by
 "the Kingdome, my purpose is for the reverence of him, and "for the health of them, who having left their wives and "possessions, have here in my quarrell left their lives, to "build here a Church and a Monastery, with an hundred
 "Monks int to pray for them ever: and in the same
 "Church to bury your King along therewith, with all ho"nour unto his great a Prince, and for his sake to endure
 "the same with great reverence.

(48) With which his courteous speech and pro-
 "misses, the two religious Fathers comforted, and en"couraged, againe replied.

"(49) Not so, noble Duke, but grant this thy servants
 "most humble request, that we may, for God, by thy leave,
 "renew the dead body of our Founder, and to bury in
 "the place which himselfe in his life time appointed; that "we cheered with the presence of his body, may thereof
 "take comfort, and that his Tombes may be unto our Suc"cessors, a perpetuall Monument of his remembrance.

(50) The Duke, as he was of disposition gracious,
 "and inclined to mercy, forthwith granted their de"sires: whereupon they drew out store of gold to pre"sent him in way of gratulation, which he not only ve-
 "terly refused, but also offered them plenty to supply
 "whatsoever should be needfull for the pompe of his
 "funerall, as also for their costs in travell to and fro;
 "giving strict commandment that none of his Soldi"ers should presume to molest them in this their bu"sinesse, or in their returne. Then went they in haste to
 "the quarry of the dead, but by no means could finde
 "the body of the King, for that the countenances of all "men greatly alter by death; but being maimed and
 "imbrued with blood, they are not knowne to be the "men they were. As for his other regall Ornamentes,
 "which might have shewed him for their King, his
 "dead corps were depoyled of them, either through
 "the greedy desire of prey, (as the manner of the Field
 "is) or to be the first bringer of such happy news, in "hope of a Princely reward; upon which purpose many "times the body is both mangled and dismembred;
 "and so was this King after his death by a base Sou"l-dier, galled and hackt into the legge, whom Duke Wil"liam rewarded for so valiantlike a deed, cashier-
 "ing him for ever out of his wages and warre. So that
 "Harold lying stript, wounded, blemished, and gored
 "in his blood, could not be found or known, till
 "they sent for a woman named Editha, (for her pas"sing beauty surnamed Swan-Neck, that is, Swan-neck,
 "whom he entertained in secret house before he was
 "King, who by some secret markes of his body to her
 "well knowne, found him out, and then put into a
 "coffine, was by dicters of the Norman Nobility honourably brought vnto the place, afterward called

 "Battle-bridge, where it was met by the Nobles of Eng"land, and so conected to Waltham, was there solemn-
 "ly, and with great lamentation of his mother, royally
 "interred, with this rude Epitaph, well befitting
 "the time, though not the person.

*Hen cadu hoste fero, Rex a Duce Reges futuro,
 Par par in gladio, postea in sepulchro.
 Firmis iussu laus est tibi Jace Calviti;
 Premier hinc superas, hinc superas eras.
 Ergo tibi requiem depoluit strumque perennem:
 Neque precor eum, quod exultet error Dron.*

*A fierce foe thou fero, then a King he King in view,
 Both peers both perished, both feared, and both few;
 That sad day was met, by Firmus and Calviti,
 Thine help thee to vanquish, other made thee Languish;
 Both now for thee pray, and thy Requiem say,
 So let good men all so God for thee call.*

(51) This Kings reign was not so full of dayes as "of great troubles: being but the space of nine months
 "and nine dayes, in whom was completed the Period
 "of the Saxons Empire in Britaine, after they had con"tinued from their first erected Kingdome by Henric
 "in Kent, the space of six hundred and tenne yeeres,
 "without any reversion or interruption during the "small Inter-Reignes of these three Danish Kings, of "whom we have spoken. And although Almond of "Breeme, in the favour of his Danes, sharply taxeth this
 "Harold as being an impious man, and for that by vi-
 "surpation he aspired to the Crowne, yet doth Edric
 "the Abbot of Rinmore, (the Legender of S. Edwards
 "life) much commend him for his courteous affabili-
 "ty, gentle deportment, and justice, and for his warlike
 "prerogative none matchable vnto him; and was reputed
 "(said hee) verily a man passing well furnished with all
 "vertues besetting a Sovereign commander, and borne euen
 "to repaire the decayed faith of England, had hee not in "the haughtinesse and opinion of his own valour and pru"dence, so much addicted himselfe to his owne resolu"tions, and too much neglected the wise deliberations
 "of his best friends and counsellors.

His Wives.

(52) The first wife of Harold, whom he had married
 "and buried before he was King, I find not named by
 "any of our writers, but that he had such a one, appea-
 "reth, where it is recorded that hee was a Widower,
 "what time he contracted the Conquerors daughter,
 "and that also he had children of such age, that they "made warres against King William in the second of his
 "Reignes; which it is probable, hee had not by Editha, his
 "Swarmeres next, but were legitimated, and by this law-
 "full, though namelesse Mother.

(53) Although the second wife to King Harold, was "the widow of Gruffith ap Iorwergh King of North-"wales, the sister of Edwin and Mercia Earles of "Yorkshire and Chester, and daughter of Alger sonne
 "of Loefric, son of Loefwine, all Earles of Chester, Lei"cester and Lincolne. She was married unto him beeing
 "then but Duke, in the last yeare of Edward Confessors
 "reigne, and of Grace 1065. neither did shee long en"joy him, or her Queens title, after his aspiring to the "Crowne; for being resident in London when hee was
 "slaine, from thence shee was conveyed by her bre"thren to Wylshester, where she remained in meane es"tate, and in good quiet (which usually most attends
 "the meane) without any princely shew or name, da-
 "ring the rest of her life, which lasted a great part of the "Conquerors reigne.

His Issue.

(54) Godwine the eldest sonne of King Harold, be"ing growne to some ripenesse of yeares in the life of "his Father, after his death and overthrow by the Con"queror

*Edricus
 in a Grotto in Glastonbury in Wiltshire.*

*Almond, Breem,
 chap. 119.*

Alfred Rinald, 1194.

Harold, tooke his brother with him, and fled over into Ireland from whence he returned, and landed in Sommerfeture, flew Edmuth (a Baron sometime of his Fathers) that encountered him, and taking great prey in Deuonshire and Cornwall, departed till the next year. When coming againe, hee fought with Thormo an Earle of Cornwall, and after retired into Ireland, and thence went into Denmarke to King Sweyn his Cousen-German, where he spent the rest of his life.

(55) Edmund, the second sonne to King Harold, went with his Brother into Ireland, returned with him into England, and was at the slaughter and overthrow of Edmuth, and his power in Sommerfeture, at the spoiles committed in Cornwall and Deuonshire; at the conflict with the Cornish Earle Bern; passed and repassed with him in all his voinges, iustations and warres, by sea and by land, in England and Ireland; and at the last departed with him from Ireland to Denmarke; tooke part with him of all pleasure and calamity whatsoeuer, and attending and depending wholly vpon him, liued and died with him in that Countrey.

(56) Magnus the third son of King Harold, went with his brothers into Ireland; and returned with them the first time into England, and is neuer after that mentioned amongst them, nor elsewhere, vnklesse, (as some doe coniecture) he be that Magnus who seeing the mutability of humane affairs, became an Anchorite, whose Epitaph pointing to his Danish originall, the learned Clementius discovered in a little desolate Church at Leues in Suffex, where in the gaping chinks of an Arch in the wall, in a rude and overworne Character, certaine old imperfect verses were found, which hee suppoeth should bee thus read;

*Clanditus hic Miles Danorum regia proles, Magnus nomen ei, magna nota Progenies.
Deposuit Magnus, prudenter induit agmina:
Progrete pro vita, sit parulus Anachorita.*

*Here lies a Knight of Danish regall race,
Hee Magnus his highest name note of great place!
But Magnus left an Aquies mould he prou'd it,
From world bereft, an Anchorite becaud.*

(57) Wulfe the fourth sonne of King Harold, seemeth to bee borne of Queene Algha his second wife, for that hee was neuer mentioned among his other brethren, and hauing better friends by his mothers side, was left in England, whereas they were forced thence; neither is he spoken of during all the reign of the Conquerour, and therefore at his entrance may probably be thought to haue bene but an Infant: yet after his death he is named among his prisoners with Earle Mercer (his vncle, if Queene Algha were his mother) and was by King William Rufus released, and honoured by him with the Order of Knighthood.

(58) Ganbold a daughter of King Harold is mentioned by Iohn Capgrave (the Writer of the English Saints) in the life of Wulfstan Bishop of Worcester, reporting her to haue bene a Nunne in a Monastery of England; who, among the many miracles done by the said Wulfstan (which hee nombreth by tale, according to the superstitious manner of the time wherein he liued) declareth, how he restored this Lady to her perfect eye-sight, wherof by a dangerous infirmity, she was almost wholly, and in most mens opinions, vncurablely depriv'd.

(58) Another daughter of King Harold not named by any Story-writer of our own nation, is mentioned by Saxo Grammaticus in his Danish history, to haue come into Denmarke, with her two brethren, to haue been very honorably intertain'd by King Sweyn the younger, her kinsman; and afterwards to haue been as honorably plac'd in marriage with Geryles, called in Latine Tarfleur, and of the Danes Waldemar, King of the Russians; and by him to haue had a daughter, that was the mother of Waldemar, the first of that name King of Denmarke, from whom all the Danish Kings for many ages after succeeded.

THE SVCCCESSION OF ENGLANDS MONARCHES FROM THE ENTRANCE OF THE NORMANS VNDER

WILLIAM THE CONQVSROR: VNTILL THE REGALL RIGHTS OF THE WHOLE ILAND WERE BY GODS PROVIDENCE VNITED VNDER ONE IMPERIAL DIADEME, IN THE PERSON OF OVR PRESENT SOVERAIGNE KING IAMES, SOLE MONARCH OF GREAT BRITAIN: THEIR SEVERALL ACTS, ISSVES, RAIGNES, ARMES, SEALES, AND COINES.

CHAPTER I.

Has hath beene spoken touching the Originals, Lawes, and Customes of the Saxons, and Danes, the ancient Conquerours, and possessors of this our Land, may in like sort bee said of the Normans (being a brich from the same roote) of whom wee are now to write, fixing only that the name is not so ancient, and therfore their Manners may bee thought more cruell. Through the misty-dark times of which Stories, together with that of the Romans, and of our Britainers, (wherein no brighter Sun did shine vnto vs) by the assistance of the all-seeing power which bringeth light out of darkness, I am lastly approached to these times of more light, and vnto affaires of more certaine truth: whose Current to my seeming is made now Navigable, by the many writers that haue emptied their full channels into this Sea: wherein, though in respect of my owne defects, and that so many Master-Pieces haue failed before me, it may seeme hnt presumption for me to direct another course, with a purpose to better what they haue so well performed: yet to make a complete History from the first to the last, giue me leaue to continue, as I haue begunne.

(2) These Normans then, being anciently a mixt Nation with the warlike Norwegians, Swedes, & Danes, tooke their Name of that Northern Climate from whence they came first, which was that Coast of Germany, anciently called Cimbrica Chersonesus, and Nor-way, for that it trodeth in respect of situation so farre Northward; and from hence, and the parts adjacent, the Saxons, Jutes, Angles, and lastly the Danes, made their incursions into this Land.

(3) This Tract therefore as the wombe of conception, by the dispose of the Omnipotent, after it had produced those Nations which formerly made Cōquests of Britaine, now againe brought forth (as it were) her last-borne Benjamin, who during the pray in the morning, hath diuided the spoile in the Evening, and hitherto continued their glorious fame achieued; which I pray, may extend to the last period of Times being: For these Normans first by force got footing in France with the Dominion, and Stile of a Duke, and next the Diadem of this faire Empire, the last and most famous Monarches of the same.

(4) These formerly practicing Piracies vpon the Coasts of Belgia, Frisia, England, Ireland, and France, proceeded in their hardy courses euen to the Mediterranean Sea: insomuch that Charles the Great seeing their roweing tall Ships, and considering the bold attempts they vndertook, with a deepe sigh, and abundance of teares, is reported to haue said; Heu mihi! At the very heart, that in my owne life time, these Pirates dare to come vpon my Coasts, whereby I foresee what mischief they will worke vpon my Posterity. Which indeede proued so great, that in their publicke Processions, and Letanies of the Church, this Petition was added, From the rage of the Normans, Good Lord deliver vs. This feare, and praier notwithstanding, they drave the French to such extremitie, that King Charles the Bald was forced to giue vnto Hasting a Norman, Arch-pirate, the Earledome of Chertsey, for to at-swage his furie exercised vpon his People; and againe, King Charles the Grasse, granted vnto Godfrey the Norman part of Neustria, with his Daughter in marriage: Yet all this sufficed not, but that the Normans by force of Armes leased themselves neere vnto the mouth of Sein, taking all for their owne that lay comprised betwixt that River and the River Loyre: which Countrey afterwards tooke the name of Normanny fro these Northern Guests, at what time King Charles the Simple, confirmed it vnto Rollo their Captain.

(5) This Rollo, as say the Danish Historians, was the son of Gaio, a great Lord in Denmark, who with his brother Gaurin were appointed to depart the Countrey (according to the Danish customes) to seeke their adventures abroad, and leaue more roome for the rest at home; but these refusing the order made warre vpon the King, in which, both Gaio the Father and Gaurin the Sonne, were slaine, and Rollo forced to fly for safeguard of his life, with whom went a number of Gallants to seeke Fortunes Cure, and not a few misdoers, or out-lawed men: whose Act in England registered by Albertus Krantius, seeing they vary from our owne historians in circumstances of times, and names, I haue chosen in this place to infer, leauing the credit thereof to him the Reporter.

(6) Rollo, a Nobleman of Denmark, (saith he) and too powerful in his Kings eye, was forced with a Navy to aduenture his Fortunes into foreine parts, whose first marriage, as he saith, was in England, where many of the Danish nobility had formerly tried their valours, and some of them attained to the Scepter, if not of the whole, yet of a great part of that kingdom. Indeed, (saith he) England from the beginning was not governed by one King, as now it is, for the Anglo-Saxons had their Province, and the Mercians theirs, both governed by Franciscall Deputies, but the Northumbrians had a King, as the Scots and Picts also in the same Island, had kept their own limits under the like Government. Amongst these Northumbrians the Danes had their chiefest abiding, and this Province Rollo the Dane brought first his men on Land, where making warre upon that Nation, he built both Castles and Fortresses to fortifie himselfe, his Navy lying upon the Seas, and proceeding forward into the Continent, took great booties both of men, cattle, and other spoiles, loading their ships as they lay at Anchor: the inhabitants of the Country making head against him, had still the worst.

(7) Rollo yet doubtful and in suspense what to doe, desired indeed to returne to his Country, but that the Kings indignation was an obstacle that way: next hee affected to try his Fortunes in France, yet feared the issue would be dangerous, the People being exasperated against him, for the harms he had done them: but chiefly the Diadem of England ran most in his minde, though hee knew the hazard was great, to match his small Forces with an host of a King: in which perplexed thoughts, it chanced him (saith my Author) to fall into a sweet slumber, and in his sleepe he seemed to see in the Kingdom of France, upon a high hill, bending his head forward to a Sinner which stood from the top of a mountaine, at the foot whereof beneath him, hee saw many kinds of birds, which waisted their ruddy left wings in the same water, where they all fed together, flew about, built their nests, and at times appointed, brought forth their young.

(8) Rollo awaking from his pleasing dream, imparted the same unto his consorts, desiring their iudgements for interpretation which no way satisfying him, hee called a Christian of his English Capteines, a man industrious, and of great Capacity, and of whose deep understanding he had a great opinion: this captive then boldened, (and willing in likelihood to divert Rollo from infesting England) told him, that his dream was significant and good, and did prognosticate the happy successe of himselfe and whole Nation: for by this he saw that he was shortly to receive a quiet possession, and a land of great renown in the Continent of France, and that himselfe should be cleansed in the Laver of Baptisme, wherein also the ruddy tinct of his People should be washed away, as the water had done the wings of the Birds.

(9) This interpretation pleased Rollo well, and he easily beleaved that which he most affected, as in the like kinde dreamers commonly doe: therefore providing all things for France, he set his countenance only that way; yet because hee had already performed great matters in England, he thought to follow Fortune for his best Leader, and before he departed from so fair a land, intended to sound the King by an Ambassage, that so, if he might find him inclinable to a league, he might have a refuge against future chaunces: if nor, then was he resolute to go forward with hisiourney: therefore making choice of certaine active persons, sent them to the English King, Alstan a Prince of a speciall religion and holines of life: these having audience, uttered their message as followeth.

(10) Wee being men distressed, and driven from our Country, sought out in banishment an habitation to rest in, and going forth, very many followed us, who encouraged us to seek and winne a land by Conquest, supplying us with strength and giving us great hope of victory: which thing when we refused to take in hand, a Tempest of weather drove us (O King) into these English Parts, where staying a few dayes to put us againe forth, the Winter witheld us, and our wants made us to seek further into the Land: whereupon our men, encumbered brought up to the warre, being well entreated of those inhabitants, were moved by such injuries to provide for their owne defence, wherein some small skirmishes have passed betwixt them. Our Prince therefore and Generall Rollo doth humbly require peace of thee, and to be permitted to sojourn in thy Land for a time, and to relieve his company with things necessary, wee paying sufficiently for it: these things when thou shalt grant, hee shall rest content and pacified, untill the next spring, at which time hee means to take his intended voyage.

(11) Alstenn, not ignorant of the Danish cruelty, and with how great Armies they might oppresse the English shiores, did readily grant what they required: And also added a further censure, saying withall, I doe greatly desire to see your Duke himselfe: and let him not thinke much to repaire to our mansions, for hee shall find none among it who his most loving friends. Wherewith was signified to Rollo, choosling out the tallest and goodliest persons of his company, and such as were of greatest wisdom, with them hee very ioyfully meeteth the King, is entertained, presents him with great gifts, but receiveth greater: Then sitting downe to talke and commune:

(12) I am (saith King Alstenn) right gladd, most worthy Duke Rollo, to see you in this my Court. The renowne of your Nation hath bene related to mee, a mortal kind of People you are, and unsight unconquerable. And you your selfe also for your prowess, are not counted among the rest of your famous Worthies: your valiant exploits are well knowne unto us: It is right pleasing unto us to enter with such men into amitie. Behold our whole kingdom is before you, choose out a state for your selfe, and your people wheresoever you best like, for wee will have an everlasting league between us.

(13) Rollo glad of so faire promises, replied: Most worthy and renowned King, I highly esteem of your bounty, and most liberall offers: God grant a happy successe of our affaires. I doe thinke my selfe most bounden to devoted to your worthiness, and if destine ever answer to our desires, we will not be without all for this your so great benignity. To seate our selves in your kingdom, though indeede we are very willing, and your Royall offers do much more incite us, yet Fate doth not permit it. I have determined, and will certainly performe, to goe into France. For your gifts bestowed on me, I esteeme them in the highest degree: and right well content I am to have a perpetual League with you that the like Fortune may betide us both, the one to be a safeguard to the other. Thus both offer, and accept of: I his League God grant may to us both prove happy and fortunate.

(14) With such like interchanges the time much spent, and night drawing on, they were brought to banquet: And early the next morning, coming forth of their lodgings, most lovingly embraced each other, when each gave & received presents best fited with their states and occasions. Neither doth Krantzim stay his penne there, but proceedeth to particular affaires betwixt these two Princes, without the concurrence of any of our owne writers.

(15) As how the English rose in Armes against Alstenn their King, taking opportunity of the time, for that Rollo (whom they knew to be joined in a most strait confederacy with their Soveraigne) being then employed in the warres of France, could not come or send to his aide: Alstenn therefore oppressed with a tumultuous kingdom, remembered Rollo his faithful friend, and sending Ambassadors declared unto him what distresse he was in, who not unmindfull of the firme league betwixt them, left his French warre, and prepared for England with all his Forces, where entering the Land, he easily quieted the tumultuous rebels, ransacking their Cities, curbing their wildenes, and so reducing them at last to an orderly subjection. For which his great loue, care, & pains, the King not vnthankful, resolved to requite him with the halfe of his kingdom, appointing the Cities and liming the bounds, which each of them should rule and governe as their owne possessions.

(16) Rollo in the meane time, as careful of the peace continuance, as regardless of so great remunerations, taketh pledges of the Rebels for securing their loialtie to the King, and peaceably beating towards himselfe, upon accomplishment whereof, repaireing to Alstenn he thus bespake him.

(17) Seeing (King Alstenn) you have so highly rewarded me, both with princely entertainment, and honour-

if all presents, I can doe w^{le}st, then willingly bestow vpon you these my p^{re}sents for your safetie: it is no more then your deserts doe challenge; neither will I accept, or seeme so courteous as to expect, for my p^{re}sents, any part of your dominion. Your selfe may well g^{ue}nerie it, for France calls for my presence: keepe therefore those your p^{re}sents, brought to you by your Subiects, and there is no doubt but you shall hence-forward g^{ue}nerie your Kingdome in a settled and contentful quietnesse.

(18) The King could not containe those his cies, which now beheld in a stranger so strange and vncustomed kin d^{ne}s, from refusing into teares: giuing him both heauy thanks, and rich gifts, seeing hee could not fillen on him any portion of his Kingdome: of whom, all that Rolle desired was this, that he would giue licence to such voluntary Souldiers as would goe with him into France: whereto Alfen, ready in all things to gratifie his desire, gladly condescended, and furnished him with attendants.

(19) But leaving Kranin the Dane, as likewise Gentheris the Norman, to f^{au}our their Country, & these their reports, so the best liking of the indiciou; most certaine it is, that the French King Charles, commonly called the Simple, gaue the Duchie of Normandy with his daughter Gilla (whose mother was Ægaine, the daughter of Edward the Elder, King of England) vnto Rolle the Dane, as is recorded in an old manuscript belonging to the Monastery of Angiers. And when Rolle was baptized, Charles receiving him for his God-sonne at the Font, he was there required to doe homage for his Dukedome received, and inioined therein to kill the Kings foot, which hee did, but with some disgrace to King Charles, and bound it with an oath that hee did not reuolie it vpon countree.

(20) This Rolle by his second wife Pepce (for Gilla died childlesse) daughter to the Earle of Byssin and Baleine, had a sonne named William, surnamed Long-esper, and a daughter called Girola, who was afterwards married to the Duke of Guian.

(21) William Long-esper (so called of the Long Sword hee usually wore) the second Danish Duke of Normandy, took vnto wife Sporta the daughter of Habert, Earle of Scutis, by whom hee had onely Richard his sonne: this William receiving baptism, received therewith a new name, and was thenceforth called Robert, who hauing gouerned his Dukedome with great moderation the space of twenty yeeres, was g^{ri}euously murthered by the working of Lewes King of France, to the great griefe of his people, who so far followed the reuenge, that they intercepted Lewes in the Cite Reimsburg, and deined him their prisoner, till he agreed to these Articles: That young Richard should succeed his flaine Father in the forsaide Dukedome; and that thenceforth when the King & Duke should conferre together, the Duke should bee girt with his Sword, and the King disabled either of Sword or kniue: to which Lewes yeelded vpon his corporall oth.

(12) Richard thus established, gouerned his Dukedome the space of fifty two yeeres. Hee was a man of an admirable fortitude, and therefore was called Richard the Hardy. His first wife was Agnes, daughter to Hugh le Grand, Earle of Paris, Lord Abbat of Germanis, and Father to Hugh Capet of France; but the dying issuelesse, hee secondly married Gunnor, a Gentlewoman of the Danish blood, (whom he had kept his Conscience before) by whom he had three sonnes and three daughters: the first was Richard that succeeded in his dominions; the second was Robert Archbishop of Raas; and the third was called Matiger: his daughters were Hauris, the wife of Geffrey Earle of Brittaine, and mother to Alane and Gaye his sonnes. Alane espoused Euldes Earle of Charters and Blais: and Emma called the Flower of Normandy was Queene of England, both by the English King Ethelred, and Cannet the Dane, to both which shee was married.

(23) Richard the second, surnamed the Good, was the fourth Duke of Normandy, and ruled the same for twenty foure yeeres: In whose time the Normans began to be great, and gracious in England, the marriage of his Sister making their way: his first wife was Isabel the Sister of Richrd Earle of Britaigne, by whom he had issue, Geffrey, the first Duke of Normandy, and Robert the first, William a Monk, and Nicholas Abbot of S. Andrew: his daughters by her were, Alies, that died young, and another of the same name married to Reinald, Earle of Burgaine, and Eleanor espoused to Baldwin the fourth Earle of Flanders, who bare vnto him Edwyn in the fifth, father of Mat that was Queene of England, and wife to the Conqueror.

(14) The second wife to Duke Richard the second, was Efrise, Sister to Conite King of England, from whom he purchased a Diuorce, without any issue begotten on her body; and then taking for his third wife a faire Gentlewoman named Pania, had issue by her William Earle of Argens, and Manger Archbishop of Reane.

(15) Richard the third of that name, and fifth Duke of Normandy, in the second yeere of his Dukedome died an vntimely death, not without suspition of Poyson, ministred by Robert his younger brother, who presently was inacted in the Dutche, for that he left no issue of his body to succeed.

(16) This Robert (Duke Richards Brother) was a man of a magnanimous spirit, and of such bounteous liberality as is vncredible. Hee comming to the City Phaleis in Normandy, chanced to see a most goodly and beautifull damosell, dancing among others of her familiar consort; her name was Arlet, of meane parentage (the daughter of a Skanner, lieth Higden) whose pleasing feature and comely grace so pleased the Duke, that taking her to his bed, he begot on her William his onely sonne, (who proued the onely man of the Norman blood) and after vpon a remorie of conscience, vnderooke a pilgrimage vnto Ierusalem, from whence hee neuer againe returned. Arlet in Roberts life time was married to Hersine a Norman Gentleman, but of meane substance, to whom the bare Ode Bishop of Baion, by his halfe-brother William created Earle of Kent, and Robert created Earle of Montaigne, a man of a dull and grosse wit, & a daughter named Emma, wife to Richard count of Auranches, (a Prouince in Normandy), the mother of Hugh Lupus Earle Palatine of Chester. And thus farre briefly I haue thought good to procure the Line of the Normans, for the better illustration of our English Stories.

(17) Duke Robert intending his pious pilgrimage vnto the holy land, assembled all his Nobility vnto the City Fifcan, where he caused them to sweare fealty vnto his sonne William, being then but seven yeeres old, committing him to the Gouernance of one Gillbert, an Earle of much integrity and prudence, and the defence of that Government vnto Henry the French King, and so in the eight yeere of his Dukedome, set on his voyage for Ierusalem; who entering Iurye, and not able to traualle, was born in a litter vpon the Saracens shoulders, and nere vnto the Cite, meeting a returning Pilgrime, desired him to report in his Country what hee there saw, which (said hee) that I am carried to Heauen vpon the Diuels backe: but so farre was he borne that he neuer returned, being preuented by death: which the Norman People hearing, made vse thereof for their owne ambitious ends, without any regard of young William their Papiill and Soueraigne, and grown into factions, greatly troubled the Peace of their Country, wherein Earle Gillbert the Protector was flaine, by Randolphus the young Dukes Cousin-Germane.

(18) The beginner of these strifes was another of his kinsmen, euen Guy of Burgaine, the sonne of Duke Richards daughter, brought vp with William in his youth, and euer in his most especial esteem, who, vpon a vaine hope to aspire to an Earldome, got the aide of the Vicounts Nizel, and Randolph, but tooke such a fall before he could ascend the highest Step, that in losing his footing he lost therewith his head.

(29) Strife also arose betwixt young William, and his Vnckle William the balc-borne Earle of Archie. Whereupon King Henry of France, who till then had held this Wolfe by the eare, fearing some hazzard to himselfe, if he should now let him go, thought it best to aid the Earle in his cause, and therefore sent him supplee vnder the leading of some men of note; but William so begirt his Castle with strait siege, that hee caused the Earle by famishment to yeeld vp his Fort, and droue the French with disgrace out of the field: where, with such successe he still prospered, that Henry now, to secure his own Confinnes, sent Odo his brother for Prefect, unto those Parts, that lay betwixt the Rivers Egys and the Seyn.

(30) William as watchfull as the French King was jealous, sent against Odo, Robert Count Ancestu, Hugh Gernacefus, Hugh Mountfort, and William Crispine, all of them stout Souldiers, which so bravely bare themselves, that Odo was the first man that made away, and the rest of the French saved themselves by flight.

(31) William that had sworne a league with King

Henry, and in his Minority had ever found him his gracious Guardian, was loth to endanger the breach of his Oath, or the duty that lone and deserts had obliged him vnto; and therefore by this Stratagem hee sought to dislodge the French. In the silence of Night when in the Kings Campe all were at rest, he caused to be cried aloud, the flight of Odo, and his discomfiture, with no lesse terrour then it was; which rang so thrill in the eares of the French, that Henry thought best to be gone: leaving William the absolute Lord of Normandie.

(32) Which he valiantly defended, and vprightly gouerned all the daies of King Henry: whose death presently caused an alteration of State; for he leaving Baldwine surnamed the Gentle, and fifth Earle of Flanders, Tutor to his young Sonne Philip, the quarrell betwixt those two Princes had an end; Baldwine on the one side so working his Pupill, and on the other the Normans, (who was as his sonne in law) that a most firme League was ratified betwixt them, and kept vniolared so long as William was a Duke: where wee will leave him in prosperitie and peace, and proceed in our intendment, as he did in his Conquest here in England.

hate engaged William to the Pope.

(4) William intending for London, being on his way, found the passage stopp'd up with multitudes of great trees, which by the policy of Fredericke Abbot of S. Albans, (a man descended from the Saxons noble blood, as likewise from Canutus the Dane) to secure his Monasterie from the destruction of the Normans, were so cut downe: wherat the Duke both wondering and fretting, sent for the Abbot, vnder his assurance of safe returne, and demanding the cause why his woods were so cut: Fredericke answered very boldly, I have done (said he) the duty both of my birth and profession; and if others of my rank have performed the like as they well might and ought it had not been in the power to have preserved the land thus free.

(5) William hearing the bold answer of this Prelate, and knowing it was now a time fitter to pacifie, then exasperate the English spirits, gave way to the present necessity, and withall halstaid (as good policy required) his conuocation, which at Westminster was solemnized vpon Monday, being the day of Christs Nativity, and yere of saluation, to 66. where he received the crowne at the hands of Alfred Archbishop of Torken, causing the Bishops and Barons to take the oath of allegiance vnto him; and himselfe likewise at the altar of S. Peters, tooke a soleame oath to defend the rights of the Church, to establish good lawes, and to see iustice vprightly administered, as became a good King; and thereupon chose for his counsell, such men as he knew to bee of great wisedome and experience: next, applying his thoughts for the security of his new gotten Empire, fortified such places as lay open to danger, belted strong Garrison vpon the coasts, & ships to ride in those Harbours which were most exposed to inuasion.

(6) And the better to assure the South of the land, (best serving his purpose, if any new troubles should arise) hee tooke his way towards Dauer, the locke and key of the Kingdome, as Matthew Paris terms it; that so hee might command the leas from his enemies arriuage, and ouerawe the Kenish a most strong and populous Province. When Stigand therefore Archbishop of Canterbury, and Eglsin the Politicke Abbot of Saint Angulines (being the chiefe Lords and Governours of Kent) vnderstoode of his approach, they assembled the Commons at Canterbury, laying forth the perils of the Province, the miseries of their neighbours, the pride of the Normans, and the wronges of the Church; all which now were too apparantly scene: the English till then, (they sayd,) were borne free, and the name of bond-men not heard of among them; but now seruitude only attend vs, if wee yeeld (sayd they) to the insolency of this griping enemy: Their two Prelates therefore, after the example of the vndannet Atachabul, offered themselves to die in the defence of their Country; whose forwardnesse drew the people vnto the like resolution, which by their aduertisements were assigned to meet a day, the place was Strawesombe, two miles west from Graves end.

(7) Where accordingly conuening, and keeping secret in the woods, they waited the coming of the Conquerour, all jointly agreeing, for that no way lay open (save onely a front, to carry in their hands great branches of trees, wherewith they might both keepe themselves from discovery, and (if need were) impeach the passage of the Normans: which device tooke so strange an effect, that it daunted the Duke even with the sight at his approach; who being, as be thought, free from the enemy, was now suddenly beset on all sides with woods, whereof seeing some before him to moore, he knew not but that all the other vast woods were of like nature, neither had hee leasure to anoude the danger. The Kenish incloding his Army about, displaid their banners, cut downe their boughes, and with bowes bent prepared for battle; so that hee which euen now had the Realme to his seeming in his fist, stood in despair of his owne life: of which his sodaine apprehension, the reuerend Prelates Stigand and Eglsin taking notice, & also aduantage, preferred themselves before him, and in the behalfe of the Kenish thus spake.

(8) Most noble Duke, behold here the Commons of Kent are come forth to meete and receiue you at their Soueraigne, requesting your Peace, their own freedom of estate, and their ancient lawes formerly vsed: if these be denied, they are here presently to abide the verdict of battaile, fully resolu'd rather to die, then to depart with their lawes, or to true serual in bondage; which name and nature is, and ever shall be strange vnto vs, and not to be endured.

The Conquerour diuen into this strait, and loath to hazard all on so nice a point, their demands being not vnreasonable, more wisely then willingly granted their desires and pledges on both parts given for performance, Kent yeeldeth her Earldome, and Cattle of Dauer to their new King William.

(9) All things established for Englands securitie, and subiection now to the Normans, hee ordained his halfe brother by the suter side, Odo Bishop of Baynes, (whom he created Earle of Kent) and his cosen William Fitz-Osburn (by him made Earle of Hertford) to bee Governours in his absence ouer the Realme; and in the Lent following sailed into Normandy, leading with him many pledges for their fidelity, besides other Nobles, especially such as hee feared to be too potent amongst whom, Stigand the Archbishop of Canterbury, the two great Earles Edwin and Morcar, Edgar surnamed Etheling, Frederick Abbot of S. Albans, Anselmus Abbot of Gloucestersbury, Walton the soone of the warlike Siward Earle of Northumberland, Roger Earle of Hertford, Ramolph Earle of Cambridge, and Gospatricke Earle of Cumberland, were the men of greatest note; yet was hee no sooner gone, but that Edrick surnamed Syluaticus (sonnet Alfred the brother of Edmunt Streuous, the treacherous Earle of Mercia) a man of great spirit, and of no little power, aided by the Welshmen, tooke vp armes and denied subiection to the Normans, so that by either part (as in ciuill discords it euer falleth out) great spoiles were made in many places; but most of all in Hertfordshire, where Robert Fitz-Seroupe left to man the Castle, did much hurt vpon the Tenants of Edrick, and he to requite him with the like, calling to his aide Methyn and Sywalmon Kings of Wales, wasted all to the mouth of Wyre.

(10) These furies in England called William out of Normandy, and were so distastful to his great, but ill digesting stomacke, that hee began to hold the reine straiter, and harder to curbe the headstrong English, giuing the possessions of their Nobles vnto his Normans, and laying vnwonted taxes & heauie subsidies vpon the Commons, so then nothing bred him more hatred, in so much, that many of them, to enioy a barren liberty, forsooke their fruitfull inheritance, and with their Wives & Children, as outlaws, liued in the Woods, preferring that naked name of freedom, before a insufficient maintenance posselt vnder the thraldome & tyranny of their Conquerors: but in short time, to sustaine their wants, (easily conceiued, but hardly indured) they fell to spoyle and robbe, that the high waies lay vtrod from towne to towne, yea and priuate houses euery where so guarded with bowes, billes, polaxes, swords and clubs, as if they had been not harbours of peace, but fortresses of warre; when praies were made at the shutting in, and opening of their dores, as in times of open hostilitie. On the other side, such as preferred vassalage with some hope of tollerable (yea, or vntollerable) wages, they to curry fauour with the Normans, learning to forget who they were, became as strangers themselves, and did shauie their beards, tound their haire, and in arment, behaviour, and diet, a together vnfashioned

12. 12. 12.

Danish army threw with so daunted the rest, that all of them gave backe and fled; Harald and Canute to their ships, & Edgar Atheling by swift horse into Scotland. Earle Waltheof, who with his owne hands had slaine many a Norman that day, was reconciled to King William, now left conquerour of the field; whole wrath was so kindled against these Norman disturbers, that he waited all the faire Country betwixt Yerke and Durham, leaving all desolate for three-score miles space, which nine yeares after lay vntilled & without any inhabitants, when grew to great a famine, that these Normans were forced to eate the flesh of men.

(18) The Conquerour after these troubles bare more hatred vnto the English, whose inconstancie (so late accounted their quenched desire of liberty) he daily dreaded, especially the Nobles, and men of power; whereupon he beganne to deale yet more roughly for light causes, thrusting out some of them into exile, and depriving more of their lands and goods, setting most part of euery mans reuenues into his owne possession, as gained by a lawfull conquest, causing them to redeeme them againe at his hands, and yet retained a propriety thereof vnto himselfe, by receiving an annual rent, and other prouisions and seruises, whereof if they failed, their lands were vnto him excruciated to the crowne; neither spared hee the Corporations of Cities, Townes, Monasteries, or Episcopall Sees; butooke from them their ancient liberties and priuiledges, whose redempcions let at what rate it pleased himselfe, soon weakened their estates, which was the only thing hee aimed at, and therefore often blamed Canutus for his ouermuch gentleness extended towards those, whom he had conquered, whose steps therein hee meant not to tread.

(19) He charged the Clergy with armour, horse and money, for the maintenance of his wars, wherein the Bishops and Abbots were taxed at very great summes, which hee caused to be registered and laid vp in his treasury: so that hee did not onely becaue their Abbeies and Monasteries of all their gold and silver, but, by the report of Roger Wandauer, laid hands vpon their Chalmes and rich shrines, and for their further vndoing established by decree, that no English Scholler should come to promotion. In which respect also, whereas King Alfred had, for the maintenance of many learned Douers, (which might in-crease his people in the Faith, in their owne vulgar tongue) founded a goodly Colledge in Oxford, to be maintained wholly at the Kings charges, which was accordingly performed, and really continued in all his successors reign: King William, desiring utterly to destroy the English tongue, and preaching therein; decreed, that the said annual expence, should neuer after be allowed out of the Kings Exchequer, to the great impairing both of learning and religion. To further all which proceedings, his holy Father Pope Alexander the second, set in a foote, lending two Cardinals, and a Bishop from the See of Apollonie, who in a Councell degraded St. Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, Egelwine Bishop of the East-Angles, besides diuers other Bishops and Abbots of the English nation, deprived for no euident cause, but onely to giue place to the Normans in fauour of the King.

(20) The ancient lawes of the land he abrogated for the most part, ordaining new, nothing to equall nor to easie to be kept; which his lawes although they neuerly concerned the English & therefore ought of them to haue become familiarly knowne, were notwithstanding written in the harsh Norman tongue, which they vnderstood not; so that many persons, partly by the iniquitie of the law it selfe, partly by ignorance in misconstruction, & often also by the sleights of Pleaders and Iudges, who might pretend for law what they list, were wrongfully condemned, to forfeiture of goods, lands, yea and also of life, and generally to inuagles with their vnkowne interpretation, and tortured with their deliaies, turmoules and trauesies, that they rather chose to giue out their suites, then to follow them with their endless vexations.

He caused likewise his Broad scale, wherewith he confirmed his Deeds and Charters, to be inscribed on the one side, to acknowledge him for the German Patron, and on the other, for the English King, as in the sculpture thereof, at the entrance of his history is seene, which beareth this sentie;

This Signe doth VWilliam, Norman Patron forer: By this the English him their King doe knowe.

(21) These snares of his lawes accounted the fetters of the Natiues, were by the Nobility sought to be cast off: for Edmon and Morcar, (the two stout Earles so often mentioned) faintly reconciled to the King not long before, combining with Fretherick, the bold and rich Abbot of S. Albans; set vp Edgar Atheling their Generall once againe, and set into a new conspiracy: William Lion-like storming at the looke, and regardless of allegiance of these vnfortunate subjects, daily with fresh attempts soddish- ing his peace, with a mighty power haltered against them, and armed aswell with the spiritual sword of Lausfrank, (then advanced to bee Archbishop of Canterbury) as with male of Leon, or coats of Steele, laid all barren wherefoeuer hee came; his opposites for their parts knowing his purpose, as desperately maintained what they had begunne, and fully were resolved to make the sword their Iudge.

(22) The King by his Spials hearing the increase of their power, and knowing to his relesse trouble, the vnwilling subiection of the English, entered consultation with his Archbishop, who as the babulous Sages, gaue him counsell somewhat to beare with their abuses, rather then to hazard the ruine of all in fight; and so farre prevailed in this his ad-vice, that an assembly was appointed to meet at Berkhamsted in the County of Hertford, where the King entering paeley with the English Nobility, far as did wind himselfe into their good opinions, (being a very politike, and faire-spoken Prince) that they all forthwith laid down their weapons.

(23) And hee for his part fearing to lose the crown with shame, which hee had gotten by the effusion of so much blood, gave his oath vpon the holy Euangelists, and the reliques of Saint Albans the Martyr, (the same being ministered vnto him by Abbot Fretherick) swearing to obseue, and iniolably to keep the ancient lawes of this land; & most especially those compiled by King Edward the Confessor, though (as the euent soon shewed) hee little ment to doe as hee pretended.

(24) Peace thus established, among other conferences befitting such affairs, it chanced that William to demand the reason how it came to passe, that his fortune should be in one daies fortune to subdue the English, which the Danes before him could not doe in many; to which question whilst each stood looking on others, expecting what to answer, the stout Abbot Fretherick stept forth and said:

(25) The reason thereof may easily bee giuen, if the occasion bee well weighed; for wondrously the land was defended by dint of swords, until that their warlike weapons vpon their godly deuotions, laid them from their fides vpon the Altars of Orisons, which through eueryling rest are greene very rustie, and their edges too dull now for the field; for, (said hee) the maintenance of martiall men, with a great part of this Lands reuenues, are daily converted to pious implements, to maintain and defend these holy vntaries, whose prayers puerce more deeper then the sword: and therefore thou art obliged a King, to maintain their peace, that haue bene the cause of thy so easie purchase.

(26) But William before the words were well out of his mouth replied and said, As the Clergy (saith and strengtheneth) that the land thereby both weakened of her men at Armes, and to keepe only the religious in Justice (but the Laity he expelled the usurers of the Dances, and other surerous Encumbers) surely out of your own mouths I will judge you, and for redress will first begin with thee: whereupon hee took from the Abbey of Saint Albans all the lands and revenues that lay betwixt Thorney and London-Stone. Abbot Frithrich, whose overbold answers had now offended the King, without delay called a chapter of his brethren, shewing them their approaching dangers, and to avoid the present storme, went himselfe to Ely, where hee delisted not from his woted machinations against the Conquerour.

King William with vs. 1000 advantage.

(26) This conference ended, and the Kings oath retrieved, the English Armes disbanded themselves, as dreaming they had now good Fortune by the foot and hoping the greatest stormes of their dangers were past, which precisely proved but a Vaioe harmie: for King William having compounded with the Dore that lay all this last Winter in Northumberland, and paid them a great summe for their departure, beganne extremely to hate the rebels, and with full resolution of their destruction, suddenly set upon them apart, which he durst not attempt, when they were united, for that slaying many, imprisoning others, and prosecuting all of them with fire & sword, wel was he that could be first gone.

The Tie of Ely broken against William.

(27) Edgar Etheling got again into Scotland, and Edwin Earle of Yorkshire following with the like intent, was slain in the way by his owne souldiers; Egeline Bishop of Durham, Mercar Earle of Chester, Siward (named Brun, and Hereward (a verie valiant Knight) got into the Ile of Ely, relying wholly on the advantage of the place.

This Hereward had received a hallowed sword, and benediction of his vncle the Abbot of Peterborough, and had most valiantly defended his owne inheritance against the Normans, and with no lesse courage withstood the Conquerour, being made captaine of those now assembled.

(28) But the King left delay should give them advantage, and harbor more of such his vnbrided subjects, with a great power halfted chithward, & stopping vp the East passage from all flight, or reliefe, drew a cutty on the west through the deepe Fennes, even two miles of length, where likewise he then built the Caille of wiche: against which, they in the Ile raised another of timber and turres, and called it according to the name of their Captaine, Hereward: at which place, many assaults & bickerings being made, but yet no entrance gotten, Mercar by boat elcaped out of the Ile, and in Scotland obtained by price, what these distressed could not by prayers: so that Malcolme the King, in reuenge of them, invaded Cumberland, and foraged all Thersdale: Hereward also went out of the Ile, and got a gallant crew of choise and youthfull souldiers, which stood most stoutly for the defence of their liberties.

The Scottish made Cumberland

The Abbot would hold his, however the rule is.

(29) In the meane while, the Monkes, oppressed with miseries, sued for mercy vnto the King, & Thersdale the Abbot repairing to Warrick, where William then lay, offered him entrance vnto the Ile, if hee would restore to their Abbey the ancient possessions: the King then reioicing, to obtaine this by wick, which Camster could not do by maine strength, accorded to the request, and in great hail, but no little difficulty, got into the Ile, where slaying a thousand of the Common sort, hee vied great cruelty against the better, imprisoning many, and discombing others, some of their hands, some of their eyes and some of their feete. Egeline Bishop of Durham hee imprisoned, first at Abington, then at Wykehamster, whose diet was either for sparing, or stomack to great in forbearance, or both (for both are reported) that ere long he died of hunger.

John Sen.

(30) Howsooner the Monkes of Ely kept their promise with William for betraying of the Ile, he contrariwise brake his for their preservation and peace; for by no means their priers would enter his earcs, till the found of seven hundred markes had opened the way, to collect which, they were forced to sell both the jewels and ornaments of their Church; which being brought to his receivers, there waited (whether by error or deceit) a great in weight, (for in those daies greater summes pallied by weight, not by tale,) whereof when the King vnderstood, hee in greare (but captious) rage, denied them all composition for peace, whereupon with much suite hee was entreated to accept of a thousand Markes more, to raise which, they disarmed their Monastery euen of things of necessary vie.

(31) But the English fugitives, who had gotten the Scots to stick to them, were not yet pacified, but entering into Cumberland, they waited the Country before them vnto the Territories of Saint Cathbert, & city of Durham, to meet whom, King William sent Gospatrick, who lately reconciled to his fauour, and created Earle of Northumberland, shewed the like measure of cruelty vpon the Scottish Abettors, as they had done against the English. The Conqueror therefore not a little moused against King Malcolme, for that his Country was a receptacle of his rebellious Subjects, and himselfe now the cheife Leader of the Malecontents into his Kingdome, halsted into Scotland with a desire and purpose, to haue done much more then hee was able to accomplish: for entering Galloway, hee more wearied his souldiers in passing the Marsh grounds and mountaine, then with encounter or pursuit of the Enemy, so that hee was forced to give over his enterprize, and then drew his forces towards Lothian, where King Malcolme and his English laie, being fully resolved, there to end by bataille, either his troubles, or his life.

A small piece of money winning made more to be paid.

The English entered Scotland but with small success.

(32) But Malcolme wisely considering the event of warre and that the occasion thereof was not for his owne subjects, but for a sort of foraine fugitives, beganne to thinke, that the wrongs therein done to another hee could hardly brooke himselfe, and sent therefore to William proffers of peace: whereunto lastly the English King inclined and hostages delivered vpon further Conferences, what time (as I take it) vpon Stone-more, not far from an homely hostlerie called the Spittle, a Stone-Crosse (on the one side of whose shaft stood the picture, and armes of the King of England, and on the other the Image & armes of the King and Kingdome of Scotland, vpon that occasion called the Roi-crosse) was erected, to shew the Limits of either kingdome, some ruines of which Metre-marke are yet appearing: for King William, granting Cumberland vnto Malcolme, to hold the same from him, conditionally that the Scots should not attempt any thing peiodicall to the Crowne of England, (for which King Malcolme did him homage, such Helier Boetius the Scottish writer) and the English being reconciled to his fauour, after hee had built the Caille of Durham, returned as cleared from all Northern troubles.

(33) But his Normans Dukeedom, stirred somewhat vnto rebellion, called King William into those parts, where, by the prowess of the English, hee loone brought all things to peace, and returned for England, better conceiving that Nation, especially of Edgar Etheling, whom hee courteously received and honorably maintained in his Court, allowing him a pound weight of Silver every day to spend; a rare example of a victorious Conquerour shewed vnto a man so vnconflant, (who twice had broken his oath of fidelity) and dangerous to be so neere vnto his person, being, as he was, a Competitor of his Crowne.

bellion vnto whom yielded Roger Earle of Hereford, his Brides brother, and Waltheaf Earle of Northampton, with many other Barons, Abbats and Bishops: But the next morning, when Earle Waltheaf had consulted with his Pillow and awaked his wits to perceive the danger wherunto he was drawne, repaired straightwaies to Archbishop Lanfrank, who was left Gouvernour of the Land in King Williams absence, revealing vnto him their Conference and Treasons intended, by whose aduice he went ouer into Normandy, and there with submissible repentance, shewed the King what these Lords and himselfe had intended.

(35) The Earles therefore of Norfolk and Hereford, whose state now lay open to chance, as desperate men tooke themselves to Arms, and fought how to vntie their two powers into one. This sudden sound of warre soone roused the Subiects, so that Waltheaf Bishop of Worcester, and Egelwine Abbot of Evesham having called to their aide Walter Lacie, and Peter the Sheriffe of Worcester, so manfully withstood Earle Roger that he with his Army could not passe ouer Seuerne to ioyne with his brother Norfolk: And he againe was so fore laid at, by Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and Geoffrey Bishop of Cantuaries, (who had assembled a mighty Army both of English and Normans) that they constrained him first to Norwich, where, in the Cattle he bestowed his Countesse, and thence fled himselfe into Little Britaine, whither shortly these followed.

(36) William now returned from Normandy and some reliques of Rebellion remaining in the West, he hastied thitherward, where, with small adoe hee got Earle Roger into his hands, and condemned him to perpetuall prison; the Welsh his Aiders (of whom also were many at the said Marriage) he vied with great severity (for of some he put out the eyes, of others he cut off the hands, hanged some vpon gibbets, and behead scaped back, went into banishment; neither Earle Waltheaf, notwithstanding hee revealed the conspiracy, escaped unpunished; for after that the King had taxed him with ingratitude (he having formerly restored the Earldome vnto him) he cauled his head to be chopt off at Worcester, (although he had before promised his pardon and life) his great possessions being his greatest Enemies; for he is reported to have been Earle of Northampton, Northumberland and Huntingdon, thought by the King to be fitter dignities for the Normans his followers; and the desire of a new Marriage, moued Iudith his wife not a little to set forward and hasten his death.

(37) These beginnings against the Welsh, King William prosecuted farther, entering into Wales with a strong Armie, as purposing a final end of those Domestickall warres, hauing so replenished England with his Normans, that hee now pronounced himselfe security and happinesse of State: To him therefore the Princes of Wales vnable to resist, performed their Homages at Saint Davids, and with their Hostages he returned as a victorious Conquerour.

But the Seas of these troubles now growne quiet and calme, and he at some leisure to thinke on future success, all on the sudden a cloud arose in the North, which hastily came on and threatened storme.

(38) For Sweine King of Denmarke, whose tide (to his seeming) flood firme for the Crowne, manned forth two hundred tall Ships, wherof his sonne Canute and Earle Hacon were Generalls; for his brother Godwin he had banished Denmarke, that basely tooke money to depart England some few yeeres before, notwithstanding his claime he made still, though, for money, still stopped by his Danes: For so faith their owne writers Adam Bremensis, that continual contention was betwixt Sweine and the Chastard, although (saith he) our Bishops by bribes would haue persuaded peace betwixt the two Kings: Yea and Malcolmebury, our writer, affirmeth, that William gaue bribes to Earle Hacon to begone; though Paris and Polydore report, that when these Danes heard that their fauourites were vanquished they turned their Sailes for Flanders, and durst not fight with King William.

(39) But now a lesse suspected, but much more vnnatural warre arose; for Robert, his eldest sonne, (set on by Philip King of France, who did greatly dread that so haile growth of the Conquerour) claimed Normandy by gift of his father, promised to him immediately after his Conquest of England; a Noble Gentleman surely, but of an ambitious and haile nature, prodigally spending and maintaining his followers about the compasse of his priuate estate; him Philip, & his own ill-nurtured Ambition, thrust forward, & Queen Maude his mother supplied vnder had, out of her own Coffers, and King Williams Reuennewes, so that with banners displayed hee entered Normandy in hostile manner, and there by force seized vpon diuers places to his owne vse, and so without respect of durifall patience gained by force the free-gift of his father.

(40) King William hearing of his sonne Roberts proceedings, was not (as great caule there was) a little offended thereat, and with a powerful Army hailed to Normandy: where neere vnto the Cattle of Gerbury, at a place called Archerbraye, he joined battle with his sonne; where the fight was fore and dangerous on both sides, the Generalls being such men as they were: but in the heat of the foot battels that fought it out resolutely, Robert commanded a power of horse to beate in vpon the Rereward of his enemies, and himselfe valiantly following, chanced to light against his owne Father, and with his lance thrust him through the Arme, bearing him off his horse to the ground. King William thus wounded & false, called for helpe to be remoued, storming to see his blood spilt in his owne land, and against his owne sonne, which neuer had bene in battailes of other countries, nor drawne by the weapons of foraine enemies, and in great rage threatened the reuenge: Robert that knew his Father by his voice, hastily slighted, and in his Armes tooke him from the earth, humbly desiring his pardon for this vknown fact, and forgiveness of his ouer-haile attempt; then mounting him vpon his owne horse, brought him in safetie out of the prelle, who hauing escaped so great a danger, and seeing himselfe for the present too weak to withstand the enemy, left the honour of the field vnto Robert, with the losse of many hisouldiers, flaine there both in the battle and chace, besides a great number that were hurt & wounded; among whom, William Rufus his second sonne was one, a man of a better temper, and more filial regard to his parents, and therefore more desirously and tenderly beloued than Robert; for which dishonour now done to his Father, and disloyalty for his vnnaturall armes, hee bitterly cursed him, and execrated the time wherein he begate him: howbeit, others doe write, that for his most vndanted courage at that time, issuing and ending in such dustifall and tender care of his fathers safety, hee presently forgave his former offences, and euer after had him in better respect.

(41) These sturtes thus qualished, and King William returned, he went forward with his former determination; for settling a further assurance to himselfe and successors of the English crowne, to which end, first on the east side of London (the mother City of the land) he laid the foundation of a stately & strongly fenced Cattle, or Magazine of warlike munitions, intrenched with a large and deepe ditch, now called the Tower of London; the surceyor of which worke, was Gundulphus Bishop of Rochester about the twelfth yeare of the Conquerours reigne, so much is lessened the antiquity of that Citadell, & credite of such, as would haue it founded by Iulius Caesar; vnto (perhaps) we would thinke that King William did (saith adoe some new fort to the former being built (saith Fitz-Stephen) with moer temper with the blood of beasts.

(42) Then to enrich his owne coffers (for hee is taxed by Malcolmebury to be exceeding covetous) he laid laid great subsidies vpon the land: and that the same might amount to his great benefite (though with the greatest grievance of the people) hee caused an exact survey to be taken of the whole kingdom, yea and of every particular part and commodity thereof: so that there was not an hide of land, lake, water, or wath, but he knew the valuation, the owners, and possessors, together with the rents, and profits thereof, as also of all Cities, Townes, Villages, Hamlets, Maneriales, and Religious houses: causing also all the people in England to be numbered, their names to be taken, with notice, what every one might dispend by yere: their substance, money & bandmen recorded: how many yokes of oxen, and plough-lands were in the Realme, and what scruiers they owed, who held of him in Fee; all which was certified vpon the oathes of Commissioners. This done, he exacted five shillings to be paid him for every hide of land, which amounted to an huge masse of money. The Booke thus made of currie feuerall survey, was commonly called the rowle of Winchester, (as being there at first kept) but for the generality, and ineuitable censure thereof, it by Authors named Liber Indulgentiarum, by the English, Domesday booke, kept to this day in the Kings Exchequer at Westminster: of which collection Robert, a Poet at Gloucester in ancient time, and ryme wrote thus:

(43) This exaction was gathered with such extremity, & paid with such impouercishing of the English, that they greuously ground vnder their miserable estate, whereby more hatred grew daile to the King, and his Normans, what loue apaine to themward was litte, that hee sought by all means to bring the English name, and Nation to ruine: for it was noted by Caister, and Raule, that no English man was permitted to beare any office of Credit, or Countenance in this Conquerours daies, and accounted it was a great shame to be called an Englishman, or to marry into their blood.

(44) These grieuances seeming vnaffordable, the English incited Mateldine King of Scotland once more to enter King William confines, walking all before him vnto the Ruer Tyne; against whom the Conquerour sent Robert his sonne, furnished Countreife, who marching with a mighty Army, made shew of doing much more then he did: this only being memorable, that neere to the mouth of Tyne be the foundation of a Castle, whereof the towne of New-Castle did after and take both her beginning, and Name, though long before that time there was a place called Mateld-Chiefe, because (as it should seeme) it had been either the habitation, or possession of some Religious Order.

(45) Neither was Spaine, King of Denmark, so quailed by his former expeditions, but that he had a minde once more to graipe at the English Crowne, preparing a mighty Armada that way, as was constantly reported and beleueed: King William therefore rectined a great power of French Souldiers with others, which he had lately brought with him from Normandy, to disburden himselfe of whole Charges, he appointed them to be maintained at the coles of the English, both for their wages, and other provisions, which was an other great burden vnto the English, though it long lasted not; for that the Danish King better aduising himselfe, gaue over the enterprise, and thereupon these Souldiers were discharged.

(46) Another grieue and offence he ministred against both God and man, for the fruitfull Country lying South from Sarisbury vnto the Sea, hee did people, pulling downe Townes, and Villages, with 36. Mother-churches, from mans vic, & Gods diuine service; & for 30. miles, laid open the country, some lay out of police, to haue safe arriage from Normandy in time of need: others lay, for boile, & for his own game in hunting, or to vte the words of Guiler Mapes, who liued immediately after, to dedicate the same vnto wild Beasts and Dege-game; which place called anciently Tienet, was ever since named the New Forrest: Imposing great penalties both pecuniary, and corporall on all such as offended in hunting his Game: in so much that he was then called the Father of wild Beasts, more fauouring them then the People his Subjects. But Gods iust iudgement not long after followed this so vnreasonable, and cruell act: for in this Forest, Richard his second sonne being goered by a Deere, (others say, blasted with a pestilent Ayre) was vntimely flaine: And Rafus his other sonne mistaken for a Deere was by chance shot thorow with an Arrow, by Walter Tyrell, Henry likewise his Grand-child by Robert Curtesy, while he hotly pursued the chafe, was stricken by a bough into the lawes, and as Ab-salon left hanging vntill he died.

Thus, no doubt, God punished his sinnes (even on his children, and childrens children) who had both taken away the places, and vte of his service, and also disherited multitudes of Christian people to their extreme poverty, for his vnliciat and superfluous pleasure: so that (as some then thought) the Earth it selfe also seemed to cry Reuenge, when as vpon the last of April, and fifteenth of King Williams Reigne, a most fearefull Earthquake, with a warring noise, did shake the ground.

(47) Other great calamities are noted to haue happened vpon his people, as burning teures strangely consuming the people: Murrins denouncing innumerable numbers of Cattle, abundance of mine, and concourse of water-floods beyond credite, whereby the hills were so softened to the very foundations, that some of them fell, and ouerwhelmed the villages which were in their way: most of the principall Cities of England much endangered by fire, and London especially, where the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul (as much as was combustible) was consumed to ashes; and if that may also be noted (which could not the least wonder) tame, and domesticke fowles, as hennes, geese, peacocks, and the like fled into the Forrests, and woods, and became very wild, in imitation of men, degenerating then into Inagues: for in those times euen the Churchmen (and therefore lesse maruall of others) became vnlike themselves: Walter Bishop of Dorham, bought of King William the Earldome of Northumberland, maintained manerthers, and was murdered himselfe. Ode, another Bishop of Earle also to reuenge his death, made Northumberland desolate, & beheading and dismembering the poorer sort, and at great ranfomes sining the rich, and Pope Gregory for his part paid Ree in this land, sending higher his Bulls with damning curses against the married Clergie: commanding that none should heare their Masses: which how it was disgusted, either by God, or man; let vs beare Paris an ancient Monke (and therefore herein no partiall man) speake his mind.

"(48) Pope Gregory in a general Synode excluded
the married Priests from execution of their holie offices, and forbids the Lay-men to heare their Masses; a president new, and proceeding (as it seemed to many) out of inconsiderate judgement, contrary to the sentence of the holy Fathers: which have written, that the Sacraments of the church by the inuisible operation of the holy Ghost, have their due effect, whether they are dispensed by men good or bad, &c. By which fact so grievous a scandal is arisen, that holy Church was nearer rent with a greater schisme in the time of any he-resie whatsoever, whies some stand for the right, and others strive against it. Moreover, whereas few obsecr this chastic enioined (for that though some for gaine, or vaine-glory, doe hypocritically pretend it; yet many doe heape vp in-continency with perjury, and manifold adulteries)
by this occasion the Lay-men shake off all due respect to sacred orders and ecclesiastical gouerne-ment, they prophane the holy mysteries, they baptize Infants, anointing them with the fildid humor of their ears in stead of holy oyle, they burn
the tiches due to the Priests, out Lords, body consecrated by a married priest, they tread vnder their feet, and often doe wilfully cast forth the blood of our Lord vpon the ground.

"(49) This Gregory (before called Hildebrand) liue in Peters chaire with such pranks of impietie, that his gouernment was odious to the Romans, who wished an end of his raigne and life, so that certaine Southsiders imploied in that busines gave forth, that after Gregory, Ode should be Pope. Ode, our said Earle, the Conquerours brother, fed with full hope that hee was the man, fender to Rome to buy him a Pallace, adorning it with stately and over-lazid trimmings; Salutes the Senators with great gifts & compliments, bushest bagges with money, and letters to such as might doe much in the election, and prouides honourable personages to attend him to Rome. Among the which for chiefe, was Hugh Earle of Chester, with many great men and Knights of the land: for the Normans variable, and desirous to see forraigne Countries, were contented to forsake their faire lands in the west climate, to accompany this proud Prelate ouer the riuier See.

This iolly traine was set forward into the Isle of Wight, and there in great pompe ready to set sail into Normandy, when on the sodain King William looked for, was euen amongst them, and in his great Hall in presence of his Nobles thus spake:

"(50) Excellent Peeres, I beseech you hearken to my words, and giue me your counsell: at my sailing into Normandy, I commended England to the gouernment of Ode my brother Bishop. In Normandy many forraigne foes haue risen vp against me, yea and inward friends I may say, haue inuaied me: for Robert my sonne, and other younglings whom I haue brought vp, and giuen
Armes, haue rebelled; vnto whom my filie
Clarens, and other bordering enemies haue giuen their assistance: but they haue not prospered, God (whose seruant I am) euet defending mee;
neither haue they gotten any thing of mine, besides iron in their wounds: They of Anjou prepared against me, whom with the onely feare of warre I haue pacified. These busineses you know haue drawen me into Normandy, where I haue flaid long and imploied my painfull endeuors on pub-like behoofes. But in the meane time, my brother hath greatly oppressed England, spoiling the Churches of Lands and Rents, hath made them naked of Ornaments giuen by our Predecessors, and hath seduced my Knights, with purpose to traine them ouer the Alpes, who ought to defend the Land against the inuaions of the Danes, Irish, and other Enemies ouer strong for me; but my prettill doulour is for the Church of God, which he hath afflicted, and vnto which the Christian Kings that

"raigned before me, haue giuen many gifts, and with their loues honored, for which now (as we beleue)
they rest, reioicing with a happy retribucion in a pleasant Scate: Ethelbert, Edward, Saut Oswald, Althelph, Alfred, Edward the Elder, Edgar, and my co-sen and most deere Lord Edward, haue giuen Riches to the Church, the spoils of God: But my Brother to whom I committed the whole Kingdome, wio-lently plucketh away their goods, cruelly grindeth the poore, and with a vaine hope stealeth away my Knights from me, and by oppression hath exal-tated the whole Land with vniust taxations; consider thereof, most Noble Lords, and giue mee (I pray you) your aduice, what is hereein to be done.

"(51) At which pause when all stood mute, as fearing to giue their opinions in so weighty a point, concerning so great a Person, the King thus continued his speech.

"Hurtfull rather is euer vnsofferable, and most at length be repressed. This man hath oftentimes banded himselfe against his owne father, and vp-on a stomacke blowne vp with pride and folly, hath fallen off to the King of France: therefore left with ouermuch lenity, we hay too late a repentance, he shall remaine Prisoner, yet not as a Bishop, whose name I both honour and reuerence, but as an Earle, subiect to the Lawes and Censure of his King.

Which accordingly was done, vpon seizure of whose estate, this Prelate was found to well lined in purse, that the heapes of yellow metall did more admiration to the beholders, and many of his bags were taken vp out of the bottome of Ruers, where they were hidden full of gold ground into powder.

"(52) Soone after, some displeasure hauing arisen betwixt King William, and Philip King of France, hee hauing first generally cauled to be taken the Oath of Englishe Allegiance to himselfe and successors, with a mighty masse of money (fitted for some great attempt) departed to Normandy: where falling sicke, and keeping his Bed more then his wont, the French King hearing that his disease was in his belly, gaue him this trumpe, Our Cousin William (said he) is laid now in Child-bed: Oh what a number of Childen must I offer at his going to Church? surely I thinke a hundred thousand will not suffice.

King William hearing thereof, is said to make this answere: Well, our cousin of France I trust shall be at no such cost, but after this my child-birth, as my going to Church (swearing by the resurrection and brightness of God) I will (said he) send him one thousand candles, and lighte them myselfe. And accordingly towards August following, when both the trees, fruites, corn, and ground, was most flourishing, hee entered France with a mighty Army, spoiling all the west parts thereof before him; and lastly, set the City of Meaux or Meantz on fire, wherein hee consumed the faire Church of our Lady, in the walls whereof was enclosed an Anchorite, who might, hat would not escape, holding it a breach of his religious vow to forsake his Cell in that distress. The King hostile in these attempts cheered his men to feede
the fire, and came himselfe so neere the flames, that with the heat of his harness, he got a sickle, and the flame encreased by the keape of his horse, that burst the inward rimme of his belly, and coild him his life.

"(53) At which time feeling death to approach,
he deferred not to address his last will, wherein hee commanded all his Treasure to be distributed to Churches, Gods Ministers, and the Poore, limiting to each their severall portion and quantity, which he caused to be ingrossed in writing by Notaries before him: Amongst which, he bequeathed to the Church and Monks of Saint Stephens at Can in Normandy, two Mannors in Dorsetshire, one Mannor in Drem-shire, another in Essex, much Lands in Barkeshire, some in Norfolke, a Mansion house in Wandsworth of London, with many Aduowtions of Churches; yea, which is

Ornaments thereto belonging to the said Church, being of his owne foundation, for the redemption whereof, King Henry his sonne, gaue the Mannor of Briddan in Derbyshire, to prevent any danger that thereof might arise; and vnto the Churches by fire destroyed in France, he gaue great summes of money to repaire them: and so preparing himselfe for God, briefly anne oer the cariage of his former life: the lumme whereof (as much as best farrth this place) we will declare as hee spake it to them that were present.

(14) Being laden with many and grievous sins, (O Christ) I now tremble, who am ready to bee taken hence, and to be tried by the seare, but first examination of God. I that haue alwaies bin brought vp in warres, and am polluted with the effusion of blood, am now vtrly ignorant what to doe; for I cannot number my offences, they are so infinite, and haue been committed by me now these sixty foure yeeres: for which, without any delay I must render an account to that most vpright Iudge. From my tender infancy and age of eight yeeres, I haue hitherto sustained the weight and charge of Armes to defend my Dukedome, governed by me now almost fifty sixe, both in preventing those shafts that haue bene laid for my life, and in vanquishing those conspirers which would haue vlarped my right: a thiffe necked people I may say, my arme hath still managed; I meane the Normans, who with an hard hand, if they bee curbed, are most valiant, and in hazardous attempts insuincible: for as they excell all men in strength, so doe they contend to overcome all men by valour. But if the reine bee once let loose, and laid in their necks, they will reare and consume one another; for they are ever seditious, and desirous of new flarings; experience whereof sufficiently I haue had, not only of my confederates and allies, but euen of mine own kindred, denouncing me to bee a bastard, degenerate and vaworthy of gouernment: against whom, I haue bene forced to put on armour, before I was by age ripe to wield it: all which I haue vanquished, and some of them captiuitized, God so preserving me, that they neuer had their desires.

A royal Diadem, which none of my predecessors euer ware, I haue gotten, not by right of inheritance, but by heavenly grace. What labours and conflicts I haue sustained against those of Exeter, Chesler, Northumberland, Scots, Gauls, Norwegians, Danes, and others, who haue endeouored to take the crowne from me, is hard to declare; in all which the lot of victory fell euer on my side: which worldly triumphs, how soeuer they may please the sense & outward man, yet they leaue an inward horror, and fearful care which pricketh mee; when I consider, that cruell rashness, was as much followed, as was the iust prosecution of the cause. Wherefore I most humbly beseech you, O yee Priests and Ministers of Christ, that you in your prayers will commend mee to God, that hee will mitigate my heauy sinnes, vnder whose burden I lie pressed, and by his vnspeakeable mercy make me safe among his clef. Nine Abbies of Monkes, and one of Nunnies which my Ancestors founded in Normandy, I haue enriched and augmented; and in the time of my gouernment, seauenteene Monasteries of Monkes, and fixe of holy Nunnies, haue bene founded by my selfe & my Nobility, whose Charters I haue freely confirmed, and doe by princely authority confirme against all emulations and troubles, in them God is feared, and for his sake many poore people releued; with fack Camps both England and Normandy is defended, and in these Forts let all younglings learne to fight against the Duell and vices of the flesh. These were the studies that I followed from my first yeeres, and these I leaue vnto my heires to be preferred and kept. In this then (my children) follow me, that here and for euer you may be honoured before God and Men: And chiefly, O you my very bowels, I wane you to frequent & follow the company and council of good and wise men, and gouerne your selues accordingly, so shall yee loag and happily prosper. Doe infuse to all without partial affection, for it is a true wisdom indeed that can discern betwixt good and euill, right and wrong. Shunne wickednesse, relieue the poore, succour the weak, but suppress the proud, and beidle the troublefome. Frequent the Church, honour the religions, and without wearinesse bee obedient vnto the law of God. The Dukedome of Normandy, before I fought against Harold in the vale Senlar, I granted vnto my sonne Robert, for that he is my first begotten, and hath already recieued homage of all the Barons almost of his Countrey: that honour giuen cannot againe be vndone; but yet without doubt, I know it will bee a miserable region, which is subiect to the rule of his gouernments: for he is a too high proud knaue, and is to bee punished with cruell fortune. I continue so Heire to the Realme of England, but doe commend it to the curialling Creator whose I am; for I possesse not that honour by any title of inheritance, but by the instinct of God, the effusion of blood, and the persurie of Harold, whose life becomed, and his fauours vanquished, I made it subiect to my domination. The Names of the realme I hated, the Nobles I dishonoured, the vulgar I cruelly vexed, and many vauily I dishonoured. In the Countee of Turke, and sandy other places, an innumerable sort with hunger and sword I flew: and thus that beautifull Land and noble Nation I made desolate with the deaths of many thousands, (woe worth the grife.) These then my sinnes being so great, I dare not giue the offices of that land to any other then to God, left after my death they yet be made worke by my occasion. Yet I wane my sonne, whose love and obedience from my youth I haue seen, I wish (if so be the will of God) may flourish in the throne of that Kingdome, with a long life and happy raigne.

(15) Henry his youngest sonne, surnamed Beauclerk, hearing himselfe vtrly neglected in his Fathers distribution, with teares said to the King: And what Father doe you giue me? to whom hee answered, first thousand pounds of silver out of my treasure I giue thee. But what shall I doe with treasure, said Henry, if I shall haue no dwelling place or habitation? His Father replied, Be patient my sonne, and comfort thy selfe in God, suffer quietly thy elder brother to goe before thee: Robert shall haue Normandy, and William England: but then in time shalt entirely haue all the honours that I haue gotten, and shall exell thy Brethren in riches and power.

After which speeches, hee presently called his son William, to whom hee deliuered a letter signed with his owne seale, written vnto Laufank Archbishop of Canterbury, and commanded him therewith to haile for England, lest in that spacious Kingdome some suddaine troubles should arise, and so with a kisse blessed him in Christ. His prisoners hee commanded to be set at liberty, affirming that hee had done Earle Marce much wrong, whom as hee then confessed, hee had imprisoned more for feare then for fault; hee his halfe brother Osbe he would haue had to remaine a perpetuall prisoner, but that by the importunate intercession of friends hee was released.

(16) The period of this Great Conquerour now come nere to his last, when this Sunne so gloriously raised to the height of his course, mult now of force set in the West, the dying King (for Kings mult die) hauing raised his weak body vpon the Pillowes, heard the found of the great Bell in the Metropolitane Church of Saint Germain nere Paris, and demanding the cause, one replied that it did then ring prime to our Lady; whereupon with great deuotion lifting his eyes towards heauen, and spreading abroad his hands;

firmeth, that after any small shower of raine, the earth sweateth forth very fresh blood, as by the evident light thereof (saith hee) doth as yet plainly declare, that the voice of so much Christian blood there shed, doth still crye from the earth to the Lord.

(64) But most certaine it is, that in the very same place where King Harold's Standard was pitched, & vnder which himselfe was slaine, there William the Conquerour laid that Foundation, dedicating it to the Holy Trinity, and to Saint Maritine, that there the Monks might pray for the soules of Harold and the rest that were slaine in that place: whose Priviledges were so large, that they, and others of the like condition, were afterwards dissolved by Act of Parliament, when it was found by experience, that the feare of punishment being once taken away, desperate boldness, and a daring will to commit wickednesse, grew still to a greater head: for it was enfranchised with many freedoms, and among others, to vie the words of the Charter, were these: If any Thiefe, Murderer or Felon, for feare of death, sue and come to this Church, let him have no harme, but let him be disinfeled, and sent away free from all punishments. It is lawfull also for the Abbot of the same Church to deliver from the Gallies any thiefe or robber wherefore soever he be chance to come by where any such execution is in hand.

The Standard it selfe curiously wrought all of gold and precious stones, made in forme like an armed man, Duke William presently upon his victory, with great compliments of curtesie, sent to Pope Alexander the second; as good reason it was, the Popes transcendent pleasure and power, being the strength part of the Dukes title to the Crowne, and his cursing thunderbolts the best weapons whereby he attained to warre.

(65) At Selly also in Yorkshire, where his youngest sonne Henry was borne, he founded the Abbey of Saint German: as Excester, the Priorie of Saint Nicholas and to the Church and Colledge of Saint Maritus le grand in London, hee gave both large priviledges, and much land, extending from the corner of the City wall, by Saint Giles Church without Cripplgate, vnto the common Sewer, receiving the waters, running then from the Mare, and now Mare-fields.

(66) At Caen in Normandie, he founded the Monastery of Saint Stephen the first Christian Martyr, adorning it with most sumptuous buildings, and endowing it with rich revenues: where his Queene Maud had erected a Nunnerie for the societie of valled Virgines, vnto the honour of the blessed virgin Mary. Thus much of his Acts, and now of his marriage and issue.

His Wife.

(67) Maud the wife of King William, was the daughter of Baldvigne the fifth, surnamed the Gentle, Earle of Flanders; her mother was Alize, daughter of Robert King of France, the sonne of Hugh Capet: Shee was married vnto him when hee was a Duke, at the Castle of Anzi in Normandy, and in the second yeare of his reigne over England, shee was crowned Queene vpon Whitsunday, the yeere of Grace, 1068. And although she maintained Robert in his quarrell for Normandy, and out of her owne coffers paid the charges of warre against his Father, and her owne Husband; yet, because it did proceed but from a motherly indulgence for advancing her sonne, it was taken as a cuele rather of displeasure, then of hatred, by King William, as himselfe would often moove, holding it an insufficient cause to diminish the love, that was linked with the sacred band of a matrimoniall knot. Shee departed this life the second day of November, the sixteenth yeere of his reign, and of Christs humanity, 1083. for whom he often lamented with tears, and most honourably entred her at Caen in Normandy, in the Church of S. Maries, within the Monastrie of Nuns, which hee had there founded.

His Issue.

(68) Robert, the eldest sonne of King William, and of Queene Maud his wife, was surnamed Cormoufe, signifying in the old Norman-French, Short-Boote: hee succeeded his father only in the Duchie of Normandy, and that also hee left afterwards to his brother Henry King of England, at the battell of Edinburgh (in that Dukedome) the yeere of our Lord 1106. where hee was taken prisoner, and having his eyes put out (an vnbrotherly punishment) was committed to the Castle of Cardiffe in South-Wales; and after twenty eight yeeres imprisonment, there deceased, the yeere before the death of his lad brother, June 1134. and was buried at Glocester, in the midst of the Quire of Saint Peter Church, where remaineth a Tombe with his Carued Image at this day. Hee had two wiues, the first, Margaret daughter of Herbert, Earle of Meyne, both married in their Child-hood, and the second before they came to yeeres of consuetude: The other was Sibyll, daughter of Gissey, and sister to William, Earle of Cambray in Italy, and Niece of Robert Guiscard, Duke of Apulia: By her hee had two sonnes William and Henry; this Henry was hee that was slaine by mischance, as hee was hunting in the New-Forest in Hampshire.

William the Elder, surnamed in Latine Atifer, was Earle of Flanders, in right of Queene Maud his Grand-mother, succeeding Charles of Danmark in that Earldome; hee also had two wiues, the first Sibyll, (whose Mother, called also Sibyll, was the daughter of Fawkes Earle of Aniue) after divorced from him, and remarried to Terry of Aties, his Successour; the second was Iean, the daughter of Humbert Earle of Marion, now called Sauoy, sister of Queene Alize of France, wife of King Leuis the Grasse: hee died fixe yeeres before his father, of a wound received at the Siege of the Castle of Antin in Normandy, the 27. of July, in the 28. yeere of the Raigne of King Henric his vncke, and of our Lord, 1128. hee was buried at Saint Omer in the Monastery of Saint Bertin, and left no issue behinde him.

(69) Richard the second sonne of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, and after his Father had attained the Crowne came into England, where, being then verie young, as hee was hunting in the New-Forest of Hampshire, hee came to a violent & sudden death, by the goring of a Stagge; (others say, by a peilitient ayre,) had is noted to bee the first man that died in that place, the iudicium of God punishing on him his Fathers dispeopling of that Countrey: his body was thence conveyed to Winchester, and there buried on the Southside of the Quire of the Cathedral Church, where there remaineth a monument of him with an inscription entailing him a Duke, and some suppoles of Beaune.

(70) William, the third Son of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, in the 21. yeere of his Fathers Dukedom, ten yeeres before hee was King, 1159. hee was surnamed of the Red colour of his haire, in French Rouge, in Latine Rufus; hee was brought vp vnder Lanfranke the learned Lawbard, who was Archbishoppe of Canterbury, of whom hee received both instructions of knowledge, and the order of Knighthood; hee serued vnder his Father at the battell of Gerberth in Normandy, 1079, wherein hee was wounded: and hee alwaies framed his actions so pleasing to his Fathers humor, as that hee thought him much worthier then his elder brother to succeed in his Kingdome.

(71) Henry, the fourth, and youngest sonne of King William and Queene Maud his wife, was borne in England at Selly in Yorkshire, the third yeere of his Fathers raigue, and of our Lord God, 1070, his childhood was trained vp in learnings at Cambridge (saith Cassius) but the ancient Annales of Saint Augustin in

(72) Cecile, the Eldest daughter of King William and Queene Mand his wife, was borne in Normandy, brought vp in England, and carried againe into Normandy, wherein the ninth yeere of the Kings Raigne, and the yeere of our Lord 1075. shee was by her Father on Essex day, with great Solemnity offered vp in the Church of Fyfechampe, & vailed to be a Nunne in the Monastery there; but was afterward elected by the Nunnnes of our Lady at Canoe to be Abbesse of their Monasterie, founded by her Mother, which she gouerned, and where she died, and was entered.

(73) Constance, the second daughter of King William, and Queene Mand, was the first wife of Alayne Earle of little Britaigne, surnamed in the English, Fergent; in English, Red. In regard of which marriage, and his seruice done at the conquest of England, his Father in law gaue him all the lands of Earle Edwine, whereon he built the Castle, and where of he made the Earldome of Radmond, which long after, belonged to the Earles and Dukes of Britaigne his Successors; although he had his children by an other wife; for she died very young and without issue, and was buried in the Abbey of Saint Edmundsbury in Suffolke.

(74) Alice, the third daughter of King William & Queene Mand, was married to Stephen Earle of Blays in France, and had issue by him William an Innocent, Tibaud surnamed the Great, Earle of Blais, and Champain, Stephen Earle of Mortau and Beleue, (who was King of England) Henry a Monke of Cluney, after Abbot of Glaffenbury, and Bishop of Worcester, Mary married to Richard Earle of Chester, and Emme, wife of one Harbert, an Earle of France, and mother of Saint William Archbishop of Torke: Shee forsaue Earle Stephen her husband, and in her widowhood tooke vpon her the profession of Religion in the Priorie of Nunnnes at Marcigny in France, where she ended her life.

(75) Gundred, the fourth daughter of King William, and of Queene Mand, was married to William of Warrein, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the first Earle of Surrey in England; by whom shee had issue William the second Earle, Progenitors of the Earles that followed; and Rainold of Warren, her second sonne, who had also issue. Shee died in Child-bed, three yeeres before her husband, at Coslesker in Norfolke the 27. of May, in the 20. yeere of her fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord, 1085. and is buried in the Chapter-house of Saint Pancrase Church within the Priorie, at the town of Leers, in the County of Suffex.

(76) Ela, the fifth daughter of King William, and his Queen Mand, in her Child-hood was contracted in marriage to Duke Harald, when he was in Normandy, being then a yong Widower. Notwithstanding, bee retaling her tooke an other wife, and vniuersed the Kingdom of England, after the death of King Edward, whereby hee occasioned his owne ruine, and Conquest of his Country, which afterward ensued when her Father sought reuenge: so much (as some write) to the discontentment of this Lady, that for griefe of these mischances, shee euer after refused marriage, and led a single and solitarie life; though others vpon better warrant collect, that shee died yong, and before William her Father let forth for England; Harald himselfe pleading, that hee was free from all covenants and promises to Duke William, by reason of the death of this his daughter.

(77) Margaret, the sixth and yongest daughter of King William and Queene Mand, was in her child-hood giuen in marriage to Alphonso King of Gallisia in Spain, that was afterward so renowned for the Conquest of the City Lysbon, for his victories against the Mores, and for the slaughter of their five Kings, and was the founder of the Kingdome of Portugall, the first King thereof, and the first bearer of the fine Shields of the said five Kinges, which are to this day the Armes of the same. But this Lady being thus contracted, deceased before those things happened, and before shee came to yeeres of lawfull consent to the marriage.

CHAPTER III.

An.D.1087
William Rufus
comes into England.

William posting for England, Archbishop Lanfrank his earnest soliciter by liberall gifts giuen, and promisses made to abrogate the ouer hard lawes of his Father, had the readier passage into the opinions of them that could doe most: and the more to notifie his intended mild gouernment, with other his noble inclinations to princely vertues, as eye-witnesses of his fauours towards the English, hee brought with him from Normandy, Morcar, the most Earle of Chester, and Wilsith the sonne of King Harold, both of them released out of prison, and then held in especial fauour with him. But most of the States standing for Robert Curteis his elder Brother (a man deemed of a more liberall disposition, and better temperature towards the Subjects) their titles had beene tried by 8. swords, had not Lanfrank and Wilsith, both wise & reuerend Prelates, by their Counsailes and Mediations staid their hands.

(2) Consent thus gotten, and all voices giuen for William, he was crowned their King at Westminster, vpon Sunday the twenty sixth day of September, and yeere of Saluation, 1087. by the hands of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury; vnder whom he had beene educated euen from his Child-hood, and by him made fit both for Warre and Gouernment, had not the variable inclination of his owne mind carried his actions past the limies of any staid conspasse.

(3) Robert vpon discontents that Normandy was still detained, before his Fathers sickness, was gone into Germany, so solicite their assistance for his right to that Duchy: but hearing of his death, halseth into the Prouince, and was there peaceably receiued.

ued, and made their Duke: which title notwithstanding, seemed to him dishonourable; his younger brother being inducted to a Kingdom, and himselfe disinherited; no other cause moving, but his over-much gentleness, being by nature compunctious nothing to rough, as was Rufus.

(4) The like emulation incited Odo, Bishoppe of Bayeux (his viceroy) against Lanfranc the Archbishop, who now ruled all, and had worn him out of favour with the Conquerour his half brother, whom hee caught the dalliance of imprisoning Odo, as an heretic, not as a Bishop: now therefore seemed the time most fitting for a ill revenge: & albeit that Rufus brought him from Normandy, where he had beene captivated, and restored him his honours & dignities in England; yet hee, vengerefull man, causing that Lanfranc should goe before him, completed the down-fall himselfe of the oar, as of the oar. And drawing in to this conspiracy, Robert Earle of Norwiche and Hereford his brother, with many other of the English Nobility, wrote his letters into Normandy unto his Nephew, halting him to repaire into England, and recover his right, which by his meanes hee promised should soone bee effected.

(5) The helmes thus wrought to Duke Robert's hand, and the English resorting daily into Normandy, assured his hopes of a happy successe, only the hinderance was want of money, and that very much as the world then went with him, having ever borne himselfe no lesse than his birth, nor ever had made his bagges his summa bonum. In these extremes, he well saw the lesse was to bee followed, and to let a Duke dom at stake to cast at a Kingdom, he thought it odds sufficient, though the chance were doubtful: Therefore to his younger brother Henry, who had store of gold, and wanted land, hee mortgaged the Countie of Constance, a Province in Normandy, & then sent to Odo, that he should expect his landing on the West-coast of England by a day prefixed.

(6) The Bishop now grown bold upon Duke Robert's great power, shewed himselfe the first in the Action; and fortifying Rochester, beganne to molest the peace of Kent, sending to his complices abroad to doe the like, which was not long in performing: for in the West, Robert & Norwiche Earle of Northumberland, assisted by Geoffrey Bishoppe of Constance, lacked Bath and Berky, with a great part of Wiltshire, and strongly fortified the Castle of Brighthelm against King William: In Northfolk, Roger Bygod, in Leicestershire, Hugh Grentemesse did thrice with those Counties: Roger Montgomerie Earle of Shrewsbury with his Wellshmen, assisted by William Bishop of Durham (the Kings domestical Chaplain) Bernard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer (all of them Normans or French-men) with fire and sword past through the Countie of Hereford: and surely, the fires were so great, and Duke Robert so favoured, that by the judgement of Comyns, he had heald his arriange, or followed the occasion, the Crowne of England had easily beene set upon his head.

(7) All in an uprore, and Rufus thus tarried, he appointed his Naue to scowre the seas, and to impeach his brothers arriange: then gathering his forces, and knowing well how to please the vulgar, promisth againe to abolish their over-hard lawes, & presently to put down all vnjust Imposts and Taxations, whereby the People were soone drawne to stand in his defence; and among them Roger Montgomerie was reconciled to the King.

Thus now grown strong, & his enemies decreas'd, he led his Armie into Kent where the sedition first beganne, the Castles of Tunbridge and Horne he recovered, as likewise Pewsey, wherein his viceroy Odo had strongly immured himselfe, whose lacke of victuall, by King William's strait siege, allaid the pride of that great-hearted man; so that hee not onely surrendered the same, but promised the deliquence of Rochester also strongly manned, with Engle Earle of Beleight, and a sort of other gallant Gentlemen, even the flower of Normandy and Flanders.

(8) Odo coming to Rochester for the deliquence of the Castle according to his promise, was by them surpris'd, and laid in strait prison, whether in displeasure, or vnder colour, and with consent of Odo, I will not say; but certain it is, that the King tooke the matter so to heart, that he sent forth his Proclamation through England, commanding that every man should repaire to that siege, whosoever would not be reputed a Niding, a word of such disgrace, and so dishonourable unto the English, that multitudes seemed ready to flie, then ranne to that siege; whereas upon the Castle was surrendered, and Odo banished into Normandy, lost all his livings and honours in England.

(9) Whilst these things were in acting betwix King William and his Barons, Duke Robert with his Normans was landed at Southampton, having passed some conflict with the Kings ships at the sea: whom Rufus so feared (if mine Anchor lay true) that he sent Messengers unto him in most humble manner, protesting that hee tooke not the crowne as his own by any right, but rather to supply the time in his absence: neither did hee account himselfe King, but as his substitute to hold the crown vnder himselfe seeing the matter had beene so faire pacified, and the Imperial Crowne set on his head, hee most humbly desired that it might so fell, proffering to pay him three thousand Markes by yeere, and to resigne it to him at his death: whereas Duke Robert shaking his head (beke he saw no other remedy) easily consented, and returned forthwith into Normandy.

(10) And, if we compare this with the Monke of Saint Albans report, wee may well beleue, that William was forward enough in his offers, though euen as vnruly in performance; for the Barons then being vp, and he not able to allay them, did that by his word, which he could not by his sword, protesting to them that he was willing to resigne the Kingdom and would be content either with Minney or Possessions, if those that were his Fathers Over-seers should thinke it meete; and for any Ordinances touching the affaires of the Common weale, he would referre it wholly to themselves, provided alwaies his owne honour should not thereby be impeached. But when the Cloudes of these feares were altogether over-blowne, no budde once appeared from their faire planted grafts.

(11) For Lanfranc deceas'd, and both King deprived of a politike director, and Common-weale of a principall Stait, he presently shewed the bent of his inclination, lawfully giuing where no defects had engendred, and exacting extreme tributes, when no Necessity required; always cooerous, yet neuer thrifty, and still gathering, yet neuer enriching his Coffers: All Ecclesiastical promotions then vacant he assumed into his owne hands, and kept the See of Canterbury without an Archbishop above foure yeeres, setting to sale the free-rights of the Church, and he that would give most came soonest to preferment, whereby both the Lands and good estate of the Clergy was daily diminished.

These greunances were complained of vnto Pope Prius, but hee over-busied to forward an expedition of Christian Princes for the winning of Ierusalem, had no leasure seriously to thinke upon their estates, or els he might haue diuerted Kings out of their owne by-ways, whif perſons he meant to referre for his owne gain.

(12) The Storme thus decreed without any thander; King Rufus set the eye of desire vpon Duke Robert's dominions, who lately had done the like with his, and suddenly burst into Normandy, as Scipio did into Africke, pretending reuenge of injuries done to his Kingdom; first therefore surprizing the Castles of Saint Valery and Albemarle, hee stored them with his owne Souldiers, then piercing forward did great spoile in the Countie. Robert desirous of meane and knowing his Normans euer vnfaithfull, sent to Philip the

the French King, desiring his assistance against this Brother-Enemy; who preparing to invade Normandy, was stopped with such golden shewers from King William that he could not pass, so that Duke Robert was constrained to make a peace with his brother, though for himself a very sorry one, as said Gervase, which, as Paris reporteth, was effected by twine Princes upon either part, and the conditions as followeth: that King William should retain and enjoy the County of Evreux with Franchome, the Abbeie of Mont Saint-Michel, and all the Castles he had gotten in Normandy: for the Duke it was agreed, that his brother King William should aide and assist him to recover those lands & territories beyond the sea, which had bene belonging to their Father. That all such Normans as had lost their lands in England, in taking part with Duke Robert, should be restored: and lastly, whether of them should die first, the survivor should be his heir.

(13) Peace thus established, and both their powers waited, they beat altogether against Henry their youngest brother, who having after-claps, had strongly fortified the Castle of Mont Saint-Michel, situated upon the confines of Normandy and Brittain: him, whom they ought to have provided for, (said Gervase) they went about to expell, and all the Lent long laid siege against him.

It chanced one day as his men sallied out, & made a braudo in the face of their beleaguers, King William alone, more bold then wife, rode against them, thinking none so hardy as to encounter him single; but presently a Knight flew his horse vnder him, & his foot entangled in the stirrups hee was overthrown; his enemy therefore with drawn sword, was ready to have slaine him, had hee not revealed himself by his voice: the armed men with great reverence then took him up and brought him another horse: when the King not staying for the stirrup, sprang into the saddle, and with an angry countenance demanded, who it was that overthrew him? the Knight as boldly answered, and shewed himself who he was; by Laure face, quoth William (for that was his oach) thou shalt bee my Knight, and be enrolled in my Cheeke, with a Fee answerable to thy worth.

(14) During this siege, Prince Henry being sore distressed for water, and knowing Duke Robert to be of the milder temperate, first him word of his want, desiring to have that permitted, which God had made common, and given even to brute beasts, as well as to men; Duke Robert therefore commanded him to be supplied, whereat William was wroth, telling his Brother he wanted discretion, & policy in warre, which allowed all advantages to surpris the Enemy: And doth thou (said Robert) deserve more of water, which is every where to be got, then of a Brother, having no more but him and me? In which distinction, Earle Henry got the more; and by policy took a very long towne called Dunferd, where presently was a reconciliation made amongst these three brethren, who thereupon forthwith rooke the Seas together for England.

(15) About this time, in the yeere of Grace, 1091, and fourth of King Rufus his reign, one Emma the sonne of Cadwall Lord of Dyfed, moving rebellion against Rees a Trader Prince of Southwales, drew to his side Ieffyn Lord of Glamorgan, upon promise to become his sonne in law by the marriage of his daughter: Ieffyn notwithstanding, iudging their faction too weak, first Eurus into England, where hee was well acquainted, to procure aide against Rees: who entering conference of his business with Robert Fitz-Samson a worthy Knight of the Kings Prime-Chamber, wrought so far with him, being a man easily drawn to the exercise of warre, that for a Salarie he undertooke the service, and with twelve Knights, and a competent number of Souldiers went into Wales, where joining with Ieffyn, in battle flew Prince Rees a Trader, with Co-

was his sonne. Robert Fitz-Samson, now minding to return, demanded his pay according to covenants, which Ieffyn in some part denied, alledging that Rees had gone beyond his commission: so hereupon such discord arose, that these friends fell out, and Rees thus touched in his reputation, sided with the Welsh against his owne Country-men; whereupon a battell was fought, and Ieffyn with most of his Welsh slaine, so that Robert with his followers obtained a fruitfull possession in those parts, (which by their posterity are enioied even to this day) whose names, as they are found written in a British record, were as followeth.

(16) As these things were commenced betwixt England, Normandy, and Wales, Malcolm King of Scotland entered into the English Marches as farre as to Chester in the streets, doing much harme; whose further outrage to prevent, William incontinently halted, sending by his agent Naue of Shippes, and by land his brother Robert, though with much losse of either: for his Fleet was torne by tempest and his horsemen through hunger & cold perished in those barren parts: at length the Kings came to an Interview, where by the means of Edgar Atheling, a peace was concluded to both their contents: for William restored to Malcolm twelve Villages, which he had held in England vnder his Father, and gave him yearly twelve Markes in gold: And King Malcolm for his part promised to keepe true peace with him, as he had done with the Conquerour, whereunto hee gave him his Oath, as said Mathew Paris.

(17) But as these two Kings of Enemies were made friends, so the two Brethren of reconciled friends became againe enemies: for Duke Robert well perceiving, that King William meant nothing less then performance of covenants, (protrailing time upon some secret purposes, as his insidious head conceived) in great displeasure returned into Normandy, taking with him Edgar Atheling, whom he held in an especial account.

(18) King William then repairing those Castles which the Scots had destroyed, new built in Cumberland the City Cairled, which two hundred yeeres before had bene spoiled by the Danes; and having defended it with walles, built there the Castle, Churches, and Houses, wherein hee placed a Colonie of Southerne Souldiers, with their wives and children, granting large priuiledges to the place, which the City enioieth even unto this day.

(19) And having ended his affairs thus in the North, returneth with triumph into the South, where immediately hee fell dangerously sicke, in the sixth yeere of his Reigne, at the Cite of Gloucester, whose sickness beganne to fit so acere his heart, (not looking to continue to commit many more) that hee sore repented him of the same, making did as it were flea off their skins; for the Churches and Monasteries, having fild away their Jewels and Chances to satiate his appetite, and answering they could make no more; the King replied, with some scorn; And haue you not, I beech you, Coffins of Gold and Silver for dead men bones? Accounting the money laid out vpon this holy Expedition, to be better imploied then to garnish the reliques of the dead.

(18) The King thus finding his fortune in all things pliable to his wishes, and his heart therewith greatly puffed vp, his purpose was now at its turne from Normandy, to make a full conquest of Wales; therefore redoubling his forces he drew into the Marches, where pitching his Tents hee consulted with his Captaines what was best to be done. The Welshmen finding themselves outweakened, fled according to their accustomed manner, into the Woods and Mountains, taking there by such advantage against their pursuers, that the King returned without any notable deed done; and with the like success hee undertooke an other Expedition against them the yere following.

An.D. 1096

(29) But bearing a minde still to subdue all Wales, he had first in hisrie the Island Anglesey, against which he sent Hugh Montgomery Earle of Shrovetuburgh, and Hugh Lupus Earle of Cheshire, who there executed their Conquests with very great cruelties, cutting off the Noses, Hands, and Armes of their resistors, without regard of age or sexe, nor sparing either places or persons, sacred or prophane: At which very time it chanced Matysse King of Norway, the sonne of Olafus, (the sonne of Harald Harfager) to haue made his Conquest of the Isle of Orkney, and then waiting along the Seas, fought to come on Land in Anglesey, whom to impeach, the King made all their powers; where Hugh Montgomery armed at all partes, but only the light of his Boote, was shot into his right eye, whereby hee died right daies after.

An.D. 1097

(30) The holy voyage now led forward, (vnto which Pope Urbanus was a chief instigator) thrie thousand Christians tooke the Signe of the Croisse, wearing it ouer their garments as the cognizance of their deuoted warfare: The chieftain Captaine of which Princely Army, was Peter apocet Hermit, who returning from Ierusalem, certified the Pope of the Christians great miserie vnder those mercilesse Infidels: but the good man more exercised in praises (the weapons of Voluntaries) then expert to guide an Army, was soone entrapped among the Salgarres, and slaine with most of his souldiers. But yet the businesse still prosecuted, the number of all degrees and ages flocking to the seruice, is reported to haue amounted (a thing almost incredible) vnto seven hundred thousand. In chiefe command of which huge Armie, were imploied many braue Princes of Christendome as Goffrey the famous Duke of Loraine, with his brethren Esquiers and Baldouin; Robert Duke of Normay, and his Nephew Tancredus; Robert Earle of Flanders; Hugh le grand, brother to Philip the French King; Raymond, Earle of Sygidia, and besides many other great Princes, the forsaide Robert Duke of Normandy, not the last in chiefe for his renowned seruice; as his memorable prowess in that imploiment did afterwards make apparant vnto the world. All these meeting at Canstantinople (where Alerius was Emperour) passed ouer Hellspont, and proceeded with better success then the Normans had done, subduing Cities and Countreies before them, with the slaughter of an hundred thousand Infidels, and purchase of great spoiles: and lastly, tooke Ierusalem the holy City, in the thirry ninth day after the Siege thereof. For let vs from Ierurie returne into England.

(31) King William at rest whilst his Brother and the reit were in warres, thinking now both of fortifying and beautifying his Kingdome, caused new walles to be built about the Tower of London, and at Westminster (where before was the ancient Palace of Saint Edward and his Ancestors) laid new foundations of a moit large and Princely Palace; the Hall whereof, by the testimony of Paris, should haue extended (if he had liued to finish it) from the Riuer Thames euen vnto the common high way, as might appeare by the first groundsketch, at the time wherein Paris wrote: but that stately Building, which now we call the Great Hall, hee finished as yet no standeth, containing in length two hundred and twenty four, and breadth twenty four: yet (when some praised the largeness thereof) I heere found fault that it was not made bigger, accounting it fittly worthy the name of a Bed-Chamber, in respect of that which hee inclosed to build.

And certes, of a right indignominous disposition was this Rufus, as appeared at such times, when sitting at dinner, purposing forthwith to take his pleasure in hunting, a messenger brought him sudden newes of the Siege of Mayne, a City in Normandy: whereto when the King answered, He would take aduice what to doe: But thy Subiects (replied the party) are in distress, and cannot be deliuered; whereas the King swore his wonted Oath, that if they could not, they should not; and that he would not turne his backe till hee was with them; and thereupon commanded to breake downe the wall that he might goe forth the next way to the Sea, leaving straight Communion for his Nobles to follow him with all celerity.

(32) But the winds being contrary, and thereby both the Sea and the King in a great rage; his Pilot misdoubting hazard of Shipwrecke, desired him humbly to expect a while, till those boisterous Elements were calmer and passage more safe. Wherunto he answered, as no what daunted: Half thou canst heare that say - King hath bene drowned? I therefore hope to the Sauies, I charge thee and be gone. The City vpon this unexpected speed of the King, was soone releafed, and Hedus, Constall of Cirenaia, who did beliauee it, being taken by a traine, was by King William killed at his face, as a man neither of Martiall prowesse nor police: 24 at which indignity the Noble Hedus disdainingly storming, with great boldnesse said vnto Rufus: I am now thy Prisoner, not by thy power, but by chance of warre, and my owne misfortune: but were I at liberty, thou shouldst well knowe, I am not the man thus to be laughed at. The King well liking the confidence of his spirit: Well then (said hee) I give thee full liberty, go thy waies, doe it in thine liberty I am the man that euer will make thee.

(33) And surely, howsoever he might be blemished with many flumes of bad Government, yet for his valour and resolutions in wars he is greatly commended; and so much by some, that, it were not against the faith of Christianity, it might be thought (such Matthew sayeth) that the Soule of Caesar had entered into the body of this Rufus, as that of Euphrates is said to haue done into Pythagoras: yea, & those flumes (we may well thinke) were no whit lessened by his flouery writers, who were dependantes of the Romish See; for that hee little fauoured their Holy Father, or any such as adhered vnto the See of Rome, against the Prerogative of his Crowne; especially appeared in his Office conceiued against Anselmus Archbishop of Canterbury, for his too Romish humor. There was at that time a Schisme in the Roman Church, which Mosler-like had then two heads on one Body, the Emperour (who claimed that as his right) placing one, and the Roman Clergy setting another, Phrasus by name, with whom comforted Anselmus, against the Kings command.

The King alleged, that no Archbishop or Bishop of the Kingdome should (or ought) be subiect to the Pope or Court of Rome, with whom they had thought to doe: that he and his Realme had as large franchises, euer since the receiving of the Christian faith, as the Emperour had in his Empire; and that therefore none ought in his Realme to be received for Pope, whom himselfe and his State should not first approve: that without his licence none should goe or appeale to Rome in any cause: that Anselme could not keepe his Allegiance to his Soueraigne, and also to the Pope. Vpon all which points the Prelates of England, excepting only Gundulphus B. of Rochester assented to the King against Anselme, that he was guilty of High Treason, for attempting to depriue the Crowne of these prerogatiues.

(34) And because the King vnderthrew that here in he did no more then his Father had done before him, it shal not be impertinent to obserue heere, how that as Phraus vied Anselme for his inhumane to draw the King to his becke: so Pope Gregorie before him vied Archbishop Laufraunce helps for vndermining of William the Conquerour, and to subiect him and his Seate to the Papacie, which that it may appeare the better, I will here insert the Conquerours owne Letter to the Pope.

To Gregory the most Excellent Pastor of Holy Church, William by the grace of God, King of England and Duke of Normandy, with his health and friendship. Your Legat Hubert (Religious Father) came vnto me, exhorting me, in your name, to make Allegiance to you, and your Successors, and to take better order for the money which my Predecessors were wont to send to the Church of Rome. The one I have granted; of the other I have not admitted. Fealitie to you, I neither would nor will make; for I neither promised you so much, neither finde I that my Antecessors did performe to you. The money hath bene negligently gathered, my selfe almost these three yeeres being in France; but being by Gods mercy returned into my Kingdome, as much as is collected is now sent by the said Legate: the rest shal be sent when it may conveniently, by the messengers of Lanfrance our faithful servant. Pray for vs, and for the good estate of our Kingdome; for I haue loued your Predecessors, and my desire is shone all others sincerely to loue you, and to heare you obediently.

His Holinesse was then very wroth, that things did not cotten better to his desires in England. But Laufraunce cleared himselfe of the blame, shewing him how diligently (but indeed traitorously) hee had belittled himselfe, in counselling the King to yeeld to swear obedience to the Pope: Snuffed him perswas (saith he) I haue so aduised him, but I could not persuade him.

(35) By which incredible pride and Popish incoachments, attempted by the means of these chiefest Prelates of the Kingdome, King William Rufus (no doubt) saw it was high time for him to prevent farther mischiefes to his Seate, by following his Fathers Steps in timely repressing such Papall intrusions: yea so farre was hee from yeelding his necke to that yoke, that hee aowed, that the Pope, though boasting of Peters Chaire, had not from him any power of binding or loosing, whose godly sleepe they wholly neglected, following onely after Laue and worldly Honours; that also it was but impollute to teach Intercession, and boolefesse to vie Inuocation to Saints, euen to Saint Peter himselfe. And as for the rest of the Romish Clergie, who then gaue themselves strangely to worldly and fleshly pleasures, wearing their guilt girdles and spottes, and trimming their bulbie Locks; their loose liues the King much detested, and sought to punish; which most incensed their Choler: and these were the hairens no doubt in those Monkish writers Pennes that euer blotted his faire name, and their fall-running, and vnclean hands. For so much may we gather from Gometrichs the Recorder of his life, who hauing reported many Acts of this Kings, seemeth laithly to checke himselfe for going so farre where (he saith) These and many other like things were could truely report of him, were it not that I think it vnconuenient largely to relate his actions, because hee persecuted ouer many of Gods seruants, and the holy Church not a little, for which it is thought by the most part of wisesmen, that hee repented too late and vnprofitably.

(36) And true it is, that some of them haue taxed him for great Pride and Courtesuffie, whereof yet some pregnant examples to the contrary are not wanting: as, (though the illiance bee somewhat familiar) when his Chamberlaine bringing him a paire of new hoafe, and hee demanding the price, was answered that they cost three shillings: Away haie fellow (quoth he) asethel beforewearing a King? bring mee of a Marke price: his seruant went, but brought him another paire of no greater cost, yet tolde him (as great Mens reckonings usually are made) that they were of the rate appointed: wherewith the King was very well pleased, and disharied that great Price to fulfill his owne pride.

(37) His Courtesuffie what it was, may hence appeare, that when two Monkes whose Abbat was lately dead, repaired to his Court, and each in large offers out-bid and ouerbad the other, to succeed in the Abhacie; a third Monke very sober, and poore in shew, accompanying them in their businesse, stood by; whom the King asked what he would giue to be made Abbat? Nothing, said the Monke; for I entered my profession to be poore, and hitherto haue bene, little esteeming the pompe or riches of the world. Then thou art the man (replied the King) and shalt hee their Abbat, more worthy in thy poouertie, then they for their price; and so conferring on him that high honour, checked the others to their open infamy and reproach.

As the like he also did to Hugh a Norman Knight, and Souldier by profession, who of a sincere deuotion had entered the Monkish Order in the Monasterie of S. Augusline at Canterbury, and at the death of Vide the Abbat, was but a Probationer; when comming with others to the King for the election of another, was chosen himselfe (though fore against his will) without any request or proffert; whose penitency and vnfained humility so moued the King, that in this his Election hee burst forth into teares.

(38) Other faults I grant hee is charged with, wherein we haue not and cannot vtruly acquit him: as this besides others, that his chiefest Conforts were Effeminate persons, Ruffians and the like, and himselfe said to haue delighted continually in Adulteries, and the Company of Concubines, etiam eorum Sole, himselfe and in the sight of the Sunne; though none of them be named, nor any his illegitimate issue knowne, and yet onely, or especially for his sins, many strange signes of Gods wrath are reported to haue happened in the time of his reigne.

(39) For in his second yeere a terrible and most dreadful Earthquake happened: And in his fourth, a vehement Lightning pierced the Steeple of the Abbey at Wincombe, rent the beames of the rooffe, cast downe the Crucifixe, brake off his right legge, and withall ouerthrew the Image of our Lady standing hard by, leaving such a flonch in the Church, that neither incense, holy-water, nor the singing of the Monkes could allay it. And not long after, so great a tempest of winde happened, that in London it bare downe sixe hundred Houses, and blew off the rooffe of Beau-Church, which with the Beames were borne into the Aire a great height: sixe whereof being twenty seven foot long, with their fall were driuen twenty three foote deepe into the ground, the streets of the City lying then vnpaired.

In the ninth of his Reigne a blazing Starre appeared with two buisters, and other Starres seemed to shoote darts each against others, so no little feare and amazement of the beholders. The last of his Reigne, the Sea breakeing ouer his limked banks, drowned an innumerable multitude of people in many Countries, and in Kent ouerwhelmed the lands that sometime were Earle Godwinus, which as yet are called Godwinus Sands, lying very dangerous for all Navigators. But most fearefull was the Wel of blood, which for fifteene daies roke vp out of the ground at Finschamsted neere Abington in Bedfordshire. His owne dream, wherein it seemed the wines of his Armes to be broken, and abundance of his blood streaming on the floor, as likewise that Monke, who in his sleep saw the Crucifier to burne the King to the ground: these with many like, were held as prefiges of his death, which presently followed. Of all which, or the most part, what better censure can wee give, then that which King William himselfe (when this last vision was told him) did deliver; saying, Well, a Monke he is, and can dreame (Monacholiter) as Monkes use to doe, myselfe to gaze. Came from an hundred sleepings, left he should think he had dreamed himselfe.

(40) Whatsoever force those prefiges had, it is true, that vpon the second day of August, as he was hunting in the new Forrest, and in the place called Choringham, all his Company being scattered from him, leaving onely a French Knight, whose name was Walter Tirell, the King with his arrow strooke a Stag, which yet not greatly hurt ranne away; to make therefore the course that it tooke, he held vp his hand betwixt his eye and the Sonne, when vnawares also Walter Tirell so shot, that his Arrow glancing against a tree, strooke the King in his breast, who hastily breaking off so much as stucke out of his body, with one onely groane fell downe and died. Of which sudden chance, his followers soone vnderstanding, most of them made away, but those few which remained, laid his body (baldy God wor, but as necessity suffred) into a Colliers Cart, which drawne with one silly leane Beate, through a very foule and filthy way, the Cart broke, and there lay the spectacle of worldly glory, both pitifully goared, and fithily bemired, till afterward he was thence conuayed vnto Winchester, and burned vnder a plaine flat Marble stone in the Quire of Saint Swithens, the Cathedral Church of the City, whose bones were since taken vp, and laid into a Coffin, with the bones of Canutus. Hee died after he had reigned twelue yeeres, eleven moneths lacking eight daies, being the yeere of his age forty three, and of Christ Iesus, 1100.

(41) He was of person indifferent, not of any great stature, yet very well set, his belly (like his Fathers) somewhat bearing out: of complexion a ruddy, whereof he tooke his surname, and his haire somewhat yellow, his forehead flat and square, and his Eyes diversely coloured; a stammering tongue, especially in his anger; gorgeous in apparell, and yet no sparing diet; very bountifull to Souldiers, often hard to Churchmen, burdensome to his Subjects, an expert Souldier, that could well both endure labour of the Body, and put off cares of the minde; in his affaires circumspect, of his ward stedfast, and in his warres no lesse diligent, then fortunate. Hee gave to the Monkes called de Charitate, the great New Church of Saint Saviour of Barnesby in Southern, which he built, with his Mannor of Barnesby it selfe, and all the appurtenances, together with the Towne of Charlton: confirming all that had bene given them before. He also of an old Monastery in York founded a new Hospital, to the honour of Saint Peter, for the sustentation of poore men and women: dying as we haue said, without Wife or Issue, or without receipt of time for dispose of his Crowne, or other wordly affaires.

Henry, the youngest sonne of the Conquerour and third King of his race, was born here in England, and brought vp in learning and frō his child-hood, whereby hee gained to himselfe the high honour very rare in those daies, especially in Princes, to be, and to bee stiled the Beauclerk: whose portion of Treasure was not a little, given him by his father, neither any whit spared by himselfe to purchase friends at the death of his Brother, Henry of Newburgh the right Noble, vertuous and learned Earle of Northwicke, ever making his way both with the Clergy and Nobles, who refused to admit any King but with capitulation and covenantes to their owne likings.

(1) The Steps then by which hee moaned the Throne of Maicesty, were the dislikes of Williams over-hard curbing of his Natives, as hee ever called the English: the rash and giddy head of his brother Robert: his absence in Syria, for whose returne to stay was dangerous, and whose election for King of Ierusalem, was likely to imploy his person there: his English-birth, having both a King and Queene to his Parents; his faire promises for reformation of bad and rigorous Lawes, imposed by his Father and Brother; the restoring of the Clergy from exile, and to their Church-Livings; remission of Taxes exacted on the Subjects, and due punishments of such persons as were the chiefe Causers thereof, in which behalfe to satisfy the People hee committed Ralph Bishop of Durham to the Tower. Then promising by Oath to frame iust Lawes grounded on those of Saint Edward (then which nothing was more desired) did winde himselfe so farre into the loves of all, that with a generall concurrence hee was saluted King.

cap. 21.
Math. Paris.

(1) He began his reign the second of August, the sacred rites of whose Coronation were celebrated in Westminster by Maurice Bishop of London (in the absence of Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury) the fifth day of the same month, the year of Christ 1100. When Henry the fourth possessed the Imperial Diadem, Philip the first twined the Scepter of France, Edgar wore the Crown of Scotland, and Paschal the second fate in the See of Rome.

(4) His first business was to put in execution what he had promised; and because he might be thought unfit to guide a large kingdom, who cannot reform those who are curer at his elbow, began (as a good Prince ought) with his own Court and Household (as knowing that to be the pattern and warrant of others enormities) whence he catholized all Court-millions and nice or effeminate wansons, and enacting a decree against his Courtiers Rapines, Adulteries and Robberies, punished their Thiefs with death, and Lechery with the loss of their Eyes, and other parts peccat.

Then he restored to the English the vic of Lighth, which his father forbad by the ringing of a Bell, and had now continued for the space of thirty three years, ordaining likewise many good Laws, and common Liberties, exemplified at large in Mathew Paris, which summarily may be thus abridged.

- 1 The Freedome of the Church from oppression, or reformation of their possessions oppression.
- 2 That the Heirs of his Nobility should possess the Lands of their Fathers, without redemption from him, which favour the Nobility likewise should afford to their Tenants.
- 3 That the Gentry might give in Marriage their Daughters and Kinswomen without his license, so it were not to his Enemy.
- 4 That the widows should have her Jointure, and not be compelled to marry against her own liking.
- 5 That the Mother or next of kindred, shall be Guardian of the Lands of her Children.
- 6 That Coiners of false money should be punished; a statute was ordained a measure to the length of his Arm to be a standard for Commerce among his People.
- 7 Then did he forgive all debts to the Crown before his coronation, and murders committed before the day of his Coronation:
with some other like indulgences: But, to the greatest content of the People, he gave power and strength unto King Edwards Latter.

(1) To these his Ordinances he set his Name and Seal, with the subscription of sundry Peeres, commanding as many Copies as there were Counties in England to be transcribed and kept in the Monasteries of every Province. Then did he recall Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury forced out of the Land by Rufus, and bestowed all vacant Church-mings upon the worthiest persons. But to ground his new planted affection more deepe in the hearts of the English, he became a sister to Edgar King of Scotland, to have his sister to wife, which was Made the daughter of Queen Margaret, Sister to Edgar Etheling and Grand-child of Edmund Transile, whereby his issue might merely be both of the English blood and of the ancient English Kings.

(6) Since by report of some writers had vowed Virginity, and was brought up in a house of Religion at Winchester (having entered the profession of a Nun under her Aunt Chelgiva) whose sanctity and knowledge both in matters humane and divine, with her mother Margarets, are highly commended (Faith Gomerayn) in a book written of their lives: Notwithstanding others hold that she valued her self but for a shift, to put off some unworthy matches, which her father Adalmeir would have imposed her; and indeed this scruple was such a Core in Anselm his mouth that he would not pronounce the words of Contract until her self had cleared the doubt by her open confession.

(7) Duke Robert, who now had bin five years in the holy warres, and therein borne himself with such valour that he of all the Christian Princes was thought the worthiest to bee anointed King of Iersusalem, had their voice and election standing in the Temple before the Altar, upon Easter-Eve: and that the rather by a miracle of his Taper, which tooklight of it selfe, or from Heaven (if we will be so light to believe it); but he hearing of the death of Rufus, refused that inhope to have England; for which his neglect of Divine appointment, it is said God neuer after prospered him: then returning from Syria into Normandy was there joyfully received, and assumed again his Dukedome (which he had engaged to his brother William) without repentment of any money: where hearing that Henry his younger, was flept into his throne of England, laid projects in his minde how to delecte him. And to further these his designs, Ralph Bishop of Durham, corrupting his keepers, brake out of the Tower of London bigar into Normandy, where he instigated Duke Robert against his brother of England; others also delighting in alterations, solicited Robert to make into England, with promise of their assistance to recover the Crowne.

(8) King Henrie for his part resolving to hold what he had got, neglected no means to keepe the Diadem as it was set, and therefore rigged forth his Naue to secure the Seas, manned his forerellers, and with a great Army repaired towards the Coast, where nere unto Hastings he lodged his Campe, relying more upon his own strength and valour of his People, then any iust title he had to the Kingdom.

(9) Duke Robert by this time had taken the Seas, and was upon the Kings fleet before they were aware, where preparing for Conflict, the most of the English fell to the Norman, either by the persuation of the Duke or in hatred of Henry, that then began to tyrannize over them as they did imagine: By which means the Duke, had safe landing at Pevesmouth, and did not a little reioice in this his fortunate beginning; threatening his brother to be reuted for his wrongs, & blaming the Nobility for suffering him thus to be abused, whilst he for the common good of Christen-dome, was employed in the Holy-Lands warre. King Henry, as wise, as the other was valorous, wrought under hand for an agreement of peace; for hee very well saw, that the event of warre hath commonly li-fue from the first successe, and as one and the same time doth bolden and weaken the courage of the multitude; therefore certaine Noblemen on both sides so trasified the business, that the Brethren in short time became friends, and a composition was thus, that, because Henry was borne after his fathers Conquest of this Land, and stood now the Crownd King with common consent, hee should during his life, enjoy the same, paying Duke Robert in way of fealty three thousand Markes by yeere; and the summour to be heire to his brother deceased, if hee died without a sonne. In which it was also concluded, that all, either English or Norman, which had taken part with the King or Duke, should be pardoned of all offences, and their Livings againe restored: for the Confirmation whereof, and the performance accordingly, twelve Princes upon either parties took their Corporall Oathes; and the Armies presently dissolved.

(11) The Norman Duke princely entertained the space of six months in the Court of King Henry, shewed himself rather open & credulous, then any way suspicious, in all his carriages, & so with much liking, &
love to his brother, departed into his own Country.
But the Sanno-fine of these faire daies, began forthwith to be overcast, by the incitation of such as endeuoured to sow discord betwixt the two Brethren, and not only those in Normandy, which euer haue inualities into Duke Robert's cares, but eue in England also, some fell in dislike of King Henry, and affecting alteration, with the malignant crew of enuy beheld the

(13) Robert Curiause, either to sound his brothers
designes, or to congratulate him in a brotherly love, came into England, where hee was to royally entertained, that all suspicion was quenched, and himselfe so well contented, that at the onely motion and request of Queen Matild, he remitted the three thousand Marks, hee wanted to be paid yearly vnto him, though he were left able to forebear, then King Henry to grace. But when his wants told him of this his overlawfull release, he openly exclaimed against King Henry, that hee had craftily circumvented, and deceitfully cheated him: and now giving open care and credit to such as fought their dilation, gaue his Brother all occasions of enmy, who was ready enough of himselfe, to make the least very great.
For besides this present displeasure conceived against Duke Robert, he added others, and this especially that he had willfully waited the Inheritance which his father had left him to wit the Dukedom of Normandy, having nothing now almost in that Dominion besides the City of Rouen, which he would haue parted with all, had not the Citizens thereto denied their consents.

(16) Neither was it the least morine to King Henry's displeasure, that his traitorous subjects were so willingly received by his brother: for besides Robert Bellifus and others, William, Earle of Mortaign in Normandy, and of Cornewall in England, the sonne of Robert, halfe brother to the Conquerour, became the Earldome of Kent (which he made claime vnto, as heire to his vnkle Odo) was denied him, in a discontent goth him into Normandy, where besides his valiant familars of the Kings Castles, and Souldiers, hee much endangered the possessions of Richard Earle of Chester, then a child and the Kings Ward: so that the flames of warre raised by these seditions, seemed to be blown from England vnto the parts beyond the Seas, and to fire the territories of the English thereto neither is it easie to declare (saith Hauenden) what misery (the meane while) by exactions the land felt here at home.

(17) For the King incited into Normandy vpon these occasions, by large distributions of money carried out of England, wonne the Norman Nobility to trauell from their Lord, and took the Towne and Castle of Caen by composition, and burnt Bayeux with the beautifull Church of Saint Maries, whereupon the Priorities of Normandy yielded themselves vnto his Protection, by whose example the Brittaines and those of Amur did the like, so that their Castles and forts were filled with the Garrisons of King Henry, Duke Robert in no wise able to resist, which done Henry with triumph returned into England.

(18) The Curiause by his Norman thus vacuo-uously dealt with, saw it was bootlesse against so great a fire to strive, and therefore thought best to lay away weapons, and to become himselfe a Mediator for Peace. With which resolution taking the seas, hee followed his brother vnto Northampton, where humbling himselfe in a more de-cise manner, then either his birth, or owne nature could well brooke, desired the Kings grace, both in respect of their brotherly vnion, and the regard of his owne accustomed clemency: willing him to consider, that warre was not only vnatural betwixt brethren, but that a reproch euer follows the character of the Victor, desiring him not to triumph in his overthrow, who was now ready to render all that he had into his hands: but King Henry murthering to himselfe, turned away from his brother without any answer.

(19) For God (saith Paris) was pleased to giue the effect, though the Beno-clerk felt a remorse in conscience, for usurping his Kingdom: (being indeed very leased, and well understanding the duties both of equity and law) and thereupon became both to free some violent insurrection of the Welsh, and also the increasing wrath of God vpon him for his treacheries and vnjust delings towards his elder brother, to whom undoubtedly the

*in clamour by all right did opportune: yet flood her rather in fear of men than God, whose favour he continually laboured to keep; whom he meant to please another time by building of an Abbey for his satisfaction. Duke Henry then seeing and detesting the Kings frowline power, polled backe unto Normandy to gather his power. Henry also held in good policy, not to give passage unto Roberts wrath, knowing him a Souleifer, and well waying his desperate estate: and therefore calling his Lords unto London, in an assembly tickled their eares with their delectable and smooth words.*

(20) My friends, and faithful Counsellors, and & native Countrymen, you know by true report how my Brother Robert was elected, and by God himselfe called to be the fortunate King of Scots-land, and how unfortunately, or rather intolently, he refused that sacred office, whereby he is now moltually reprobated of God: you also know by man-other experiments, his pride and arrogance for be-lying a man of a warring humor, hee is not only impatient of any peace, but also wilfully desirous to trample vpon you as men of abject and contemptible disposition, vnderstanding you for idle drowns, for beelies good, and what not? But I your King, naturally inclined to bee both humble and peaceable, take delight in nothing more then to do you good,
 to maintain your tranquillity and ancient liberties,
 (as I have often sworn vnto you,) and meekely and willing to yeild my selfe to Gods will, whereby I may circumpectly gouerne you as a clement Prince, and to that end euen now will I confirme (if your wisdoms do thinke fit) your ouer-worne and vndermined Charters, and will re-nobate them most firmly with a new oath and ratification. Meane while, all the lawes which the holy King Edward by Gods inspiring did establish, I doe here commend to bee inuiolably obserued, hereby to moue you to adhere steadfastly vnto mee, in repelling cheerfully, willingly and powerfully the wrongs offered me, by my Brother that I say I say, by my most deadly enemy & yours, and of the whole English Nation: For if I bee guarded with the valours and affections of Englishmen,
 I shall forme the threats of him and his Ad-uisers, as forcelesse, and no whit to be feared. And with these faire promises (which yet afterwards he vicerly neglected) hee wonne the hearts of them all, that they would die with him, or for him, against any hostility whatsoever.

(21) Duke Robert gone, and preparing for warre, Henry thus scul'd in his peoples affection, followed him with all expedition, having in his company the choice Nobility of England, Normandy, Gaunt, and Britaine, so that hee was exceedingly strong. With Robert, for men of chiefe account, were Robert Be lufme, Earle of Shrewsburie, and William Earle of Mortaigne, in like dispute with the King, and therefore armed with the like desperate boldnes.

(22) Henry his Army had pierced into Normandy, even as farre as Tremouille. Caille of the Earle of Montaigne, vying all means possible to surpriſe the ſiege, for whole refuge, the Duke with thie Conforts, made all diligence to diſſolve the ſiege, and after ſome few ſkarmatches joined a bloody battaile, bravely fought on each part, where at the firſt onely, the Kings power (though much greater in number) went down but by their multitude and manhood (ſpecially through the Kings example and encouragement) they ſooner prevailed, where Duke Robert, with Earle William, and ſundry other, of good note, manfully fighting in the very preſſe of their enemies, were taken priſoners; but Robert being ſcaped by flight. And thus (as Matthew Paris obſerved) Gods Juſtice & Mercy took effect in this Juſtice upon Robert, for the rebell of Jerusalem, ſiege, and vnto Henry his ſauour, according to the prophetic of King William his Father. This battaile was fought, and Normandy woone vpon

Saturday, being the Vigill of S. Michael, euen the fift day forty years that William the Bastard fet foot on Englands Shoare for his Conquest; God so disposeth (saith Mabinsbury) that Normandy should be subiect to England that very day, wherein England was subdud to Normandy.

(31) Red Rovers, that now valourous Prince, and William Marston, that valiant, but headstrong Earl, were forthwith sent into England and imprisoned: the Earle in the Tower of London, and the Duke in Cardiffe Castle in Wales, after he had governed the Duchy of Normandy nineteen years, and was for echeime in Chiquerie accounted among the best Captains that the world then afforded, had not beene (as commonly maniall spirits vnder be tooke rash and vaulted in his other enterprises which headline life did now draw vpon him a penance of twenty five yeeres continuance, in the afflicted state of a forlorne Captive. And Henry now no longer as a brother, recelling the keyes of Normandy, as a Conquerour returned into England.

(24) For loke it was not ere Drake Robert, weary of this vnwonted durance, fought to cleape and haue liberty to walke in the Kings Meadowes, Forrester and Parker, brake from his Keepers without any Asailers, or meanes for security: who being milde, was prefentely postured, and taken in a quag-mire wherein his Horle lay hid: whereupon the Kings hearing of this his attempt, considering that woods were no wall to restraine the fierce Lyon, and that to play with his claw was to endanger a flate, commanded him not onely a greater restraint and harder durance; but also (to a thing vnfit for a brother to suffer, but most vnworthy for Beaulieu to see) to fast his eyes to be put out, causing his head to be held in a burning bason (to auoid the deformity of breaking the eye-balls) wth litle glasses rounde hadt loth the office of retaining their light.

(25) Having thus quieted all foraine oppositions, King Henry set his minde to prevent Dumetick; and therefore (about this time) those Flemings, whose Lands the Seas had deuoured some twenty years before, and place was granted them in Cumberland, first by King Rufus, and afterwards by Henry, were now by the King, upon better aduicement, remooued into Wales, both to disburden his Island of such guests, and that so they might be a defence betwixt him and those euer stirring people. Which project nothing decayed his expectation; for by the testimony of Giraldus, They were a Colony stout and hardy, and continually endured the wrongs of the Welsh. In Nauis a most determined to fetch gaine by cloathing, by striffling also and staruishing by Sea and Land, vnderstanding any prices, or perills whatsoever. A people of very greater power, and at time and place requiered, ready to turne to take plough in hand and till the ground, as ready to take to the field and fight it out; and that I may make this much more (faith he) a Nation most fully devoted to the King of England, and as faithfully to the Englishmen.

226) By the which his policy, he attained that which his brother Xufu could not, who many a time had but small success in those parts though otherwise, ever sped most fortunately in all his adventures of warres : But it is thought by some, that as the Mountainous cragginess of the Country ; and Sharpness of the Aire, encouraged them in their rebellion : So the same impeached Xufu his success.

Bar King Henric (Sixth of Malmesbury) who with many warlike expedition went about to force the Welshmen, by stirring unto Rebellion, for to yield and to submit themselves; in the end refused upon this wholesome policy to take down their pride, for brought thither all the Flemings that dwell in England: a great number of which Nation in those daies, in regard of his mothers kindred by her Father side, flocking thither, were closely founded in England, in so much as they for their mutual freedom burdened unto the Realme: Wherefore
 he sent them all together with their selfe, and their Wives, and Children, into Rolle a Country in Wales, as it were into a common avoidance, thereby both to purge his own kinde, and also to quash and repress the desperate boldness of his Enemies.

(27) And now being free from all feare of subverters King Henry, growing disdainefull (saith Paris) refused to fulfil what he had so oft promised to his Nobles, keeping threats upon threats; for God had bestowed on him three beauties, wisdom, valour, and riches, above any of his Predecessors: but for all these he showed himselfe to God most unthankfull: And of his Clergy (wee may say) too regardlesse, in suffering Anselm, newly reconciled, so lay heavy punishments vpon the married Priests, putting many from their places, because they denied to put away their Lawfull wiues, whereof great contention followed, and grievous finnes in short time committed, both against God and Nature.

(28) Among these proceedings in England, Philip King of France deceased, and his sonne Lewis furnished Cressus succeeded in his gouernement, which how he stood affected to Henry was doubted, and therefore to make sure worke, the King sailed into Normandy, furnishing his Townes, Castles, and Fortresses, with all habiliments of warre, with provisions besetting such suspected times; and so returning, he found attending his coming, the Ambassadors of Henrie the fourth Emperour, as letters from their Master to obtaine Lady Maude the Kings daughter in Marriage, then not past five yeeres of age, which was willingly granted, and the espousals by way of Proxy solemnized, with great feasts and magnificent triumphs.

(29) About which time the death of Archbishop Anselm happening, gave no small hope to the Clergy, as themselves conceived, againe to enioy the liberty of matrimoniall society; wherein they were not a little deceived: for the King seemed willing that the Ecclesiasticall Ordinance before made should be more neerely looked into; whereupon men for feare, and in the sight of men, carried themselves accordingly, but if in secret they did warfe (saith Zedemur) let the charge light on their own heads, with every man shall beare his own finnes: for I know, (saith hee) that if Forerectors and Adversaries God will iudge, the sinners of their owne Consens, (I will not say, their own Sisters and Daughters) shal not surely escape his iudgement.

(30) The Kings peace, which seemed to be secured by his new allyance with the Emperour, and his glory raised to the high, began now to bee enuied, and his brother Duke Roberts extremities greatly to be pitied, both by some English and also Normans. For Faulke Earle of Armoie both threatened the reuenge, and by corrupting the inhabitants wanne the City of Constance, from his obedience. To stay whose interruptions King Henry passed into Normandy, where hee vied great extremity, and put to death Helis Earle of Cornouaille, who held that County against him; for which cause Godfrey Earle of Gaunt tooke such displeasure that hee entered into that Earldome, and marrying the said Helis his daughter, kept the County perforce against King Henries great power. But Robert de Breteigne that had escaped at Duke Roberts overthrow, was then taken and committed prisoner to Warham Castle, too gentle a punishment for so blood-thirstie a man, whose nature was such, that he delighted himselfe only in cruelty, an example whereof hee showed vpon his owne sonne, who being but a child and playing with him, the father for a pastime, put his thumbs in the boies eyes, and thrust out the ballles thereof.

(31) These warres somewhat alluaged, King Henry returned into England, where the people conceived much grudge at his importunate taxes, and the Clergy no lesse at his reuocation of Church liuings in their vacancies, vnder pretence of keeping them for the worthiest; but how vnworthily he oftentimes bestowed the, may be gathered by that pretty reproof of Guymond his Chaplain, who grieuing to see vnworthymen (for the most part) advanced to Bishopricks and other dignities; when on the Rogation day he celebrated diuine seruice in the Kings Chapel, being to read that lesson out of Saint Iohnes, it rained not on the earth IIII yeeres, and VI. months, hee purposely read it, it rained not, one, one, one, yeeres, and one, one, one, month. All men either laughing or wondering at his reading; the King checked him for it, and asked him the reason; marry (quoth he) I see you bestow your preferments onely on such, as can read so: which secret touch the King well weighing, did both precisely preferre him to the gouernment of Saint Friderikes in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and afterward was more carefull in all other his choices.

(32) The King had not beene long in England after his returne from Normandy, before the Welshmen (then a restless people) were in Armes against such English, as had feet footing in that Country, which were Gilbert Strangborne Earle of Strrygh, and others, whose lands in the south part Owen ap Cadogan fore molested and spoiled; the like did Griffith ap Cuman Prince of North-Wales vpon Hugh Earle of Cheshyre County, and both of them denied King Henry either seruice or tribute. These Earles so incensed the King, touching these and other outrages of the Welshmen, that in a rage he vowed not to leaue one alive in all North-Wales, nor in Powys-land, and straight repairing thitherward, diuided his Arme into 3. parts. The first was led by Earle Gilbert against South-wales; the second band by Alexander King of seotland and Hugh Earle of Cheshyre against North-Wales; and the King himselfe lead the third, vnder whose Standard was the chief strength of middle England. But the Welsh seeing themselves far vnable to withstand this present preparation, tooke into the Mountaines and Woods, (their surest holds) where being followed, with great difficulty, many of them were slaine, and the rest yielded to King Henry, who now as a Conquerour in triumph returned to London.

(33) Whither immediately resorted vnto him, the Ambassadors of his sonne in law the Emperour, to haue his wife Lady Maude now marriage-able, to be sent vnto him; to which request the King most willingly condescended, and to furnish her forth accordingly, laid a taxe vpon his Subiects, taking three shillings for every Hide of land: whereupon the was presently conducted by his greatest Peeres into Germany, and at Mainz married to the Emperour Henry the fourth, being there consecrated and crowned his Emperresse.

(34) Shortly after King Henry tooke the Seas for Normandy, and there created his sonne William (about the age of twelve yeeres (Hauenden saith but eight) Duke of that Country, causing the people to sweare him fealty, whereof grew a custome that thenceforth the Kings of England made euermore their eldest sonnes Dukes of Normandy; which done, he returned, and nothing recorded of his next yeeres adventures, but onely that the Sea gave place to the Sands, and by low Ebbes restored some part of her treasures that long had laien hid and buried in her depth; the riuers likewise forgat their wonted swiftnesse, and as it were seemed vnvilling to pay their ancient tribute into that dejected Element, and among them Thames not the least, whose waters so failed for two daies, that betwix London Bridge and the Tower he became passable and scarce two foot deepe.

(35) King Henry free now from all forraigne & domesticall trouble (saith Griffith ap Rees somewhat vnquiet in Wales) gave his thoughts to assure the Crowne into his line, and to ordaine lawes for the well gouerning of his people, for calling an assembly at Salisbury, caused the Estates both Spirituall and Temporall, to sweare fealty to himselfe, and to his sonne William, the Hope of succession: then reforming many abuses, and ending certain contentions both of his Nobles and Prelates, laid here the first foundation of our High Court of Parliament: for the English Kings in elder times, ordered the affairs of the Common-wealth, by their Edicts, by their officers, and by the Governors of their Country, and seldom had the joint advice of their people; living only at beginning of their government, and in time of warre, whereas now the Subject, best understanding his owne grievances, hath both liberty in choice of their Knights and Burgesses, as also free voice to complain thereof in that honourable assembly.

(16) At this time Therbold Earle of Blessie, Nephew unto King Henry, upon occasion of displeasure rose up in Armes against the French King, to whose aid King Henry sent whereto Lewis found himselfe obliged, and drew to his side Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and Fulk Earle of Armon, whotogether tooke oath to dispossesse Henry of Normandy, and to make William the sonne of the Countess Duke thereof, to whom it belonged by right and descent; to which also many of the Nobles of Normandy consented; pitying the wrong of the noble spiritued Child, and the wretched captivity of the blind, and over-borne Father.

(17) Henry as wisely wrought against their designs, and leavayng a great tax upon his Subjects, passed therewith into Normandy, where visiting the aides of the foreland Therbold as also of the Earle of Brittain, with his English, hee made a great show in the field: at which time King Lewis with the Earles of Flanders and Armon being entered Normandy, and hearing of King Henrys approach and power, flaid scarcely one night, but as me without hart or courage returned, and left the Country for him: so that all things seemed well quietted for a yeare or two; nothing disturbing King Henrys peace, excepting onely the expectance of the Popes Legate, whom hee prohibited to enter England, and the death of his Quene Maud, the very mirror of piety, humility, and princely bounty.

(18) But coules of displeasure kindled betwixt King Henry and Lewis of France, were not quite extinct, though they had laine for a while, as raked up vnder cold ashes. For the next yeare following, and twentieth of his reign, Lewis came into Normandy as hote in rage to do some what, as before he departed thence calme and cold; where forth with he began to molest the Country, which Henry tooke a while suffered, till his friends noted him of cowardize; to whom he replied that he had learned of his Father, to break the same hardines of the French, by patience rather than by force: that they should not wonder, if he were loath to be prodigall of their blood, whom he found so full friends unto him: that he would not gladly winne a Kingdome with their deaths, whose lites hee full found devoted to all hazards for his cause: that hee vied this backwardnesse, onely to flay them, whom hee saw so forward to teele their zeale voluntarily, even with their blood: which to proceed from providence, and not from dauntardnesse, they should soone perceive. This accordingly hee made good; and a pitched field was fought betwixt the Kings of England and France, wherof let vs heare the Monke Paris report. The French King (saith hee) having ordered his Arme into two Battalions, in the former of them placed William the sonne of Duke Robert, the brother of King Henry; the other, Lewis himselfe led, consisting of his speciall and chiefeest Souldiers. King Henry also disposed his forces into three Battalies, the first, consisting of his Peeres and men of Normandy: In the second, some selfe kept among his owne guard, and daile attendants; and in the third, hee marshalled his forces with the maine strength of the Footmen. The Armes thus ordered, the troupes on both sides gave assault, wherof the first Battalions of the French brake through the ranks of the Norman Nobles, overthrowing their Harbours, and forcing them to scatter, in which violence they likewise brake into King Henrys battail, and put it much out of order: but he taking courage, and comforting his men became a most bloody and bold conflikt: wherof himselfe was twice broke upon the head by William Crispin Countie of Eureux (whom for his offences Henry had before banished) whose sword and javels were so fure and so heave, that albeit the Kings helmet was impenetrable, yet wasteful force was it beaten fast to his head, inasmuch that the blood came forth in abundance: but Henry seeing himselfe to be wounded, gathered with his rage more strength, and brake the said Countie in such sort, that at one blow hee overthrew both him and his horse, and took him prisoner, by which example his Souldiers were led to fight like Lions, and the French to betake themselves unto flight. In this battail died many thousands, and among them Baldwin Earle of Flanders: King Henry returning victorious, was received triumphantly into Rouen.

(19) Smith Earle of Armon having lost Baldwin his martiall Companion, and seeing it was booties to bridle against the Stemurke, fell to an agreement with him, which was confirmed by giving his daughter unto his sonne Prince William (now seaventeene yeeres old) whom Henry made inheritor of all his Kingdomes, wherupon both France and Flanders became his reconciled friends, and William did homage to King Lewis for his Duchie of Normandy. These things thus ordered King Henry upon the twentie last of November, loosed from land at Barfleit, and prosperously arrived in England.

(20) Prince William, who now wanted but onely the name of a King, commanded another flippie to bee prepared for himselfe, his Brethren and Sisters, with many other Nobles and Gallants Courtiers, both of England and Normandy, who plying the Mariners with pots and wine (thereby being instruments of their owne calamity approaching) made them braggeto out-faile the Kings ship gone before; and in the night putting forth from land, with a merry gale made way over the dancing waves, as swift as an arrow: but as if the Heavens would have King Henry too great felicitious, and tempered with sense of Courtly variety, in the middle of their iollity and singing, (as they sang their last, and little thought on death) for suddainly the flippie dashed against a Rocke, not very farr from the Shoore, at which fearful disaster, a hideous cry arooke, all of them flitting (and yet through amazement not knowing how to flit) to save themselves from the danger: For God repaying the reward for sinne, suffered not those a naturall wanton (for such were many of them, faith Paris) to have Christian Buriall, but were so swallowed up of the Sea, when her waves were most calme. Prince William got speedily into the Cocke-boate, and might well have escaped, had hee not pittied his filther the Countesse of Perche, crying vnto him for helpe; when turning the boate to her aid, so many strined to get in (every man in such a case esteeming his life as much as a Prince) that with their weight it presently sincke, and of so princely a Traine no one escaped to relate that dolefull tragedie, save onely a bale fellow (a Butcher some say) who (wamme all the night upon the Maine-mate, and got boare in the morning with much danger of life.

(21) This was the most vnfortunate Shipwracke that ever hapned in our Seas, bringing an inconceivable heauinesse to the King, and whole State: for therein perished Prince William Duke of Normandy, the ioy of his Father, and hope of his Nation; Richard his base Brother, his Sister Maud Countesse of Perch, Richard Earle of Chester, with his wife Lady Lucy, the Kings Niece by his Sister Adela, Oswald the Earles Brother, the young Dukes Governour, diuers of the Kings chiefe Officers, and most of the Princes, Geffrey Riddle, Robert Manduin, Dodd William

(42) King Henry that at once deprived of all his lawful Potentia (onely Maude the Emperesse excepted) vpon the tenth of April and two and twentieth yere of his Raigne, married his second wife Adelicia, a Lady of surpassing beauty, the daughter of Geoffrey first Duke of Lowan, in hope (though it proved otherwise) to haue repaired his late losses by issue of her: whose Coronation was appointed to be celebrated by Roger Bishop of Saris-bury, the infirmity of Palsy to troubling Ralph Arch-bishop of Canterbury, that him selfe could not performe it: yet because Roger was not appointed by him, he forbad his imploiment; and the King wearing his Crowne, faith the Monke of Cheshir, this testy old man could hardly bee entreated by the Lords, to with-hold his hands from striking the flame from the Kings head: of such Spirites then were those spiritual Prelates, and lesaue to loose their pompous prehemence of honour: but his high top was somewhat born down by the boisterous blaib of Pope Calist, from whose holy band Thurstan Arch-bishop of York (contrary to the Kings com-mand, and his owne Oath) hauing receiued con-secration, and thereupon forbidden by the King to put foot againe within his Dominions, his holines commanded his New-Creature should be installed (= against all right and custom) without professing any subiection to the See of Canterbury, and threatned with his curse to interdict both Prouinces till that was performed. The cause of the Popes indignation against Ralph is supposed to bee, for that hee had receiued his Infeudature of the King, who contrary to the Canons of the late Romane Synode, did still challenge and practise that Regall prerogative.

(43) Whether it were about this contention of Infeudation, or about a Fryer of the Holy Sepulchre, whom (as Atalamb. faith) the King had imprisoned, or about Thurstans hard vage; certain it is, that the Pope much desiring to haue priuate talke with the King, came to him into Normandy, and so at Gisors conferred (faith Paris) the Great King and the high Priest: but notwithstanding the Popes threats or intreaties, Thurstan was kept in banishment full five yeares, and then for the Popes pleasure was restored. But at this meeting the King was so liberal of rich gifts to the Pope and his Cardina, that therefore the Pope (faith a Monke) held him a most wise and eloquent perswaser, and his allians very profitable: But it seemeth the Cardinals were neither so eloquent nor learned as they should be, for that (faith hee) two yeantes in the Kings Company, Iouers of the Earle of Melient (learned both, and therefore fite to be with that learned King) yesseing of some points with them, and disputing Scholler-like with Logical syllogismes, the Card Robbes (vied to other exercises at home, then studying) were quite gawelled, and had nought to say, but that more learning was in these Willeme parts then they had thought. But as these Church-fittes did not a little disquiet the King, so also did new Welsh tumults, raised by Meredith ap Iethym, who with the three fones of Cadogan, Enean, Madoc, and Atergan, tore troubled the Kings people and peace, by breaking into the Marches, and especially into Cheshire, where they burned two Castles. The King therefore making towards them, had sent his maine Army to conduct the Carriages, whilst him selfe with a small Company tooke a nearer way through the Mountaines and Seraites; which being foreleaid by the Enemy, was with great courage set vpon, and through the advantage of the Place, many of his men slaine, and more hurt, by the Welsh Archers, whose showers of Arrowes rained thicke vpon them from the higher ground: amongst which, one was so lenelled at the King, that it struck him on the breast, yet being fully armed, did him no hurt; but hee therewith all wonderfully dismayed, and by likelihood fearing some treason amongst his owne, (for, then hee swore by our Lords death, his vniual oath, that no Welshman shoulde that Arrow, but one of his owne Prouinciall) and considering that by these his ouer-rul proceedings his glory purchased in this wild and rude Country, came to a Parley & Peace; receiuing of the King a thousand head of Cattle, and leauing for Fitzwarren Lieutenant of the Marches, returned to England, where hee held three Parliaments in the same yere, one at Norwich, another at Northampton, and the third at London.

(44) The Normans still repining at the Capitiuity of Robert their late Duke; and standing well affected vnto his Sonne, thought now the time fitting, (Prince William being dead) to raise the other William his Cousen Germane into his place: who, as the Monke of Cheshir affirmeth, married Sybil the other daughter of Eadlie, Earle of Anjou, with whom hee receiued the Earldome of Ceu-mannia, vpon displeasure that King Henry witheld the formers dowry in England. The chiefe in this action was Robert Earle of Melient, who was lately fallen off from the King: Henry therefore hailing into Normandy, besieged his Castle Pont-Audemor, and tooke it, and at that time built a large and high wall with many Bulwarkes about the Tower of Reues, repaired the Castles of Caen, Arches, Gisors, Falaise, Argentan, Damfort, Vernon, Amboise, and sundry others.

(45) In the meane time, Earle Admont desirous to bee reuenged vpon the King, associated Hugh Earle of Mortuier and others vnto his aide, who entering Normandy with fire and sword, did much harme as they went, thinking to bring all to their obediace: against whose outrages, William Tankerville the Kings Chamberlaine, and Lieutenant in those parts, addrest himselfe, and training them into danger of an Ambush, laid for that purpose, after long fight tooke them both prisoners, and presented them to his Master, whereby the warres ceased for a time in those parts.

(46) In this the Kings absence, but yet with his licence, Iohannes Crenouille the Popes holy Cardinal, came into England, sent by Honorius the Second, therto to redresse the ill continged sinne-seeming abuse of the Clergy, in retaining and vling, according to Gods owne Ordinance, the Society of their wives. This Pontificall Prelate was entertained by all the Bishops and Abbots with great and costly Pretences, and afterward being solemnely sent in a Councell at London, vpon the birth-day of the Blessed Virgine, made a soleme Oration in praise of Virginitie and Chastity, with a terrible inuective against the married Priests: and to amplify their finnes the more, hee shewed what extreme impiety it was, to rise from the bed of vnlawfull lust, (for so was their challe Marriage termed) and with polluted hands to touch the Sacrament of the body of Christ: but the same night following he = haung that very day consecrated that holy Sacrament, was himselfe taken with a Whore, the matter being so apparant, that it could not bee hid, (neither ought it to be silenced, faith Huntingdon) to the great reproach of those most vncatche boasters of Chastite, as both Paris and Higden themselves doe confesse: and so hee returned to Rome with shame enough, but with little successe in that intended boineisse: till some few yeres after = King Henry, feeling very desirous to settle his pretended continency in the Clergy; in a Councell held at London, obtained (through simplicity of the Archbishop of Canterbury, faith Paris) that him selfe should haue the execution of iustice and punishments of the Priests, that offended either in keeping of their wives, or vling of Consecrines, (for likely those that liked not the ooe, loued the other, full an Eclipse of the Sunne, that Malimbury the reporter saith, himselfe then saw the starres plainly in the Firmament about the Sunne, and that two daies after, so great and fearful an Earthquake happened, that the house where in himselfe late, was lifted vp with a double remoue; and others say, that out of rissie in the earth, burning flames arose, that could not be quenched, which diuers iudged to be fatal prodiges of the deathes of those Princes that soone after ensued.

(56) For Robert the Curtise, after twenty five yeeres imprisonment and blindness, through griefe con-ceiued at the putting on of a faire new robe, (too large for the King, and therefore in kindnesse sent to Duke Robert to wear) grew weary of his life (as disdaining to be mocked with his brothers cast clothes,) and curling the time of his unfortunate Nativity, refused thenceforth to take any visitance, and so pined himselfe to death. His body was buried at Ginsester in the Church of Saint Peter, and middle of the Quire, where to this day remaineth his Tombe, with a carved Image of his feature, as the monument of a most unfortunate man.

(57) And not long after K. Henry in Normandy commending his very well from Hunting in the Forest of Lymen, and Towne of Saint Denys, made his report of a dith of Lampreyes (which meat he too well loved, but could never well digest,) whereupon he fell more grievously sicke, and the same fall increasing, after seven daies sickness, upon the first of December, the sixty five of his age, and yeare of Christ Iesus, 1135. when he had reigned King of England, thirty five yeeres, four moneths, lacking four daies, & Duke of Normandy, twenty nine yeeres and four moneths: he died in the said towne of
S. Denys, and from thence was conueyed to Ram, where his Bowels, Eyes and Braines were taken out, and buried; the body also sliced, and powdered with much salt, was wrapped in a Bulls hide to anoint the stench, being so inrolleable, (a point fitting for such great Princes to thinke on, & in their great glory and pleasures to remember their frail and humane condition,) that the Physician who tooke out his braines was poisoned therewith, and presently died: whereupon some observed, that other Kings killed men in their life; that he also after he was dead; thence was his Corps carried into England, and honourably buried upon the day of Christ's Nativity, at Reading in Bartholomew, in the Abbey that himselfe had there founded, and endowed with large possessions.

(58) After his death (saith Hamington and Ha-nnington) men spake their mind as freely of him, as of any other dead man: some commending him for these three glorious felicities, a Wifelye, a Politic, and a Worthy; others condemning him for three speciall vices, Covetousnesse, Cruelty, and Lechery; some influences of which hee had roched in the course of his life; the first three, in obtaining and keeping the Crowne; the last, in his most pious taxations, cruell handling and imprisoning his Brethren;
and his incontinency of life shall presently appeare,
by his many illegitimate issues, the fruites of his wantonnes, and witness of his shame: in that Princes who are to punish such sinners in others, ought themselves especially to be free from them: for though their living fortunes stoppe mens tongues from vpraiding: yet after their death the tongues of the vulgar, and penes of the learned, will make the infamy of their vices to bee immortal.

(59) He was for personage of a reasonable stature, broad breasted, well jointed, and full of flesh;
amiable of countenance, sharpe and faire eyes, blacke of haire, and that somewhat carelesly hanging on his forehead; his mind was enriched with many vertues, a follower of Justice, a lover of Religion, severe against theues, and all effeminate niceties;
So that hee commanded mens long haire (which against God and Nature's law was matchable at that time with womens) to be cut off: temperate of diet, and never drinking but for thirst; valiant in bat-talle, yet very circumspect, seeking rather to win by wile care, then by effusion of blood: and by the report of most Writers excelled all the Princes of the World in his time, in Merry, Wealth, and Bounty, vnto Manueries: the land hee defended by Garrisons of Souldiers planted on the Coastlines of his neighbour Princes, building many Fortes, Bulwarkes and Calles; besides twenty five Townes and Cities: whatsoever was wisely or vir-tuously performed in his Governement, is chiefly ascribed to his younger yeeres institution in true Learning and Philo sophy, which was the great argument of him vnto the Science of Regality, being often heard to say, that hee esteemed an unlearned King but a crowned Ass. In which regard (saith a Politic, hee took his pleasure to reside in his new Palace, which himselfe built at Oxford, both for the delight hee had in learned men, himselfe being very learned, and for the vicinity of his new Palace at Windsor, which hee had fringed with all kind of strange beasts, wherein he much delighted, as Lions, Leopards, Lynxes, Camels, Porcupines, and the like. His delight also in works of deuotion, shewes it selfe both in the erection and indowment of the Collegiate and Episco-pall Sees of Carlisle, and Ely, as also of the Abbeyes of Hildesburgh, Reading, and the Priory of Dunstable: His Wife Queen Mat and founded the Priory of Holy Trinity within Algate, and the Hospital of Saint Giles in the Fields: so that by himselfe, his Queene, and other deuoted persons, twenty foure foundations to religious vices (if not more) were erected in the raigne of this King.

His Wifery.

(60) Made the first Wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Matheus the third, Iurymare, a Can-mar, King of Scotland: her mother was S. Margaret, daughter to Edward, sonne of Edmund the Irre-side King of England. She was married vnto him at London in the first yeare of his raigne, Anno 100: by Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury: having formerly vowed her selfe a Nunne, which some swore she did not for love of single life, but to anioide some vnworthy matches, which her Father would haue imposed on her. Her Coronation was at Westminster by the same Anselme, on Sunday the eleuenth of November in the same yeare. She was his wife seuenteene yeeres and more, famous for her learning, lone to learning, charity to the poore, and all vertuous dispositions; and deceased at Westminster
the first of May, in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, and yeere of our Salvation, 1118. where shee was buried in S. Peters Church, on the right side of King Edward the Confessor.

(61) Adelise, or Alise, the second wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Godfrey the first Duke of Lorraine, by the daughter of the Emperour Henrie
the fourth, and sister to Duke Godfrey, and Isabel of Lmain. Shee was married vnto him the nine and twentieth of January, in the twentie one of his raigne, and yeere of Christ, 1121. and was crowned the morrow after being sunday. Shee was his wife fifteene yeeres, but euer childlesse, and in iuring him, was remarried to William Danby Earle of Arundell, and was mother of Earle William the second, Reyner, Godfrey, and Iohn, married to Iohn Earle of Angi, &c.

His Issue.

(62) William, the sonne of King Henry and Queen
Mat and his first wife, was born the second of his Fathers Raigne, and of Christ, 1102. When he came to age of foureteene yeeres, the Nobility of England
did him homage, and swore their fealties vnto him at Sherburne. The third yeere after, hee married the daughter of Fauke, Earle of Anjou; and the same yere hee was made Duke of Normandy, doing his homage for the same to Leueis the Greffe, King of France; and receiued the homage and oathes of the Nobility of that Country: but in his returne for England, hee was vnfortunatly drowned nere vnto Bartholomew vpon the twenty first of November, the yere of Grace 1120. and eighteenth of his owne age, without any issue, to the great griefe of his Father.

Maud. (63) Maud the daughter of King Henry, and of Queene Maud his first wife, was borne the fourth yere of her Fathers reign. She was the second wife of the Emperour Henric the fourth, espoused at fixe yeres of age, and at eleuen with great solemnity was married and crowned his Emperesse at Mentz in Germany, 6. January, Anno 1114. the ninth of her husbands, and fourteenth other Fathers Reignes. Shee was his wife twelue yeres, and furnished him without any issue of him, & coming into England a widowe, hee had fealty sworn vnto her by the Nobility, and was married to Geffrey Plantagenet Earle of Anjou, sonne of Fauke King of Ierusalem, vpon the third of April and yere of Grace 1127. by whom shee had issue, Henry, the second, King of England, Geffrey Earle of Norman in Brittaine, and William who was called Earle of Poys: she was his wife twenty three yeres, and furnished him also continued a widowe the last seuentee yeres of her life, which she ended in the City of Rouen the tenth of September, 1167. the fourteenth of the reign of King Henry her sonne, and was buried in the Abbey of Bec in Normandy.

Richard. (64) Richard a second sonne to King Henry, and Queene Maud, by the testimony of Cornelius the Monke of Canterbury, who maketh Maud their eldest Child, William the seconds and lastly, Richard; and then (saith he) the left bearing: but Malmsbury saith, shee had but two Children, one of each sexe.

Rufus. (65) Eufora also another daughter, and fourth Child (by Heitor Boetius the Scottish Historian) is said to be borne vnto the Beaulieu by Queene Maud; the credite of the two last, I leaue to the reporters, who onely thus name them without any further relation.

His Naturall Issue.

Robert. (66) Robert, the naturall sonne of King Henry, was Earle of Gloucester, and married Matilda daughter and heire of Robert Fitzhamon Lord of Gloucester, by whom hee had issue William Earle of Gloucester, Richard Bishop of Egyon, Roger Bishop of Worcester, and Maud the wife of Randolph German, the mother of Hugh Kenest Earle of Cheshire, and Richard his brother: Earle William married Ami daughter of Robert Basse Earle of Leinster, and had issue three daughters and beires of that Earldome, which by Ami the second of them, in the end descended to Clare Earle of Hereford. This Earle Robert died the last of October, in the twelfth yere of King Stephen, and was buried at Brighthelm in the Church of S. James, which hee had founded, and his body laide in the middle of the Quire; vnto him William Malmsbury dedicated his Booke called Historia Novella.

Richard. (67) Richard another naturall sonne of King Henry, was as it seemeth by an ancient Register of the Monastery at Abington, borne in the reign of King William Rufus, of the widow of Anskil, a Nobleman of the Country adjoining to the said Monastery; and it seemeth hee is that Richard that was drowned in the Norman Seas nere Burghley, amongst the rest of King *Henric*s children.

Raynold. (68) Raynold the naturall sonne of King Henry, was borne of a daughter vnto Sir Robert Corbet, Lord of Alderley in Warwickshire, by the gift of the King in finour of her, who was after married to Henry Fitzherbert his Chamberlain. This Raynold was created Earle of Cornwall, and Baron of Casile comb, with consent of King 56. [1133] and had issue four Daughters, of whom haue sprung many faire branches.

(69) Robert another of that name, was borne of Edith, the sister of Iac, sonne and daughter of Forme, the sonne of Sigward, both of them great Barons in the North: which Edith afterwards King Henry gave in marriage to Robert Dalitz, Baron of Hook-Norton in Oxfordshire, and with her gave him the Mannor of Eldred, in the County of Buckingham, by whom hee had issue Henry Deyle Baron of Hook-Norton, who oftentimes mentioneth this Robert in his Charters, cuer calling him Robert his brother the Kings sonne.

(70) Gilbert another naturall sonne of King Henry is named in the additions to the story of William Gemetien the Norman Monke, in the Chronicle of that country, written by John Taylor being a Translator of that worke out of Latine into French; and lastly, in the Treatise betwixt England and France, written in the French tongue by John Tillet, Secretary to their late King Henry the second, and yet in them, not any other mention is made, but only of his name.

(71) William also a naturall sonne of Henry the King, had giuen vnto him the Towne of Tracie in Normandy, of which hee tooke his surname, and was called William of Tracie: But whether he were the Progenitor of the Traciers, sometime Barons in Drenthshire, or of them that now be of the same surname; or whether Sir William Tracie, one of the four Knights, that flew Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, were any of his posterity, is not certainly reported: nor any thing else of him, more than that hee died a little after his Father, which was in the yere of Christ, 1115.

(72) Henry another naturall sonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Nesse, daughter of Ross a Tender Prince of South-Wales, who was the Wife of Sir Gerard Windsor, and of Stephen, Constables of the Castles of Pembroke, and Aberystwyth in Wales, and Progenitors of the Families of the Fitzgeralds, and the Fitz-Stephens in Ireland; hee was borne and bred, and liued, and married in Wales, having issue two sonnes, namely, Meiler and Robert, of which Meiler the elder married the daughter of Hugh Lacy, Lord of Meiche in Ireland; hee was as the conflict in the Ile of Anglesey, betwixen Magnus the sonne of Harald, Harfager King of Norway, and Bug of Montgomery, Earle of Arundell and Shrewsbury, wherein hee was slain, as some say, with the said Earle, Anno, 1197.

(73) Maud the Naturall daughter of King Henry was Countesse of Ferche, and the first wife of Earle Rotrou the first of that name, sonne of Arnolfe de Hesling the first Earle of that County: Shee had issue by him one only daughter named Magdalen wife to Garry the fourth King of Nauarre mother of King Sanchez, furnished the wife, from whom all the Kings of Nauarre are descended: Shee died vpon Friday the twenty sixth of November, in the twentieth of her Fathers reign, and yere of Grace 1120. being drowned in the Sea with her brother Duke William.

(74) Maud another of that name and naturall daughter of King Henry, was married to Conan the first of that name furnished the Grosle, Earle of little Brittaine in France, sonne of Earle Alan by Ermenegard his second wife, by Alan (hee had issue Henri, pronounced illegitimate, and disinherited by his supposed father Constance, that died without issue, and Bertha the wife of Eudes Earle of Ferraris, mother of Earle Conan the younger, who by Margaret sister of William King of Scots had issue Constance married to Geffrey sonne of King Henry the second.

(75) William likewise another naturall daughter of King Henry was married to Eufance the illegitimate sonne of William Lord of Brittain in Normandy, who was the sonne and heire of William Fitz-Osborne and elder brother of Roger, both Earles of Hereford

in England, and this Euface had her beene lawfully borne in wedlocke, had been heire to the Earledomes of Hereford and Leicester: notwithstanding he had a small part in that inheritance of the Towne of Potic from which he tooke his surname, being commonly called Euface of Pacy, and had issue by this Italian his wife, William and Roger of Pacy his sonnes.

(76) A naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the continuator of the History of William Gemeticus, and by John Tiller his follower, is reported by them to have beene married to one William Gaet a Norman; but in neither of these writers is any mention made of her name, or of his estate, issue or other relation.

(77) Another naturall daughter of King Henry is without name, recited by the said Authors, and by them reported to be married to the Vicount of Beaumont, which is a Towne within the County of Mayne. Shee had issue by him, as Roger of Houeden writeth, Richard Vicount Beaumont, Father of Queen Ermengard the wife of King William of Scotland: and

Robert the Abbot of Mount-Saint Michael mentioneth another of her sonnes, named Ralph, who (as he saith) was Bishop of Angiers.

(78) Another naturall daughter also of King Henry is recited by the Norman and French writers before avouched, and reported by them to be married to Mathew of Mountmerancy, the sonne of Bochard of Mountmerancy, from whom perhaps descended the House of Mountmerancy, who after came to be Earles and Dukes, being growne to be one of the greatest houses in France, next to the Princes of the bloud, for possessions, alliances, and honour.

(79) Elizabeth the last naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the former Authors, was vmarried in the time of the one, and her husband unknowne to the other; but both of them agree, that she was borne of Elizabeth the sister of Walter Earle of Meulan, who was sister also of Robert Bassar Earle of Leicester, wife of Gilbert Earle of Pembroke, and mother of Earle Richard Strangbow, the Conquerour of Ireland.

bishop of Canterbury, the very first man that had sworn vnto Maud the Emperesse: by whose example many others were winded into the like pernicie, & traitorously auowing, that it was balancie for so many, and so great Peeres, to be shiefte vnto a Woman. And to helpe firward those audacious beginnings, Roger Bishoppe of Salisbury, the late Kings Treasurer protested (Malinsbury, who reports it him- selfe heard it from him) that they were free from the oath made to the Emperesse, for that without consent of the Barons he had married out of the Realm; but that which wrought most, was the testimony of Hugh Bigot, a Seneciall vnto King Henry departed, who coming ouer with Stephen, tooke his corporall oath, that the King on his death-bed, vpon some offence taken against his daughter Maud, disinherited her, and appointed this Stephen his nephew to be his successeur. These colourable insinuations so moued the Incredulous Archbishop and the Peeres, that they all swore fealty vnto him and became his Liegemen.

(1) His first landing in England, (being at Whitland-bay) by a tempest of thunder so wonderfull & terrible that the people thought verily the ende of all was at hand, did prognosticke the storms of troubles which his pernicie brought with him; for euen then both Dover & Canterbury fortified themselves against him, though London gave better leaue to his entrance, whose Person and presence drew euer the affections of the beholder, being in all parts complete with natures endowments, of personage passing comely, of disposition louing, cheerefull, and affable to the meane, alwayes very liberrall; but now especially, knowing his Parle the best Language to plead for his Tithes; and in Marshall prowesse gave place to none of that time wherein, though his whole raigne was continually spent, yet (by reason of King Henries great Treason left) neuer hathured he the Commons with any exactions, a thing that enrgaineth the loue of the common sort: neither is he taxed with any other obferable crime, save onely his pernicie against the Emperesse Matilda and her sonne.

(4) Hee entred his gouernement the yeare of Christ Iesus, 1135. the second day of December, and was crowned at Westminster the twenty first of the same Month, being Saint Stephens day, by William Corbell Archbishop of Canterbury, who with the rest of the Prelates doing him homage, and knowing now hee would yeild to any conditions for performance whereof his Brother of Winchester did there engage himselfe for a pledge, they all tooke their oath of allegiaunce conditionally, (traitorously, I might say) to obey him as their King, so long as he should preferre their Church Liberties, and the vigour of Discipline: And that the Lay-Barons made vialsof this policie, appeareth by Robert Earle of Gloucester, who sware to be true Liegeman to the King, as long as the King would preferre to him his dignities, and keepe all Couenants, wherupon the King promised for the present, that he would speedily reforme the ouer-hard lawes of his Predecessors, and mollifie the extremities thereof to their owne likings, vnder his Seale and Charter: and so thence hastning to meete the Corps of his deceased vnclie, (which was now brought into England) he honoured that pompous funeral, with his owne, and all his great Prelates and Peeres, attendance at Reading; whence presently he went to Oxford, where becalend his fore-promised Charter of many indulgent fauours: & prefacing therein, that hee attained the Crowne by Election onely, and that Pope Innocentius confirmed the same; whereby may be conceived, that his Holinesse, either out of hatred to the Emperesse, (whose husband Henry was no friend to the Papacie) or for some other holy ends, had no small hand in aduancing Stephen perjured and disloyall intrusion. The Tenour of the Charter is this: That all Liberties, Customes, and Possessions granted to the Church, should bee firme and inuoluntarily that all Persons and Causes Ecclesiasticall should appertaine onely to Ecclesiasticall iudicature: that none but Clergy men should enuey the possessions of Churches, or any Church-mens goods; that all bad vsages in the Land touching forreign, exactions, &c. should be utterly extirpate; the ancient Lawes restored, &c. As Stephen well knew, that they had chosen him their King, onely to make their vices of him, so these immunities he granted, rather to blear their Eyes, then with any purpose to manacle his own hands with such Parchment-Chaines.

(5) This his entrance was very peaceable (saith Germanus of Canterbury) but by little, and little civil discord increased, to the lamentable destruction of men, and the land: whereto Robert Earle of Gloucester, half-brother of the Emperesse, whose wisdom and power King Stephen much feared, gaue secret beginning, when amongst them that loue him finally, hee concluded his (as we said) with this refection, that his owne authority should be nothing impaired, meaning no longer to respect him as his King, then the King should him as a Peere: and a general siffurance, to erect Castles for strength throughout the land, was no security to his peaceable estate. Intended indeed to strengthen the peace, it ended against Maud the Emperesse; but proued the base of all sibi-cite obedience: which was politickly considered by Henry Fitz-Emperesse, in the conclusion of Peace betwixt King Stephen and him, when a thousand one hundred and fiftene Castles so raised, were againe razed and call downe.

(6) The first man that profitably set himselfe opposite to Stephens usurpation, was Baldwin de Reders, who fortified the City and Caille of Exeter against him; the Welshmen also, bearing in minde the harms that K. Henry had done them, desired reuenge, and made many slaughters vpon the Kings people: Against these, Stephen proceeded with his band of English and Flemmings, and after a strong and chargeable liege, by famine drew forth Baldwin, his wife, and children, all which hee did inherited and expulsed the Land, vnto so great lenity towards all other offenders there, that it gaue great encouragement to others rebellions. But in Wales the businesse prospered not so well, where at Cardigan a great battell was fought, with such slaughter and ouerbearing of the English, that the men by women were taken and led away Captiue, and so many drowned by the fall of a Bridge ouer Towd, that a passage was made ouer the water with the dead Carcases therein heaped.

(7) Neither thus onely, but some of the English also dissenting King Stephen, secretly instigated David King of Scotland, to reuenge the wrongs done to the Emperesse Maud, a seruice as they wraged it very gratefull vnto her, and euen pleasing to God and Man. He therefore confirming, invaded the borders, and tooke from the English both Carlisle and Newcastle, which hee staffed with Garrisons. Against these, King Stephen prepared, and with a great power came into those parts, where diuers accidents by diuers reporters are related, yet all agree that ere long peace was concluded. Carlisle still enioied by King David, and the Earldome of Huntington by Prince Henry his sonne; for which hee did homage at his fathers command, David himselfe refusing to doe (as Helmer Doctor the Scottish writer affirmeth) for that he had giuen his faith before vnto Maud the Emperesse.

(8) King Stephen returned, and all in good quiet, he suddenly fell sick of a Lethargy, yet & in such danger of life that the common report gaue fourth hee was dead, which stirred great troubles both in England and else where, for thereby his friends were stricken into great feare, and the factious more bold to prepare for Queene Maud; for Hugh Bigot one of his chiefeest and first raiuers fortified himselfe in the Caille of Norwich, and would not deliuer it vnto any save onely to the King, yea and very unwillingly also vnto him: and in Wales, Owen and Cadwalader

The English Nobles against King
Stephen.
Simon Dun.

the sons of Grafth ap Conan Prince of that Country, earned great spoils from the English, as of other goods, to all of Horse and Armour, and habilliments for warre, likewise in Normandy, Conspiracies began to had forth: for Geoffrey Earle of Arden, who in right of his wife made claime vnto all, really got the hearts and endeavours of many to adhere vnto the true heire; possessing himselfe of certaine Castles; but entering further on the Demaines of one Talvas, a man of noe professed for some offence or displeasure by King Stephen the Normans disliking that, and some other his doings, sent for Thobald Earle of Blouys (his elder Brother) offering him both their Dukedome, and their swordes, and liues to defend him in it; who conuincing to Lacous, Robert Earle of Gloucester, (not vntilling any way to weaken King Stephen) deliuered vnto him vpon composition, the County of Salisbury, himselfe carrying no small summe of money thence out of King Henries Treasure, and very thoroughly, (though secretly) watching all opportunities to aduance the title and desires of the Emperesse.

(9) Stephen recovered, and hearing these stirres, prepared himselfe first into Normandy, at whose approach, after some small attempts, the people (distracted betwixt feare, and sense of their duty) yielded themselves vnto his power; surrendering their fenced Cities, and other strong holds. This good successe thus fortunately begonne, he hoped further to prosecute, by means of a league, which hee lately had made with Leno the sixteenth King, of France: and heereupon created Engage his eldest son lining, Duke of Normandie, commanding him to do his homage for the same to Leno.

(10) Earle Thobald living himselfe thus defeated of his hopes and purposes, stormed at the wrongs done by King Stephen; for hee, (his elder by birth, and Blayfes Earldomes lawfull heire) laide his title both for Normandie and England also, now vsurped by Stephen his yonger: notwithstanding (age nought auailing without power) hee came to a composition, and remitted his Claime for two thousand markes annually to be paid. Geoffrey of Arden likewise, whose title by his Wife was better then them both, not able at the present (being so far ouer-matched by the Kings power, wealth, & confederates) to do what he would, yielded to necessity, and for fine thousand markes yearly to be paid, iustified Stephen quietly to enjoy the Crowne.

(11) Having thus at once swept the two greatest rubbes out of his fortunes way, hee well hoped that all cloudes of displeasure, and opposition, were now ouer-blowne, when vntexpectedly newes came, that England was in tumult, the sparkes of conspiracie, kindled secretly before in the hearts of fassious Peers, now openly breaking forth, vpon aduantage of his absence in Normandie therefore, hauing not altogether coposed his buisines in those parts, he took ship for England in the depth of the winter, and euen in the Fygh of Christis Natinnie, besieged, and after tooke the Castle of Besford, that was manned against him in the behalfe of the Seats; about which time David their King having entered Northumberland in the quarrell of Queene Maud, the ruler fort of his Armie (as commonly the best governed is not emptic of such) reuenged too tragically the wrongs of the Emperesse, in ripping vp the wombes of women with child, and toying their infants vpon the points of their speares, slaying the Priests at the Altar, and dismembred the flaine bodies in most vnhumane manner.

(12) Against these, King Stephen made hastie forward, altho' it was no policie, to give one haire rest vnto the Enemie: and threatening more then hee accomplished, entered Scotland whence after some small reuenge wrought, hee was hastily recalled; so many of his Nobles in England now in Armes against him, that hee was in a sort beset on corrie side, And what other could hee, a Farper, expect from them, but Treason, whom himselfe had formerly taught to be Treason to their rightfull Soueraigne. But yet (as no Rebellion was euer without pretence of Reason and Iustice) they alledged, that hee had violated his Oath touching their Forreits, and other Immunities of Church and Common-wealth: but Church and Common-wealth, were but publicke colours for priuate grudges, (as Malmerbury, who then liued, well vnderstood) which the Great-Ones conceived against their King, because he would not grant them such Castles, Commands, and Lordships, as themselves liked and expected of him, whom they thought to be so obliged vnto them, that he ought denie them nothing. The endlesse and hamlesse importunities of these men, sometimes hee put off, alcadging thereby, the empasse of his Crownes reuenges; sometimes hee was faine to listle, disgracing their falling from him: whose loathe notwithstanding being built on so vn-noble grounds, was but reuered, and therefore could not long be permanent. Neither was it. For Robert of Gloucester (the Emperesse half-brother, and now her cluife Counsellor and Captaine) finding those particular dislikes apt to be wrought on, and made seruicable for a common bechoffe; whetted on with the touch of conscience, and counsells of the learned men, (who vrged him, with the hazard both of his credit, and soule, for neglect of his feith, and only lawfull Oath to the Emperesse) thus threatening meillages vnto King Stephen, charging him with his Oath of Allegiance vnto Lady Maud his Soueraigne, against whom hee had shewed himselfe a most perfidious man, and had impiously drawne him with others to doe the like; and so denouncing Stephen an open Enemieto the State, and himselfe vnto Stephen, made from his faction with the assistance of many Nobles among whom, Mile, a chiefe man of warre, and High Countable to King Stephen, reuolted from him, and became a great help to their proceedings.

(13) Earle Robert (whom erstwhile the enraged King discharged of his honours and possessions in England) tooke into the Castle of Brifson, and made good alio his Castle of Stile; his complices likewise did the like in other places: for William Talbot manac'd the Castle of Horford, William Lancel the Castle of Caric, Peter de the Castle of Ludlow, William de Mount the Castle of Danforth, Robert de Nihel the Castle of Warren, Engace Fitz-Alan the Castle of Alenace, William Fitz-Alan the Castle of Shrewsbury, and William de the Castle of Dunelm. And thus those forts which were erected to defend the Crowne, first offended the King, some few wherof as hee recouered, he flatted to the ground, and willed the other no higher walls; still (swearing by Gods Birth (his viall Oath) hee would not so lightly bee vntaken of his Crowne, and wondering what should moue them, who had so readie aduanced him, so speedily to vntake him. One fresh mo' iue to these Noble-mens discontents was the Kings. Seizing on some great men and their lands, on bare suspicion of their iollitie; and on the other side, the extraordinary fauour, which Stephen shewed to William de Tracy, and his Flemings (which they interpreted as a contempt of themselves and their Nation) whose counsells hee generally followed, and euerie flie relied vpon: In disaine wherof, they lent word to the Emperesse, that within fine Monethes, shee should haue the Realme at command, according to their Oath made to her Father.

(14) These rumoules thus working in the bowels of the Kingdome, David King of Scotland had better opportunitie to assaile the sides and skirts thereof; and following what hee had begonne, with a very great Armie entering Northumberland, made great slaughter of the English, and destruction of their Countrey: Against whom the Northern Lords prepared, at the command of Thurstan Arch-bishop of York (left by King Stephen Lieutenant in those parts) who being by sickness kept from the Field, ap-

pounted Ralph Bishop of Durham his General whose Inevitable Oration before their joining of bataille, occasionally upon the forced madame canons of some undisciplined Scots, is at large set down by Harden, Huntingdon, Wendover and others; in the close whereof, he absolved them from punishment of sin, all such of his fides, should die in this bataille which made the English more desperate in fight, who so forcely pressed upon their enemies that they forsooke their King, he notwithstanding valiantly persuing till his dearest friends earnestly urged him to avoid. But his son Henry, esteeming more of glory the life, rushed in amongst his retiring soldiers, and with undaunted courage, perswading them to regard chemeilus and his presence, with threat of shameful deaths to all such as fled, he held them in for a time till at length over-laid with the maine-battle of the English, the magnanimous Prince Henry, likewise quitted the field, bitterly cursing the forwardnes of Fortune, and the mischance that hapned that day.

(15) With like fortunate successe, proceeded Stephen against his disobedient Barons, and wanne from them the Castles of Hereford, Gloucester, & Exeter, Bristol, & Salisbury, whereby he weakened Earle Robert so much, that he was constrained to flee into France, and there indignated his sister the Empress to come into England.

(16) These domestike opposites thus removed out of his way, King Stephen re-addressed himselfe for the North, to prosecute that which Thorsland had beguene: first therefore winning the Castle of Leeds, he went into Scotland, where by the persuasion & prowesse of Mary and Matilda (Sister Paris) a Peace was concluded betwixt the two Kings; and Stephen there returning, brought Prince Henry (whom he created Earle of Huntingdon) with him into England, and at the siege of London Castle, the adventurous Prince was almost surpris'd, where the besieged with an Iron Grapple pluckt him from his horse, and so had taken him, but that King Stephen himselfe, with great valour and honour recovered him: who having wonne the Castle, went presently to Oxford, whither newes was brought him that the Emperesse was preparing for England.

(17) To make all sure as he went, Stephen thought it good to demolish, and raze those Castles lately built, (having had experience to what troubles they had brought him) and to prevent the building of new ones, namely, that of the Danes, now (as hee surmised) in fortifying against him: hee therefore knit for Roger Bishop of Salisbury (the Founder both of that Castle, as also those other of Sherburne & Malmsbury) a man who in a bad cause had stood King Stephen in good stead, howsoever some envying his greatnes, had incensed the King against him, and other Prelates, as if they were fallen from his side. The Bishop standing peremptorily on his innocence, yet mistrusting the euen, craued the company of Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, and of Nigel Bishop of Ely; so with a great and well appointed traine, replied to Oxford vnto the Court, where Stephen had summoned a Grand-Council of the States.

(18) The King who expected of Church-men humility, seeing them now armed as men for the field, commanded his attendants to take armour likewise, and so coming communication of duers matters with his Peeres and Prelates, their Soldiers casually meeting, fell at variance, where the Bishops friends had the worse, so that many of them were wounded, and therewith forsaking their matters ranne away. This great assembly thus disturbed, the King required the Bishops to satisfy his Court for these outrages of their seruants, which satisfaction should be, to deliver the keys of all their Castles to the King, as pledges of their fidelity, which the yrefuming, the Bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln were laid hold of; but Ely escaped to the Castle of Dunelm:
Alexander was imprisoned, till hee had yielded him his Castles of New-castle, and Slisford; Roger the Castles of Sherburne, and the Danes (accused then one of the goodliest Castles of Europe) besides forty thousand Markes in filkes; (which Iohes the Bishop did not long survive). The King employed the money to purchase Lady Constance, sister to Lewis King of France, to be wife vnto his sonne Eustace: all which was to strengthen himselfe against the Emperesse Matilda, whose coming he continually feared, & now before his expectation she was landed in England, at a fitt time for her designs, when all the great Prelates (who formerly were his chiefest friends) were highly incensed against the King for such oppression of their Brethren.

(19) The place of her arriuage was at the port of Arundell, into which Calte there was joyfully received by William de Albini, who had married Queen Adeliza, the late wife to King Henry, whose Dowrie
it was; from hence Earle Robert deserting his course only with tenne horse-men, and as many Archers, (for in all hee brought over but one hundred, and forty with him for so great an exploit) passed throgh
the Land vnto Wallingford and Winchester, soliciting his Complices for the aid of his sister the Emperesse.
A man who then liued, holds him, in this bold attempt with so small forces, no way inferior to Julius Caesar, whom Lincie reports to haue begun his ciuill war, and to haue set himselfe against the whole world, onlie with fise Cohorts of Soldiours.

(20) King Stephen as then lay in siege of Mar-tineburgh Castle, but hauing intelligence of this more dangerous an enemy, dilogged thence, and with all expedition made towards Arundell, whereto the Emperesse, waiting her Counsellor, was wonderfull perplexed, yet wanted not a womans wit to helpe
at need; in somuch that by the report of Gernesfor, left her dignity and right might any way be endamaged, shee took an oath, that none of those King's enemies by her aduise or consent had carried the land, but with condition to carry themselves orderly without impeachment of the honour and allegiance due to the King; by which policy (to geue it no worse name) shee laste-fied King Stephen (whom all do censure for too much credulity and facility towards his foes) that hee caused her to be commended honourably vnto Bristol, where she remained the space of two monethes, and then got thence vnto Wallingford.

(21) Earle Robert in the meane while disperised
the newes of the Emperesses approach, vnto whose aid
so many gathered, that the time Monke reporteth, no man was able to sit downe their multitudes in context of byshire, much lesse by way of Computation: then became (saith he) both labour and dolour, which brought the whole Realme to a most grievous distress, and in a maner to an utter raine: for those that favoured the King, what could former could be wrought or imagined, they did against them, that took part with the Emperesse;
and contrariwise, Earle Robert, whose power daily encreased, tormented with cruelties all those that stood for the King, and to augment a more mischiefe, the Flemings left their home Country, and came over by multitudes, like vnto a Company of hunger-starved Wolves, seeking to bring the Land felicity vnto nothing.

(22) Stephen, whose head was now full of troubles, delaid no time to forward his Fortunes, but straightwaies besieged Matilda and her brother in Wallingford Castle; notwithstanding, wearied with long labour and prosing lirie, hee caused a Tower of wood to be there erected, which he strongly fortified with me and munition, and then removed to the siege of Atalmebury. His brother also of Winchester, who out and pollicke Prelate indeede, bestrid all his willie wittes in Stephens behalfe; for insuaining certaine Noble-men to his Palace at Winchester, retained them prisoners, till hee had compelled them there, to resigne their Castles to the King. In the meane while Earle Robert subdued and spoiled Winchester: Ralph Parsell, in the Emperesses fauour, burned Nettingham;
and Ranulph Earle of Chester, joining in wittes with Robert (whose daughter hee married) shed his selfe

not unwilling to annoy King Stephen though he had received great honours at his hands. The Emperesse her selfe, the better to secure her owne person, and to give access unto her favourites,ooke into Lincolne, where the means to make her abode, storing the City with all provisions necessarie.

(21) King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was pollicke, made straight waies thitherward and begg'd the Cause with a braue siege, where hee had surpris'd his greatest Enemy, had thee not found mem'es thence to escape; so possessing himselfe of the City, settled it, & the whole Countrey in verie good quiet. Soone after whose departure, Ranulph Earle of Chesler, with his Countesse, and Brother, comming to Lincolne, to keepe their Christmas; the Citizens knowing the Kings jealousy, and desirous to carrie favour with him, sent secret intelligence, that if he would surprize both those Brethren, he had now the fittest advantage: where the King giving care, came thither with great expedition; and whiles they, thus circumvented, stood on their guard in the Castle, the Earle escaped forth, and went to craze aid of the Emperesse, for rescue of his wife and brother whom hee left beliedged. Earle Robert, hearing the newes, and glad of so faire an opportunity, joined with Ranulph, and they both gathered all their powers both of Welsh and English, for the reliefe of their friends in Lincolne: where, resolute first wading through the Kneer, (which parted them from the Kings Armie, and then deepe) upon Candlemas day and yeere of Christ Iesus one thousand one hundred forty one, they pitched their Tents, and in the Kings sight ordered their Battail: One Squadroner whereof, was lead by Earle Ranulph: the Dispersed were the Guards of another; in the third was Earle Robert himselfe; and the Welsh-men served for the Wing. Their troopes thus marshalled, Ranulph appointed in rich Armour, and full of braue resolution, spake thus to his followers, in the presence of Robert of Gloucester.

(24) "I yeld you unfained thanks, (Immeible Captaine, and you, our companions in Armes) which here so resolute witness your looves vnto mee, vpon my sole request, euen to the hazard of your owne liues. Sith then, I am the chiefe cause of this your perill, it will beside mee, that I my selfe be forsooke at the hazard, and give the first on-sette of battail against this faithlesse King; who made vs a shew of cruce, onely to take advantage for our ruines; and therefore both mine owne courage, and the Kings vnusd dealing, gine mee cause to hope, that I shall forthwith beake asunder the strength of his Armie, and make my way through their mass, by dint of this my sword. It shall be argument of your prowess, to follow me, leading you the way, and to imitate mee, giuing you example. My thoughts already tell mee, that euen now I am breaking through his Battles, trampling on the neckes of his Chieftaines, and piercing with this my sword the very sides of the King himselfe. His speech though short and headie, as more fitting a Souldier then an Orator, yet well suited with the time, and was seconded with great applause of the Souldiers: Whereupon Robert Earle of Gloucester, stept forth and said.

(25) "It is not against right, most Noble Earle, that the honor of this daies seruice, and first assault, should bee permitted vnto you, in regard of the greatest both of your descent, and your martiall achievement; but yet, if Defense bee stood on, I my selfe am both the sonne, and nephew, of a Mightie King; if Valour, here now are many of choic'd worth, of whom none lining can challenge precedence for prowess. But other reason ought now to sway. For sith the King, contrary to his Oath made to my Sister, impiously vsurp'd the Kingdome, he hath made a confusion of all things, both in casting the blood of many thousands to bee spilt, and in making many Owners (as himselfe was) of that which was not their owne, by depriving other of their rightfull inheritance: These therefore thus dishonored, ought of right (in assistance of helpe from their righteous Iudge and reuenger) giue first assault on their vnrighteous oppressor; and God who iustly iudgeth his people, will (doubtlesse) looke downe from his heavenly habitation, and will not leaue vs succourlesse, whiles in a iust cause, wee impugne a most vnusd Intruder. But one thing, (most resolute Captaines and Souldiers) I would haue you throughly to consider, that through these Fennes (which with so macha doe you have passed) there is no way fit for escape: here must wee either vnquill, or leaue our liues, for hope of flight is none at all, nor is there any other way, left vs now to goe, but by our swords into the Citie: and (if I please right) euen this, that wee haue no means to flee, will bee to vs the means (by diuine assistance) to get the Victorie; because they must needs trust to their Manhood, who see no hope to thrise by their Cowardize. Indeed, the Citizens of Lincolne keepe nigh to their houses, and in the brunt of the Battel, there will their minds bee, and thither will their heeles follow, whyles you victoriously shall keepe the field. And consider farther with mee, what kinde of Captaines they haue: First Alain Duke of Britaine, he comes armed, not against you, but God himselfe, a furious person, spotted with all filth of sinne, in malice vnmatchable, who thinks it his greatest dishonour, to see any man excell him in crueltie: with him cometh the treacherous Earle Robert Mollent, the very craftiest master of fraud, in whose heart dwells impiety, guile in his mouth, cowardize in his actions; guile of minde, vaine glorious in words, degenerate in performance; last in the fight, first in the flight. Next, comes Hugh Bigod, his name secretly sounding his perurie; who thought it not sufficient to beake his oath with the Emperesse, but that hee must bee once againe forsworn (as all the world doth know) that Henry at his death bequeathed the Crowne vnto Stephen, to the prejudice of his owne daughter; a man (in a word) who accounts Treachery a Peruise, and Peruise a courtly quality. Among these Gallants marcheth the Earle Albemarle, a man of a singular constancy in euill; very ready to attempt, & very loath to leaue any mischietous folly; wife, through irksomnes of his vnfortunate holty qualities, is gone from him; & the Earle that keeps her, bee cometh against vs too, a notorious adulterer, and the Non-parrell of impurity, a true Souldier of Batshus, a stranger to Mari to whom the sight of all blood, except of the Grape, is verie facefull. Then stretch forth Simas Earle of Hampton, whose deeds consist altogether in words, and whose liberality onely in promises, for when he hath said, he hath done, and yet get no more. Lastly, you see here gathered a knot of Perres, all like to their Prince, accustomed to robberies, enriched with rapines; fained with man-slaughters, and all tainted with perurie. You therefore (Noble spirits) whom great Henry aduanced, and this Stephen hath cast downe, whom Henry made wealthy, and Stephen hath empow'ered, be now courageous, and vpon assured confidence of your great valours, yes, of Gods iustice, seek both your iust Engle, which God euen puts into your hands, on these vngodly wretches; and immortal Glorie, which shall hence-forward attend both your selues, and your posterity for euer. If you are all of this mind, for executing this Iudgement of God now vpon them, then vow your selues vnto God, and thus his seruice; and forbear, nay rather forswear, to shew your backs to your foes.

At which words, all iointly lifting vp their hands, and acclamations vnto heauen, with a terrible shout abjured all thought of flight, and quickning vp their braue spirits, aduanced gallantly towards the enemy.

(26) King Stephen, the meane while, was farre from being idle, who also ordered his Arme into three seuerall Battalions: the greater part and best furnished, whose horses he had sent away (perhaps also to deprive his men of all hope of flight) he appointed to remaine on foot with himself, and creaw of his Nobles, all vnder one Banner. The horsemen hee disposed into two seuerall wings, the one commanded by Alane Duke of Britaine, Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolk, Simon Earle of Hampton, with the two Earles of Meles and Warren; and the other Wing was governed by William de Tress the Fleming. Then the King, because his voice was not very pleasing or audible, commanded Raldwine Fitz-Gilbert, a man of great honour and prowesse, to utter his mind vnto the Army, who standing conveniently to be heard, spake vnto them as followeth.

"(27) All such as address themselves, and expose their liues, to the hazard of battaile, haue three things aduicely to be thought on: The equall of their cause; the Number of the Forces; the sufficiency of their men. The first, lest they endanger the state of their Soules; the next, lest they be overleaid with multitude of their enemies; and the last, lest while they presume vpon numbers, they find them but faint-hearted, to their vtter ruine. But in all these, wee know ourselues to be sufficiently furnished. The Iustice of our cause is, for obliuious the vow made before God vnto our King, to withstand them that haue falsified their faith, euen to the hazard of our liues. For our Number, in Horsemen, is not inferior to theirs, in Footmen we farre exceede them: and for sufficiency, what words can equall the noble valour of so many Earles, Lords, Capaines and Followers, trained vp euer in the warres! But above all, the incomparable prowesse and presence of our King, will be in head of thousands to vs. Such then this our Lord, and the Lords Anointed (to whom you vowed your faith) is in field here amongst you; now performe this your vow vnto God; assured, that the more constant you proue in this your Princes service, and faithful against those faithles periured persons, the more shall your reward bee at the hands of God, and of him. Therefore be both courageous, and confident; che rather, considering against whom you fight: euen against Robert the Base-born General, whose vile mouth worth is well knowne; for he can threaten much, and performe as little: a Lions tongue, and a Hares heart: his faire speech is his credit, his foule actions are his shame. Cheffers Earle what is hee? a man audacious, but without all iudgement; ready to plot a treason, but still waunting in the pursuit of it: ready to runne into battaile, but vtterly insensible in any danger: aiming beyond his reach, and conceiting things merely impossible; and therefore hath he few with him that know him, but leads onely a rout of vagrant rascals: so there is nothing in him to be feared; for whatsoever he begins like a Man, he ends it like a Woman; fortunate in all his vndertakings, in his encounters still either vanquished, or if he chance (rarely God woe) on a victorie, it is with farre greater losses then the conqueror. The Welshmen he brings with him, are fitter for our contempt then feare: their rashness you may easily see, for it is naked and vnarmed, who wanting both military Art and Prudence, runne headlong like brutes vpon the Hunters lauels. The rest aswell Nobles (if such they may be termed) as common Souldiers, are but stragglers and runnagates: of whom I would wish their number greater; for the more they be, the more successefull will bee their service. You therefore (great Peeres and Worthies) it now behooueth (and indeed it much becometh you) to bee very mindfull, both of your Valours, and Noblesse: this day a duncie your Prowes to the height,

"and following the footsteps of your famous Ancestors, leaue to your posterities both a noble pattern, and an euerslasting renouew. Your dayly successe of victories, should quicken your hearts this day to achieve brauely, and the continuall miscarrying of our enemies, will quicken their heeles to flie as speedily; and (I dare say) they already repent of their coming hither, and are by this time casting how to begone, if the nature of the place would giue them leaue. Then sith it is vnpossible for them either to fight, or flie; why come they hither, but euen by Gods own appointment, to offer the milke, and all their provisions into your hands? and here you see their horses, their Armour, yea and their bodies, to rest at your pleasure: reach forth therefore your warlike hands to seize on that ioyfully, which God hath freely brought you.

Which exhortation hee had scarcely closed, when the noise of Trumpets, and shout of the enemies coming on, was rhetoricke enough to incite them to their task.

(28) A fore battaile was fought, and with equall successe a long time maintained: for the band of the disherited, whose particular wrongs whetted their courage, (and were therefore politickly placed in the front) beate terribly into the Kings Vanguard; and contrariwise William de Tress into the Welsh, vntill the Foreward of the Kings horsemen beganne to shrinke backe, and (vnto without suspicion of treason) galloped away; when presently the Earle of Chester encountered the Kings battaile of foote, in whose strength he reposed most trust, but it being overlaid with Affaires, beganne also to faint and to flie, leaving the King enraged, but with his friends faint heartedness, and with his foes successe. A very strange fight it was (saith Paris) *there to behold King Stephen, left almost alone in the field, yet no man daring to approach him, whiles grinding his teeth, and foaming like a furious wild Beare, he drave backe with his battle-axe whole troupes of afoiling him, compassing the chiefest of them to the eternal renouew of his courage: if but a hundred such had there bene with him, a whole Army had neuer beene able to surprize his person: yet as hee was single, hee held out, till first his Battle-axe brake, and after that, his sword also, with the force of his vnresistible strokes, flew in peeces; and hee now weaponlesse, and (by an vnknowne doubtlesse, an vn-noble hand) stricken down with a great stone thrown at him, was seized on by William de Robesme a most stout Knight, and by Earle Robert commaund, preiured from any violence to his person, was carried prisoner vnto M and the Emperesse at Gloucester, & thence was feat bound vnto Windsor, where in the Castle he remained in safe custody.*

(29) The Emperesse having thus got the Lion in her hold, triumphed not a little in her own fortune, & now as sole Soueraign of Englands Monarchie, commanded all his nobles, elected her Counsellors, and bestowed many dignities where three most favoured. Notwithstanding, that these altered not her stile of Emperesse, or Queene of Romanes, may appeare by this her Bread-Scale ensuing; vnder which shee granted the custody of the Tower of London vnto Goffrey de Manduliv, and his Heires, covenanthing with him therein, that he would not make peace with the Citizens of London, without the said Coffreys consent because they were his mortal enemies; but this Earle heing afterwards vnawares apprehended in the Kings Court at Salisbury, could not bee released, till hee had surrendered both the Tower of London, and other his Castles to the King.

Vpon these happy successes of the Emperesse the States-men stood not any longer for King Stephen, but their Father turning with his Fortunes, all of them surrendered their allegiance vnto her; the Kentish onely excepted, where Stephen Queens, and William de Tress, maintained his quarrell to the vttermost of their powers.

(10) But the Empresse conducted in State to Winchester, had the Regall Crowne of the Kingdome there deliuered her; no man more forward then Henry the Bishop, and Brother of Stephen, who vpon the vowing to bee ruled by his advise in affairs of State, being then the Pope's Legate, solemnly in a Synode of the Clergie, accursed all such as withstood the Empresse, and blessed all them that assisted her interest: but both hee, and his friends forgot not to adde that wondrous trayterous estate of their oath, so long to keepe faith to her as shee kept her Countess with them: and so with applause of the people, she came to London, and after much perorisation and mediation (for that the Citizens were very stiff against her) was received into the City with a roiall Procession.

(11) Neither was King Stephen thus defeated of England onely, but Normandy also cast off the yoke of subiection: for Geoffrey of Anjou, husband of the Empresse, having some intelligence of this achieved victorie, indued the Normans to incline vnto him, by publishing the captiuation of Stephen, vnable now to relieve them, or himselfe; and David King of Scotland for his part was not behind to set forward the claime of Lady Matilda, assuming in her behalfe the County of Northumberland.

(12) Matilda thus established, all now esteemed her as Fortune deare darling, and beheld her as their onely rising sonne; the Prison walls overshadowing the Presence, feature, and fauours of the now dejected vnfortunate Stephen, whose sorrowfull wife Queen Matilda incessantly solicited the Empresse in her husbands behalfe, desiring his liberty, but not his Crowne, which hee was now contented to lether enioy; and therunto offered for pledges many great persons, who protested for him to the Empresse, that hee therewith would devote himselfe vnto God, & either become a Monke or a Pilgrime: Henry of Winchester also became a suiter vnto her in the behalfe of his Nephew Emflace, King Stephen's sonne, that the Counties belonging before to the Father, might bee conferred vpon the sonne.

(13) The Londoners likewise hauing received her into the City as their Lady, thought now (as most doe with new Princesses) they might haue what they would aske, and became her importunate Suppliants, that the ouer hard lawes imposed by her Father, might now be remitted, and those of King Edward might wholly bee in force. But shee reiected all these Petitioners, out of pride, by some; but it may seeme rather of policy, holding it safest, to passe matters of importance, not vpon intreaty, but by deaduice, and to gouerne the subiect with a Queere auerternesse, rather then an indulgent lenitie. But this too regular strictness, which might haue done well in aisted gouernment, in this her yet greene, and vnaccured estate, proued not so be-houefull. For first, Queene Matilda sent to her sonne Emflace, that their suites must bee obtained onely by warres willing him to make strong his party by the assistance of the Kentish: the Nobles likewise, Stephens vnder-takers, repined, that they were so lightly regarded, or rather reiect-ed: and the Londoners also storming at the repulse of their desires, desired how they might take the Empresse their Prisoner, and so redeem King Stephen, to whom their affections were ever firm: but the hearing of their conspiracie, fled secretly in the night, and tooke in to Oxford, which in all her difficulties shee euer found true vnto her, out of their lone, both to her cause, and to her Father; & threatening due reuenge for her late wrongs, wrought it vpon the Nobles in prison, and (more then was due or decent) vpon Stephen himself, whom hee commanded to be laden with Irons, and to bee abridged of all princely ser- uices.

(14) Winchester's high mind not brooking the Em- presses deniall of his suite, in behalfe of his Nephew Emflace, vpon secret conferences with Queen Matilda, by her lamentable entreaties, began to melt in his affection towards the distressed King his brother; & in fine, resolving to trie the vttermost for him, absouled all those whom before hee had excommuni- cated; pretending, that the Barons had all kept faith with her, but shee had not kept faith with them, and think- ing this a liue time to worke for his brother, solicited the discontented Londoners in his behalfe, and stored the Castles of Waltham, Farnham, and Winchester with Munition and men; meane while the Empresse came speedily to Gloucester, to conferre with Matilda her chiefe friend, and secretly againe returning to Oxford, (which shee chose for her Court and chiefe place of abode) was there maintained on- ly at his charge, not hauing one dayes diet, or pro- vision of her owne; to requite which fidelity, and other noble seruices, shee there created him Earle of Hereford.

(15) Her forces recollected, & thither assembled, she went forthwith to the City of Winchester, accom- panied with David King of Scotland her vnkle, Earle Robert her brother, and many other Nobles; where sending for the Bishop being then in the City (whose aid shee could hardly spare, and therefore was desir- ous of his reconciliation) though hee mistrusted some perill, yet not daring to send a deniall, returned the Messenger with this equiuocall answer, that hee would with all speed address himselfe, as if hee had meant to follow them: so forthwith issuing secretly out of the City, did indeed address himselfe to worke her ruine: for, sending for Queene Matilda her sonne Emflace, the Londoners, and William Tytes, (afterwards created Earle of Kent) made strong his part, himselfe and friends abiding in the City, whiles

the Empresse and her Nobles defended themselves in the Caille, notwithstanding to goe forth amongst so many their mortall enemies: and soone after, to worke his wrathfull will, knowing the Citizens to bee more affected to the Empresse then to him, commanded the said Cille to bee set on fire, where in, the Manastrey of Nunnys, above twentie Churches, the Count of S. Groumold, and the better part of the Cille, were consumed to ashes.

(16) Seven weekes thus spent, in this counter-siege of the Cille and Caille, the Bishoppe, to decieve the Empresse, commanded peace to bee proclaimed, and the Gates to bee let open towards evening. The Empresse then, who had endured such troubles and so long a restraint, gratefully desired to change her lodging, and to recreate her perplexed spirits in some other place; so taking horse, accompanied with her brother, Edmond Earle of Cornwalsh, her servants, and many others her friends, besides Earle Robert, who followed behind with a troupe of Nobles and Knights; presencie at the Bishoppes commandment, there was pursued by his Souldiers, and many of her traine wounded and taken prisoners; the Empresse by good providence escaped into the Caille of Lategardshull, and thence to the Caille Dinnes: where understanding that there was still in hazard to bee surprized, there was contented, (as what will not necessity endure, & a womans wit devise?) to bee laide in a cofine bound fast with cords; and so, as it had bene her Corse, carried in a hoefeliter to the Cille of Glocester: in which bonds of her owne distresse, there had good occasion to remember the chaines of King Stephens captivitee. To such extremities were these two Princes at the selfe same time subiect, that whiles they tormented for spacious Kingdomes, brought themselves to the very extrem wanes, of aire, and of elbow-roume; but with such dalliance doth Fortune (wee see) oftentimes follow her game, that these two King Monarchs the Ball of her play, and toldeth them lastly into the Harard, whence hardly they escape with safetie of life. Yet this was not the worst; for Earle Robert her brother, whilst hee was busy in providing for her safetie, then for his owne, was taken by his putiours at Stratburg with others; brought backe to Winchester, and there presented by the Bishop unto Queene Maud, King Stephens wife, who committed him to the custodie of William Tytes, and he for more safety to Glocester; but others taking advantage in the Nant Monastery of Warred were burned together with the Earle: Thus then the King on the one side, and the Earle on the other, were kept in safe custodie; but the Queene labouring for the Kings release, and the Countesse for the Earles, many Articles were propounded, and many messengers imploied: at length, this was thought best, that Stephen should bee restored to his kingdom, and Robert under him to have the whole government of the Land; so that both of them should now jointly uphold that, which they (the two King-leaders) by opposition had cast downe. But Earle Robert as he was no whit dejected in mind, with any frowne of Fortune whatsoever, so refused hee his fidelity to the Empresse vntained, and unmoved either with feare or faire inticements, still refusing to capitulate for his freedome, but to his Sisters liking who likewise bare so brave a minde, that were her state never so weak, shee would not consent nor care the least care to any composition for the Crowne.

(17) Then was civillie increased, the Kingdom divided, and the peoples hatred kindled in maintaining the factions, all fore-running the ruine of the Land: For these two Chieftaines wearied with infomies of irons, and hard imprisonment, made exchange the one for the other, without any farther mention of peace, and so studied not onely to renew their former designs, but to enervate the lands miserie by more eager warres. Stephen in England wrought the people for him, & Robert taking pledees of the Nobles to attend and guard the Empresse at Oxford till his returne, went into Normandie to sollicite Geffrey her husband for her defence. But the Earle having troubles with his owne Nobilitie, and the Normans hardly brought to any subjection, thought it not convenient by his owne absence for a state in hope, to hazard that in hand; and therefore sent with Robert some strength of Armes, and with them his young sonne Prince Henrie into England.

(18) The Empresse in his absence had well fortified herselfe in Oxford, whom Stephen (vying the benefit of Roberts absence) followed with an eager persuit, and wanne the Suburbs even vnto the Cille gates; then girt hee the Empresse with so strait a siege, (meaning never to give over, till hee had now made her sure in his possession) that for two monethes whatsoever Strength or Stratagem could performe in assault or defense, was there put in practise, till at length great penurie enforced to thinke of a surrender: but shee, a woman (whose sexe hath often deceived wise men) resolved once againe to over-reach her foe by wit, whom shee could not by force: whereto the time did fit her wises, for being a winter, sharpe about measure, the River Themsis that runnes by the Cille walls, was then congealed with a strong, cruised Ice, and besides a great snow did then continue, and had covered the ground. And vpon these advantages, put in practise a most dangerous attempt: for cloathing herselfe, and some choice of her company, in white linnen garments, to decieve the eyes of the Senninels, issued secretly by night out of a postern-gate, and passing the frozen River, ranne on foote, through ice, and snow, ditches, and vallies, for five miles, even to Abingdon, the falling snow still beating in their faces; and there taking horse, the same night got to the Caille of Wallingford, to the great joy, and also admiration, of all that were therein.

(19) In the meane while, Earle Robert, with Prince Henrie, were arrived in England at Warrham haven, and presencie besieged the Caille there, (so to withdraw the King from siege of his sister;) but hearing of the happy escape of the Empresse, came with young Henrie vnto his mocher, whose fight made her forget the grile and sorowes that shee had long endured. Then was Oxford vpon conditions yielded to the King; and Stratburg fired by the ballard Earle Robert: The Towre of London, with the Castles of Walden, Plisley, and Lincolne, yielded to Stephen; the Castles of Warham, and Portland, yielded to Robert: The Earles of Chester, and Essex, surprized by the King; William Martell the great favourite, taken and imprisoned by the Earle. Thus fundrie yeeres passing with variable successes and frowne, and every yeere heaping on each side, fresh calamities, to the great ruine of the whole land; the Empresse, even wearied with those warres and vacerantancies of successe, went into Normandie, chusing rather to be vnder the protection of her husband in peace, then to raigue in England perplexed with troubles: and to the same end shee had not long before, sent her young sonne Henrie to his father, who desired to hate him rather heire of a Dukedome with safetie, then of a Crowne with daylie hazard.

(20) Stephen, that by a fresh surprizall of Edmond Earle of Chester had got Lincolne, and entring thence into (which no King before him durst doe, for that certaine wizards had prophesied euill luck vnto such) at christmas did there wear the Regall Crowne on his head, and after the Empresses departure, caused the Barons of England, to sweare allegiance vnto Prince Eustace his sonne; by which two complements, hee supposed all had bene sure on his side; and the rather, for that the most faithfull, puissant, and ever-renowned Earles, Robert of Glocester, and Miles of Hereford the two great and glorious pillars, which had by many Conquests supported their Ancestors cause, were now conquered by death; and the rest of the Nobles, applying themselves to the Times, kept themselves quiet in the absence of these Competitors; all which gave no little assurance vnto Stephen's estate.

(41) But Henry Fitz-Empress, grown now from a Child, thought it best a while to leave Mercury, (for it is said he was Berkely) and to follow Mars; so knowing his presence would preferre much his purposes (for men would be loth to hazard all for one, who himselfe would neglect all) haisted againe into England, with an Armie of valiant and choice Souldiers; to whom joined the discontented Earle of Chesler, Roger the sonne of Miles deceased, with many more Knights and Gallants of the English: hee therefore tooke into the North, and met with David his cozen, King of Scotland, of whom hee was most honourably receiued, and solemnely sacred with the Military honour of Knighthood: and thence forward sought all occasions to prouoke both King Stephen, and his sonne Eustace against him: and hauing setled some courtes with certain Peeres for the pursuit of his desires in England, hee returned into Normandy to compose & set forward some other busineses, which might be auailable for these ends.

(42) Where long he staid not, but that Gyffrey his Father departed this life, and left him his Heire both of Anjou and Normandy; and the yeere following, he matched in marriage with Eleanor Dutchesse of Guien and Aquitaine, lately divorced from Lodowick King of France for consanguinity, and adultery (as Paris) after hee had borne him two daughters; Lodowick fearing issue-male by this marriage to the disheriting of his said daughters, greatly impugned Duke Henry, and Stephen suspecting his greatness, now being Duke of Normandy, Anjou, Aquitaine, and Guien, both of them sought each way to impeach his peace: Lodowick, with Prince Eustace, in the parts beyond seas, and Stephen in England, to make sure his succession, sought to inuelt the said Prince Eustace with the English Diademe, both to preuent, and vtterly deprive Henry Fitz-Empress for euer: for calling a Councell at London, King Stephen commanded Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury to consecrate Prince Eustace for their King; which hee refused to doe, and that by commandement from the Pope (whose holy See can deale on both sides, as makes most for their advantage) alleged now, that his Father was an usurper, and perjured Inuader: whereupon the honest Archbishop fled into Normandy, and the King seized vpon all his possessions. It may seeme, that one cause of the Popes inclining to young Henries title, was to strengthen him against his enemy King Lewis of France, who had highly offended his Holines, for casting the Pope's Buller (whereby hee receiued the fruits of Vacancies of all Cathedrall Churches in France) into the fire, saying, hee had rather the Pope's Buller should rest in the fire, then his owne soule should fricke in hell.

(43) King Stephen thus defeated of his purpose, and seeing his Title questioned by the Church, who had before approued it, resolved to make it good by the sword: for winning the Castle of Maly, fortified Malmesbury, and laid a strait siege vnto Wallingford, against which, hee erected the Castle Cranmerke, to stoppe the passages of their reliefe, or continuing forth. But Henry after hee had calmed the boisterous Rormes of warre, in the parts beyond the seas, came ouer into England well appointed, vnto whom all resorted many of the Nobility, who yielded vp themselves, and about thirty strong Castles to the young Duke; now well furnished, haisted to raise the siege of Wallingford, and there undertooke a great enterprise; for hee iocinded the Refusers with a great and deepe Trench, whereby hee kept them from reliefe, as they did keepe the Refused.

(44) Stephen following hastily to succour his men, (though with the lesse edge, for that hee neuer fled well in any assault of that Castle) pitched downe his

Tents, even nere his enemy; and, ready on both sides to giue battaile: the Winter stormes were suddenly so troublesome, that nothing could be done; but thole somewhat ouerblowne, and the Armies feare three furions asunder; as King Stephen was busied in disposing of his healt, and giuing direction for order of the battaile, his horse vnder him tiling with his fore-feet, fell flat vpon the earth, not without danger to his Rider; and thus did hee thricere he left, which thing his Nobles secretly muttering, interpreted for an vnlyck presage: when William Earle of Arundell, a bold and eloquent man, went to him and aduised him to a peace, affirming the title of Duke Henry to be iust; that the Nobility on both parts present, were necerly linked in Alliances & Blood, and how these stood affected, was very doubtfull; yea, that Brethren were there assembled, the one against the other, whereof much needs follow an vnnaturall warre betwixt them, & of dangerous consequence, euen to him that conquested. With these and the like allegations at last Stephen beganne to bend, and a parley for peace was signified vnto the Duke. Henry already warme for the battaile, and his thoughts fixed on nothing lesse then peace, could hardly moderate his youthfull affections; yet at his friends importunity, hee yielded to confurre with King Stephen.

(45) The place for conference was so appointed; that the river Thames parted the presence of these two Princes; so that from either bankes they saluted each others, and after a long conference, agreeing on a truce, and vpon faire tearmes of amity departed, commanding all weapons and attempts of warre to be laid aside.

(46) But Eustace, who hitherto had attended Fortune for the Crowne, and now hopelesse to haue as his Fathers Successor, was greatly displeased with this new moulded friendship, and in a fury departed the field, purposing to raise himselfe by his owne merites; and coming to Bury, vrged the Monks of Saint Edmunds for money, to let forward his heady desires: But the wiser amongst them unwilling to be wagers of new warres (which though all for all fores, yet promised euer work to the Clergie mens possessions) denied his request; wherewith enraged, hee commanded his men to curry their corne and other prouision into his owne Castle, situated hard by. But being (at dinner, wee reade of him (saith mine Author) that once the worse first hit that hee put in his month, drave him into a frensie, whereof shortly after hee died) in his fury hee interred at Wenlock in Kent.

(47) The death of Prince Eustace so much aduantaged Duke Henry, that thereupon (the truce in likelihood expiring) many fell off vnto him, and many Castles were deliuered, as Bernewell, Reading, Warwicke, Stamford, and others; whereat Stephen was not a little displeased, and thinking to entrappe the young venturous Duke, with a strong Army followed him vnto Wallingford: But God himselfe looking downe from heauen (saith Mathew of S. Albans) made there an end of those long calamities, by stirring the minds of these men in the land, to labour for peace: such was Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, and Herrie Bishop of Winchester, who hauing troubled the realm with fire and sword, moved now to repentance, wrought so effectually with his brother, that hee enclined vnto a wished peace, contented to adopt the Duke for his Son and Successor; and so coming both together to Oxford, a blessed light to so distressed and distracted a Kingdome; there did all the Nobles do fealty to him, as to the vndoubted Heire of the land; and the Duke to acknowledge this as a fauour, yielded him the honour of a Father, and the roialtie of all Kingly power during his life.

(48) Notwithstanding, the cleere Sunne of line of these faire daies, was somewhat darkened with a cloud of treacherie, and lewd attempts of the Flamings; who enuying Englands peace, vpon Bartholomew

King Stephen and Henry Fitz-Empress

Deuere, intended to surpriſe Prince Henry in his returne from Deuere, and preſence of King Stephen. In this conſpiracie was William the Kings ſon, though but young, who himſelfe meaning to haue one caſt at the Crowne, inſtantly before it ſhould haue beene effeited, was through the wantonnes of his horſe caſt to the ground, and with the fall brake his legges; to wholoſe aliance, whiles euery one gathered and lamented, Henry vpon ſecret notice of the treaſon haſted vnto Canterbury, and thence to London, and ſoone after overthrew him into Normandy.

(49) And Stephen now after he had reigned eightene yeeres, ten months, and odder daies, departed this life at Deuere, in the Monaſtery of the Monke, of an Itacke paſſion, mixed with his olde diſeaſe the Emure, the twenty five of October, and yeere of Chriſts Nauiety, 1154. A moſt worthy Souldier, faith Paru and (in word) one who wanted nothing but a iuſt rite to haue made him an excellent King; in his ordinary deportment very deuout; the fruites wherof were ſhewed in erecting with ſufficient endowments, the Abbeyes of Coſſball in Eſſex, of Furneſſe in Lancſhire, the bouſe of Nunnes at Carrew, and Higham, an Hoſpitall at Furke, and the Monaſtery of Fenburgh in Kent, where his Queene, his ſonne, and laſtly, himſelfe were enterr'd: but ſince, his body for the gaine of the lead, wherein it was confined, was caſt into the riuer. So vncertaine is man (yea greateſt Princes) of any reſt in this world, even after buriall; and reſtleſſe may their bodies be alſo (who for filthy lucre) thus caſt to the dead, the quiet of their graues.

His wife.

(50) Maud, the Wife of King Stephen, was the daughter of Eugene Earle of Bolgaigne, the brother of Godfrey, and Baldwin Kings of Ieruſalem: her Mother was Mary, ſiſter to Maud Queene of England, wife of King Henry, her husbands Predeceſſor. Shee was crowned at Weſtminſter vpon Sunday, being Eaſter-day, and the two and twenty of March, in the firſt yeere of her husbands raigne, and of Grace, 1136. and being Queene ſixtene yeeres, ſhe died at Hemſingham Caſtle in Eſſex, the third of May, and yeere of Chriſt, 1151. and was buried in his Monaſtery at Fenburgh in Kent.

His iſſue.

(51) Baldwin, the eldeſt ſonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud (bearing the name of King Baldwin his vncle) was born in the time of the raigne of K. Henry his fathers vncle; and died in his infancy, during the raigne of the ſame King. He was buried at London in the Church of the Priore of the Trinity within Algate, which was a houſe of blacke & Canons of the Auguſtine order, founded by Q. Maud, the firſt wife of the foreſaid King Henry the firſt.

(52) Eugene the ſecond ſonne of King Stephen, & of Queene Maud his wife, being the here apparent to them both; when his Father was King, was created Earle of Bolgaigne, which dignity was the inheritance of his mother. Hee married Conſtance ſiſter of Lewis the ſeuenth King of France, daughter of King Lewis the Grande: who afterward was remarried to Raimond the third Earle of Tholouſe: for Eugene died before her without iſſue by her, the tenth day of Auguſt, in the eighteenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of Grace, 1151. Hee was buried by his mother in his Fathers Monaſtery at Fenburgh in Kent.

(53) William, the third and yongelt ſonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud, marked 1366. daughter and heire of William Warren, the third Earle of Surrey, with whom hee had that Earldome; hee was in his Fathers life time Earle of Surrey, Lord of Normich and Penſenſy in England, Earle of Mortayne, and Lord Eagle of Normandy. After his fathers death, King Henry the ſecond made him Knight, reſumed thoſe things that hee held of the Crowne, reſtored him to all that his Father held before hee was King. And ſo he was Earle of Bolgaigne, Surrey, and Mortayne, and being with him in his journey to Tholouſe, died without iſſue, in his returne homeward, in the Month of October, the ſeuenth of King Henrys raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 1160.

(54) Maud, the eldeſt daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was borne before her father was King, in the raigne of King Henrie the firſt, her vncle; in whole time alſo ſhe deſcended, being but yongue, (though ſome report there was wife to the Earle of Millen) and was enterr'd at London, with her brother Baldwin, in the Priore of the Trinity aforeſaid, then commonly called Chriſts-Church, and now lately named the Dukes Place within Algate.

(55) Maria, the yonger daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was a Nun, and Abbeſſe of the Nunnerie at Rumſey in Hampſhire; notwithstanding, when her brother William, Earle of Bolgaigne, was deſcended without iſſue, ſhe was ſecretly taken from thence, and married to Matthew the yonger, ſonne of Terry of Alſace, and brother of Philip Earle of Hlanders, who in her right was Earle of Bolgaigne. Shee was his wife ten yeeres, and was then diſeſed from him, by the ſentence of the Pope, and enforced to returne to her Monaſtery, having had iſſue by him two daughters, which were Ide and Maud, allowed by the cenſure of the Church to be legitimate. Lady Ide, the elder, was married to Raymond of Damp-Martine, in her right Earle of Bolgaigne; and Maud, the yonger, to Henrie Duke of Lorraine.

His Naturall Iſſue.

(56) William, the Naturall ſonne of King Stephen, is miſtaken of ſome to bee the ſame William, that was Earle of Bolgaigne. Others, who know that William Earle of Bolgaigne was lawfully borne, do thinke that his father had no other ſon named William but him; wherein let William Earle of Bolgaigne, the lawfull ſon of King Stephen, be himſelfe a lawfull witneſſe of the truth, who having beſt cauſe to know it, doth beſt prooue it; and in an ancient Charter of his, being written in thoſe daies, and extant in theſe, doth name him for a witneſſe, and calleth him his Brother.

(57) Gernie, another Naturall ſonne of King Stephen, begotten on a gentle-woman named Dameſa, and borne in Normandy, was brought into England by his father, the fifth yeere of his Raigne, Anno Dom. 1140. Hee was the ſame yeere, by his fathers meanes, made Abbat of Weſtminſter, and ſo continued for the ſpace of twenty yeeres. Hee deſcended there the twentieth fixt of Auguſt, in the fixt yeere of the raigne of King Henrie the ſecond, the yeere of Grace 1160. and lieth buried in the South part of the cloiſter, within the ſaid Monaſtery, vnder a flat ſtone of blacke marble, which is remaining there vntill this day.

CHAPTER VI.

Every of that name the second, by the double interest of descent and adoption (as you have heard) succeeded in the Kingdome of England, whose Pedegree, (which Matthew Paris extendeth by the mothers side, in a right line vnto Noah) and former fortunes, having already been touched; his counsels, acts, and other affaires of great importance, after the death of King Stephen come now to be handled.

(2) Hee came not to the Crowne vnexpected, nor vndesired; for the opinion of the man, and hope conceiv'd of his future government, had the force to hold England in good obedience without the presence of a King, about sixe weekes, whose entrance like that of the Soole into the Body, did quicken, and enliven the Realme, as then (in the perieod

England) this closing verse, or Epiphonemae spake:

*Spiritus es, caro sum: te nunc intrante revivis.
Thou, Soules Body am: by thee to life I come.*

Neither did his presence diminish the expectations raised, but was saluted King with generall acclamations, and with no lesse joy at Westminster by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, annointed and crowned: the summe of whose first courses for setting his State was this.

(3) Sundry Castles (vests of Rebels) hee flatteth to the earth, some others hee fortifies or resumes at his pleasure; chiefly, such estates, as had beene alienated from the Crowne, as the hire and vniust reward of those who withstood his claime. Others write, that hee promiscuously tooke all such lands into his owne possession, as were by Iurors found vpon oath to haue belonged at any time vnto the Crowne. Some Earles vniustly created, hee reduceth to private condition, and purgeth the Realme from fortune Souldiers; chiefly from the Flemings, whose mercenary warres most polluted the same, and had most infected him. And because Government is the Soule of State, and Wisdome the Soule of Government, he chooseth to himselfe a Body of Counsell out of the most eminent persons of both sorts: such was Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury and for that selfe consideration, he laid the Chancellorship of England vpon Thomas Becket, and held in speciall fauour Iohn of Oxford, with sundry other Prelates of chiefest note: of the Laity, he had Robert Earle of Leicester, chiefe Iusticiar of England, Richard de Luci, Isabel de Bainsill, Alan de Neuille and others: but for a Cabanes-Counsellour at all times, he had his owne mother, Matilda the Emperesse, one of the most sage and experienced Ladies of the World. Thus then furnished, and assembling a Council at Wallingford, hee selfe for his owne securing, as for the assurance of his Children, swears the Realme to the succession of his sonnes William and Henry, the one being in remainder to the other.

(4) But quiet consultation did not take vp the most of his time, euen in the daies of these Sun-shining beginnings: for the reign of Stephen, a most gentle Prince (who thought, out of the necessity of his owne estate, that it was not safe for him to be secure) hauing giuen way for many of the mighty, to maintaine giurie inuolenies; these now feeling a restraint, beganne not a little to repine: but Nobles de Mortimer, wanting with greater, and the most arrogant man a liue, thrust his Castles of Gloucester, Wigmore, and Bridgeforth with rebellious Garrisons, which Henry notwithstanding reduced to subjection, though in the siege of the last named, not without imminent perill of his person, had not Robert de S. Clare, call himselfe betweene death and the King, taking the arrow into his owne bosome to preterre his Souerainnes life. It bound Thibaut to Seismur most of all, when a part of the banqueting Cause in which they were, suddenly failing, Seismur was found to haue borne the ruine from the Emperour, with the perill of his life: but Seismur fastened that aduantage, which one Senclere did not, saue onely in the better renowne thereof, which deserves to be immortal, being an Act of piety, worthy of a Statue, with Coatrus, Curius, Antimus, or whosoever else haue willingly sacrificed themselves for their Country, or for the Father of their Country, the King.

(5) Henric thus hauing in some sort settled England, halseth into France to King Lewis in the first yeere of his raigne, and there did homage vnto him for Normandy, Aquitaine, Angion, Main and Tourain, which partly were his patrimony, and partly the inheritance of Eliane his wife.

(6) His domesticke enemies being subdued or appeased, hee put his brother Geoffrey by force to a pension, the summe whereof (if it be any thing to the purpose to know) was 1000. l. English, and 2000. l. Antius by yeere, wringing out of his possession all such territories, as by their Fathers last Will and Testament, were bequeathed to him in France. But Geoffrey did not long enioy the said annuity, or his brothers friendship: for in the third yeare, death thought a discharge, and Henry was discharged of those payments. For his violence in taking away those lands King Henry might alledge he was eldest brother, but that allegation might be anioied with his owne consent, which once hee gave: but the great Eliane, called Reason of State, (though falsely so called, vntill it be seasoned with Iustice, and Religion) hath so transmutatua a faculty, as to make Copper seeme Gold, right wrong, and wrong right; yea, when all Pleas faile, it will stand for good, while there are forces to support it.

(7) This accord between the two brethren, being thus (howsoever) established, the King repaires into

England, and Chesler enters amity with Malcalme King of Scots, on such termes, as his Grandfather had done, yet Salais amicus dignitatis fuit, saying to himselfe all his dignities: and the said Malcalme restored to Henry the City of Karles, seu castle vpon Tyne, &c. and Henry restored to him the Earldome of Huntington in England. And, so iustly dreadfull did the growing puissance of this young Monarch appeare to his greater enemies, that Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke, who had poore means to doe muchiefe, rendered his Caltie to bee his at disposall.

(8) The Welsh notwithstanding forsooke not themselves, but did some memorable matters vnder conduct of the valiant Prince Owen against the English, in defence of North-Wales, and their Connates liberty, to the losse of the English, and extreme danger of the Kings owne person, whose Standard reitold was cowardly abandoned, and the King reported to be slaine: for which Henric de Eflex, the Kings Standard-Bearer at that conflict, was afterward accused by Robert de Montford his neere Kinsman, and in single battaile within lists was vanquished at Reading, where the said Henry de Eflex was thorne a Monk, and died. Matthew Paris relates the whole voiage of King Henry summarily thus: That Henry prepared a very great Army against the Welsh, with full purpose to ouercome them both by land and sea; that hee cut vp the woods and forrests, and laid open a way; that hee recovered the Caltie of Richlan and other fortresses taken from his Ancestors; that hee repaired the Caltie of St. asgwerke, and that hauing brought the Welsh to his will, hee returned with triumph into England.

(9) After this, himselfe and his wife Queene Eliane being openly crowned vpon Christmas day, (some say Easter day) at the Cite of Worcester, they both at the offertorie laid their Diademes vpon the high Altar, vowing neuer to wear them after; this being now the third time in which at three several places, Wiminsler, Lincolne, and Worcester, he had bene crowned. This deuout act of his, did flow perhaps out of some such speculation as that of Constantin, who thought none truly worthy the name of a King, but God alone, or that, vpon which Geoffrey de Barillon, refused to wear a crowne of gold in Hierusalem, where our Lord and Saviour had bene crowned with thornes. For this King had at times the pangs and symptoms of mortification and piety, and did heerein acknowledge the onely guer and taker-away of kingdoms God-simighy; putting himselfe and Realme, vnder the protection of that Matieus of whom hee held paramount; and professing (as it were) that from thenceforth hee would direct his actions to the glorie of his omnipotent Master, which is in dedde the onely final cause of all true monarchie.

(10) Not long after, hauing established his affaires in England, hee crost the Seas into Normandie: where successufully fundrie matters of importance fell out: as the seizure of the City of Nantz in Brittaine after his brother Geoffrey death; his iourney to Paris, being inuited thither by Lewis and his wife the Queene; the vnpossible siege of Tolouene laid by King Henric, where Malcalme King of Scots was in companie with him; the varpe marriage of his sonne Henric to Margaret the French Kings daughter, whom Thomas Becket then Lord Chancellor had formerly conducted with verie great State from Paris, by consent of parents for that purpose; the offence taken at those spoulsals by Lewis, for that the children were but infants, and that himselfe was a looser thereby; the warre hereupon attempted by Lewis, fortifying Chenouant, which (the French hauing quie the Field by flight) King Henric recovered with aduantage; the Armies of both these great Kings, being afterward at point (as it were) to coline, dispersed vpon reconciliation of the two Kings, by tried before secular judges. 5. That it should not be lawful for a Bishop to punish any one for perjury or faith-breach. 6. That the Lark, whether the King or other, should hold pleas of Churches & Tithes, &c.

(16) These points so nearly touched the Papal Sovereignty, and Church-Liberties, that the resolute Metropolitan mainly opposed his whole powers against them. Henry also perished, as his Grandfather Henry the first had done, who having a like warre with Anselm his Archbishop, was so vehement therein, as he would not suffer him to returne into England (though after some yeeres banishment) unless hee would absolutely bind himselfe to obedience, not his Fathers Customs only, but his brothers also, who were the two Barth Williams, the Conquerour and Rufus.

(17) Many reasons moved Henry to attempt this business; as first, the enlargement of his Regall authority: Secondly, to exempt his State by degrees, from the dependancy on any external Government, as lineally claiming both from a Conquest and from absolute-Sovereignty Antecessors, and so to introduce that free Empery, to which he saw no way lie open, but by subduing the Persons and Causes of Church-men to the secular sovereignty, in a few points first, and then in other. And that this was the secret, will not obscurely appear in * that Article, which was summarily this: That Appeales should be made from the Consistory to the Archbishop, from him to the Bishop, thence to the Archbishop, and so to the King. Thus Barth M. Fox; but Mathew Paris hath more: That the King should command the Archbishop to end the suit, and that it should proceed no further without licence of the King.

(18) A third reason was, for that he had by his own perquisitions, and by the Counsell of one Erasmus a Bishop drawn unto his purposes the Archbishop of Tork, and all the other Bishops in a manner, who were now sure unto him, & ready to yeeld to his demands, which they law did lend to the good of the State wherein they lived. Moreover, hee was perwaded of great facility in obtaining his desire, both in regard of the advantage which the Schisme then vpholden by Frederick the Emperor against Alexander the third did give, which might make that Pope afraid to leese or hazard his friends: as also for that the King, till hee found the contrary, thought himselfe assured of his Thomas, whom (if Gulbert Bishop of London said true) hee advanced to that dignity against the will and liking, as well of Matilda the Emperesse his mother, as of the Clergie and people.

(19) Besides these and other reasons encouraging the King, Pope Alexander very desirous to keepe the Kings love (though secretly wishing well to Becketts attempts) sent one Philip his Almoner purposely to compose the controuersie, by whom the Pope and Cardinals required the Archbishop to make promise unto the King to the keeping his said Ordinances absolutely, and without any fauours or exceptions: whereupon Thomas being his scrupulosity thus disapproved by his Soueraigne, by all his Brethren the Bishops, and by the Court of Rome it selfe, hee rode to Windsor to the King, and there promised, that hee would keepe his said lawes, bona fide, & sine male ingenio, in good faith, and without mal-ingen.

(20) The King afterward (supposing now all contradiction had ended, & that Thomas would not waver in his faith) called an Assembly of the States at Clarendon (of which place in Wiltshire and not in Norwiche, as some haue mistaken, the said Customes called by the King, Antia, were denominated) to collect and enact those Lawes: where Iohn of Oxford sitting President, Becket, relapsing againe from his promise given to the King, said, that hee had greuously failed in making that absolute promise, and that hee would not sinne therein any more.

(21) At which the King was so vehemently stirred and inflamed, that he threatened banishment and destruction to him and his. But the Arch-bishop, bawling definitely resolved to vndergoe any perill, was yet so softened with the tears, prayers, and kneelings of so great and honourable personages, as the Bishops of Salisbury, and Norwich, the Earles of Leicester, and Cornewall, and two knights Templars, Richard de Hastings, and another, perswading repairing vnto him, that before the Kings Clergie and people, hee swore in verbo Sacramentali, in the word of a Priest, and de plano, sincerely, that hee would obey the Lawes, which the King entailed Antia, and all the Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and whole Clergie, with all the Earles, Barons, and Nobilitie, did promise and sweare, the same faithfully and truly to observe and performe, to the King and to his heires for ever. But when the King, not so concurred, would haue him (as enemie one of the Bishops) had done before him) to subscribe, and affix his seale to an instrument, in which those Canons or Laws (being in number sixtyn) were comprehended; hee once againe starting from his faith, did absolutely refuse, alleging that hee did promise it, onely to doe the King some honour, verbo tenus, in word only, but not with intent to confirme those Articles; neither could hee example of the whole State moue him, nor the credit of Edward, Arch-bishop of Rome, (though sent from the Pope) compell the difference, because Henry would not otherwise agree then as the Pope did by his Bull confirme those Lawes, which would not be granted.

(22) Henry hereupon sent in Ambassage Iohn of Oxford, and one Ridell, his clerkes, to the Roman Bishop, praying that the Legatine power for England, should be committed to Koger Archbishop of Tork, so that yet hee might at last bring Thomas vnder; but neither did this plot thriue for that the Pope (knowing that the cause was his owne more then Becketts) would not be an Author of any priuenance vnto him, (who in sorrow for that hee had so yeeld in promising, suspended himselfe from vfe of his priestlike function, till vpon sute hee was * repermitted) yet somewhat to gratifie the king, hee by his Bull granted a sleight authority: which whenthe King saw to be but superficiall, and not well borne for his purpose, with great disdain, he sent the Bull backe againe to the Pope (sall).

(23) There followed now vpon Thomas sundry molestations: for first, hee was * condemned in damages for a Manor, which Iohn de Marshall claimed; so without hearing the Archbishop had enioined the fine for a long time, without interpellation or disturbance. Then was there at Northampton, (where the king had summoned a Parliament) an account demanded of him for the king, to the value of thirtie thousand pound, which came to his hand during his Chancellorship. Whereunto his answer was, * That seeing hee had formerly accounted, and that the kings eldest sonne Henrie, on his Fathers behalfe, and all the Barons of the Exchequer, and Richard de Luci Justiciar of England, had acquitted him toward the king of all accounts, and that hee came free from all actions and dangers to the Arch-bishoppe, that now therefore hee would not answer, as a Lay-man, judging heretofore had so sufficient discharge: which refusal of his was aggravated with diuers accusations laid vpon him, as of contempt towards the king, in denying to come to his presence, being thereto commanded by him, & the like: whereto though hee made excuses (reasonable enough, if true) yet the Peeres and the Bishops condemned all his excuses to the Kings mercy: and the Prelates perceiving the kings displeasure, to tell yet to some farther severity, premonished him to submit himselfe, for that otherwise the Kings Court intended to aduance him a perjured person, and also a Traitor, for not yeelding temporal allegiance to his Temporal Soueraigne as himselfe had sworn to doe: and accordingly the Prelates themselves by joint consent adiuaged him of Perjury, and by the mouth of the Bishop of Chichester, disclaimed thenceforward all obedience unto him, as their Archbishop. The next day, whilst the Bishops and Peeres were consulting of some further course with him; Becket, not as yet daunted, caused to be sung before him at the Altar: The Priester sit and speake against me, and the cowardly persecute me, &c. And forthwith taking his silver Crozier in his owne hands, (a thing strange and unheard of before) entered among them with into the Kings presence, though earnestly dissuaded by all that wished him well: where with the King enraged, commanded his Peeres to sit in judgement on him, as on a Traitor and Perjured person; and accordingly they adjudged him to be apprehended, and cast into prison. The Earles of Cornwall and Leicester (who late as Judges) citing him forthwith to heare his sentence pronounced; hee immediately appealed to the See of Rome, as holding them no Judges competent: whereupon all reuelling him with the name of Traitor, and the like; he replying, That were it not for his function he would enter the Duell or Combat with them in the field, to acquit himselfe both of Treason and Perjury sped from the Court, and from thence without delay into Flanders, disguising himselfe vnder the name of Dereman.

The Arch-bishop would not vnder take to subscribe as to Clarendon.

Anno. 1164.

(24) The King on the other side, to leaue nothing vadoore, whereby to attchieue his desire, forthwith dispatched away Gilbert, Bishop of London, & William, Earle of Strandell, to the French King, that hee would not harbour, nor cherish one, that was fled as a Traitor; but prevailed not: for hee, vpon the contrary dealt with the Pope, That as hee loved the Roman Church and the aid of France, so he would support the cause of Thomas against the King: which whether hee did it out of Faction, rather then Devotion, let others iudge: for as wee may easily thinke that the French would gladly incommode the king of England: so this is not to bee denied, that Leiris was often afterward a Mediator for peace, and vndoubtedly held the man himselfe in great estimation both alife and dead.

(25) The Archbishop growing thus in fauour with the Pope, King Henry sends an Ambassage vnto him of many great Personages, as Rayn Archbishop of York, the BB. of London, Winchester, Chichester, Isles of Oxford, William Earle of Strandell, &c. whose whole employment being peace and pious, by requests and gratifications to procure disgrace vnto Becket, their final fruit was, That the Pope would send two Cardinals into England, fully to take the matter; but the Pope denied it, as holding it derogatory to his owne abluteness, saying (like Gods Vice-gerent at least) That in my owne glorie, which I will not give to any other, but when he is to be iudged, I will iudge him my selfe: For he knew the King of England was mighty both in speech and meane; and that Legates might easily be corrupted, as being men, more thirsty after gold and silver, then after iustice and equity: and the Pope and Cardinals thusly refused (saith the Monke of Canterbury) that as if this Archbishop were now upheld in his cause, it would be a pattern for others in like case to resist Kings, so, if he should flie, no Bishops euer after would dare oppose themselves to their Soveraignes pleasure, and so the State of the Catholike Church would be shaken, and the Popes authority be crossed.

(26) The King having received this foile, and impatient of repaile, where his owne subiect was a party, thought the indignity offered by the Pope vnjustifiable, and to let him vnderstand how hee tooke it, directs his Writs vnto the Sherifes in England, commanding them to attach such as did appeale to the Roman Court: the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, nephews, and wives, of all such of the Clergy, as were with the Archbishop, and to put them under searvice, as also to seise the revenues, goods, and chattels, of the said Clergie-men. Again, by other his letters to Gilbert Bishop of London, hee requested the profits and living, which within his Diocese did belong to any of the Clergie, who were fled to Thomas, that (vnto the Kings leave) they might haue no part thereof. Lastly, to his Iustices he signified, that they should take-keepe whosoever did bring any interdict into England till the Kings pleasure were further knowne: hee also called the Church of Canterbury, and all the Archbishops goods to bee confiscated, grounding himselfe (as may probably bee supposed) vpon the iudgement giuen against Becket at Northampton, notwithstanding that the said sentence was expressely nullified by the Popes Bull, and not onely by word of mouth, as Matthew Paris seemes to mistake it. Neither was this all, for hee banished out of the Realme all the kindred of the Archbishop, man, woman, child, and sucking babe; and forbad that hee should be any longer publickly mentioned and praised for in the Church as Archbishop of Canterbury.

(27) The Archbishop on the contrary part (the contention being now whether the power Ecclesiasticall or Secular, should worke most) did solemnly in France where he abode, excommunicate all such as obeyed, defended, or had occasioned the said lawes and Antial Customes, and some of the parties by name, as Richard de Luci, Richard de Poitou, Isabel de Aial, Alan de Reuile, and other, who presently appealed; but the King hauing further notice, that Becket After his publick sermons, on a great Festiual day, had solemnly threatened the like thunder clap against his Rascall Person; either to terrifie his adherers, or to reuenge himselfe, if any such sentence should bee against him, gathered a mighty Army vnder pretence of subduing Wales, where yet hee did little. The meane while John of Oxford (who not onely followed the Kings cause stoutly, but also wrote a learned Booke in iustifying of it against Becket) prevailed so farre as Rome, that two Legates latter, should be sent into England, to reconcile the King and Thomas, but when they were gone, the Pope hearing that they were reuolued vnto it to re-found the Archbishop, sent letters after them to rebate their absolute power, they being men (saith Gervase) who too much thirsted after gold and glory.

(28) When these two Cardinals came to Thomas, he refused to put his cause to them, vntill hee there were first a plenary restitution made to him and his of all that had been taken away: but being then conuincled by them to submit himselfe to the king, his answer was, he would, saith Gervase be more, and the Churches Liberty, saving his owne honour, and his Churches possessions; and saving his owne and his friends right: being further demanded, whether (to relettle peace in Gods Church, which hee seemed onely to desire) he would renounce his Bishopricke, if the king would renounce his customes: he answered, The proportion was not alike: for that with the honour of his Church and his Person, he could not renounce his Bishopricke; whereas on the other side, the King was bound, as well for his Soules health, as for his honour, to renounce these ordinances. (Will you know the reason?) because the Pope and hee had condemned them. And so that desire for peace was frustrate.

(29) The King of England tempestuously storming at these affronts, and daily increase of new salaries, wherewith like a guilefull Chirurgeon, hee still made the wound more to fester; menaced the Monkes (which in their Abbey at Postemel, had now for two whole yeeres entertained him) to thrust all of their order out of England, if they durst releaue his enemy any longer: Whereupon they dissuading him, Leiris the French King tooke him to Seas with himselfe, where for foure yeeres hee remained and was (if wee may credit King Henry) a great instigator of the French King, and also of the Earle of Islanders, against the King of England: as was also by diuers Emulenes most certaine, if the two said Cardinals told not a lie to the Pope: But, that the Peace was broken, and warres remaid betwixt the two Kings, chiefly for Thomas his sake, Gervase the Monke himselfe doth record it as most credible.

(30) Howbeit, by mediation at length, the two Kings were again reconciled, and at their friendly encounter, Becket well-willers advised him to submit himself in the presence of both kings, with without any more reservations which he seeming to yield to, presented himself verie humbly, and referred the cause to the king, not now, Salvo ordine suo, but yet on a new point, Salvo honore Dei, wherewith the king exasperated, told the French king, such was the humor of the man, that whosoever defied him, he would say it was against Gods honour, and so would be better the secret to conformity; with which, and other speeches, King Lewis offended with Becket, asked him whether he thought to be greater or better than Saint Peter? and the Pope of both Nations accused him of much arrogancy, as being himselfe the misfull minister of his own, and the Churches tranquillity.

(31) Notwithstanding, the Pope forgot not his faithfull Thomas, and therefore after hee had graced him with a confirmation of all the Priviledges, and powers, which any of his Predecessors in that Soe did enjoy (to the daring and defiance as it were, of the kings vtmost indignation) the king sent a letter into Germany, declaring that hee would for-like Pope Alexander, and iointe with the Emperour, and Antipope. Whereupon, when the Bishop of Rome had commanded Gilbert Bishop of London to admonish the king to giue other his courtesies, and customs preiudicious to the Church, the said Bishop obeyed, and in his answer sought to perfwade the Pope to a commensie, and forgets not to insulte his Sovereigne, as T that the King was ready to obey the sacred hefts of the Church, saving in himselfe his own, or his Kingdoms dignity: That, as for Appeales, he claimed that honour, by the ancient institution of his Kingdome, that is to say, T but no Clerke should for a civil action depart the same, until right could not be had in his Courts at home, and then he would tender no man. T that hee did not bawle the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, who might returne at his pleasure, for as he would obferue all those his Grandfathers customs, which once hee had giuen his faith to doe: That the King thought himselfe greatly misused, in that hee is willing to stand to the iudgement of the whole Church of his owne Kingdome, &c.

(32) But when mediations, letters, messages, or other waies, would not preuaile; the Pope admonished the King, that he meant no longer to refrain the Arch-bishop from reuenging his owne, and his Churches injuries with the sword of censure, and thereupon (for a beginning) the Arch-bishop excommunicates Gilbert Bishop of London, and proceeded to farre with others, that there was scarce found in the Kings owne Chappell and presence such as might performe the wanted ceremonies.

(33) The King both touched with his owne wrongs, and tender of their sale, who for his sake underwent that severity, animates Bishoppe Gilbert with most losing offers to beare the charges of prosecuting his appeal against Becket, and desires the Pope to send him Legates which might absolve his excommunicated Subjects, and settle a peace, or else he should bee compelled to provide otherwise for his owne security and honour.

(34) Two Cardinals therefore, Gratian and Finnian, comming into France to end the contention, returne notwithstanding without possibility of doing goods for that Becket would not yield in any point to those Customers, at which he had once excepted, but with his ordinary limitations. At last yet by the popes mediation, the two kings of England and of France met at Paris, whether the Arch-bishop repaired, and yet no peace ensued: for that the king refused the kisse of peace with him, and Becket would either haue a found and full peace, or none at all; where, though the king of England refused to finish any thing vnder the name of restitution, as being against his honour (because all restitution implied a wrong) yet in the other maine matter of his Auitall Customers, offering to stand to the iudgement, not of his owne only, but euen of the Parisian Demesnes and Church of France, hee came off from that conference with some advantage & sauiour, in the opinion of the hearers.

(35) King Henry (for all this) seeing no issue of his long disputes, and vnreall viages, vnderstanding also that the Arch-bishop of Seins in person had solicited the Pope, to put the Kingdome of England vnder Interdict, (which is the prohibiting of the publick vie of Christs Religion, & Christian Buriall throughout the whole land) hee becme then in Normandy, sends forth his Edict: That if any man bring from the Pope or Becket, any letters of interdiction, he should presently suffer as a Traitor to the King and the State: That no Clerke whatsoever goe forth of the land without a Paffe from his Influences, and none returne againe without letters of license from the King himselfe. T that none receive any message from the Pope or Becket, nor make any appeale unto them, nor hold any Plea by their mandates: That if any Prelate or Clerke, or Laymen shall obey any sentence of Interdict, he and all his Kindred shall be forthwith expelled the land, and all his goods sequestrated to the Crowne. That all Clerkes who haue rents in England, returne home within three Months, or else all their rents to fall to the King. That certaine Prelates specified, be cited to asseesse in the Kings Courts for interdicting Earls Engles lands. That Peter-pence be not paid to Rome, but reserved. Thus, (as Gravelin the Monke lamentably complained) all from the edict to the yongest throughout England were made to adure obedience to Pope Alexander and Becket.

(36) After all this, it came into King Henries mind, to sweeten these his many cares with some solace, and to crowne his eldest sonne, yongue Henry, King of England, now in his owne lifetime: A counsel not more temerarious, then unfortunate: but of which yet he did hope to reapeth his consolation, that it was done in contempt of Becket (whose office it was to haue crowned the King,) with some advantage also toward the perpetuation of the Auitall Customers, and that also without scruple of conscience, his sonne receiving the Crowne without caution, to performe the Churches libertie, either by him put in, or by others recalled. Yearther, an Oath ministred, and by the yongue King taken, to maintaine those Auitall Customers to the vttermost.

(37) This solemnitie was performed, as Henric the fathers commandement, by Roger Arch-bishop of York, (the anciently siall See of Canterbury) contrary to the Popes expresse Inhibition, the father himselfe King Henric, being present therat, though without any fortunate preiudge comming, or cause of consolation in the action. For he, in his insuspicious passage out of Normandy, arriving not without very great perill, at Paris found the best and newest ship he had was suncke in the flames, and therein, besides Henric de Aguelin and his two sonnes, Gilbert de Sallbronn, Mr. Ralf de Borlmann, the Kings physician and fauourit, with about foure hundred men and women more, were deuoured of the working waues. And at the feast, the ioufull father himselfe, carrying the first dish, and the Arch-bishop of York saying in pleasure to the yongue King: Reinice my faire sonne for their a no Prince in the world, hath such a seruice attending at his table at you. The constant yongue man answered; why? wonder you at that? my father knowes too well nothing that misbecomes him, for so much as hee is reall borne but of one side, but our selfe are reall borne both by father and mother.

(38) Adde heereunto, that this vnluckie Coronations triumphes, were celebrated with bon-fires kindled by the furies in Normandy, which Lewis the French King invaded with fire and sword, because his daughter Margaret was not crowned aswell as the yongue King her husband: but the father speeding into those parts, queneth this flame with a promise to recrowne his sonne, and then his daughter r

Margaret should be honoured with like ceremonies. Thus the fathers patience was executed on euer hand, and worlthings were feared.

(39) So now yet at last, in the twentieth yeere of Becket's banishment, another meeting was had at Seint, whither, the two great Kings, and the Arch-bishop of Seint, and Bishop of Neuers, being together, the Arch-bishop of Canterburie repaired, and the treatie of Peace was entered into, which at Ambois, in another meeting (as procurement of Edward Arch-bishop of Rouen) was finished, and the Arch-bishop (knowing the King was terrified with the expectation of the forefaid imminent Interdictum) was restored to the Kings fauour, and permitted to haue full vse of his Metropolitane See, and all the priuies thereof with the arrears. Which conclusion, the King signifies to his sonne in England, whither the Arch-bishop returns, and lands at Sandwich: And thus the controversie betweene the King and his Arch-bishop seemed to be ended.

(40) But the Arch-bishop had not beene long in England, before hee published the Popes letters, by which, Roger Arch-bishop of York and Hugh bishop of Durres, were suspended from the vic of their Episcopall function, for crowning the yongue King in peruidue of the See of Canterburie, and the Bishops of London, Exeter, and Salisbury, cut off from the Church by censure, for affilting the said Arch-bishop at that Coronation; whom Becket would not, but vnder conditions, at the yongue Kings request, absolve. Whereupon a great complaint was carried into Normandy, to the father King, * by some of the Bishops: and in the meane time, the Arch-bishoppe Thomas, putting himselfe vpon the way to visite the yongue King, at Woolleche, in Oxfordshire, was commanded not to approach.

(41) At the newes of these late censures, the father King was so fore displeased, that some words slipping from him, and arguing his great discontent, mooued Hugh Marsh, William Fisel, Hugh Britte, and Richard de Kilsore, knights and courtiers, toposit into England, and there in a fure, (without either warrant, or priuatie of their Soueraigne) to murder the Arch-bishop (being then about a forty and eight yeers old) in his owne Church of Canterburie, which sacred Place, and Time, besides his high Calling, might haue pleaded for pittie, had not the men been wholly transported with barbarous rage. For howeuer we are farre from their tancies, who for his zeale to the Popes Soueraignty, haue so moued him to the top of Martyrs glory, that not onely the basist part of his Stature was pure gold, and his a old Shoe was decauntly killyd by all passengers, but also shamelesse and numberlesse Miracles are handly ascribed vnto him, and his * Bloud almost marched in vertue with our euer-blessed Saviours: yet wee no lesse condemne their butcherly execution, who (how great so euer his offence was against the King and State) had no lawfull authoritie to beat them out, or acquit them, from the guilt of Blood.

(42) To shut vp this long contention (which, as you see, would not be extinct but by blood, nor take end but by his death,) because any censure of one owne will be said to issuout of Time-serving, or State-pleasing, we will onely annex the bare iudgement of the forefaced learned Monke of that time, who thus speaks. Indeed though my selfe enioy in this, whom they loue and praise, to extoll what former they haue done, (an argument of their great affection but slender wisdom) yet in plain truth, these things, which the venerable Arch-bishop is acted, that no profit at all thence proceeded, but the Kings worth only was kindled (whereby so many mischances afterwards arose) I doe not thinke to bee praiseworthy, though they sprang from a laudable zeale, as it was in the blessed Prince of the Apostles, who attaining the top of Apostolical perfection, taught the Gentiles by his example to Iudaize; for which the Defer of the Gracities declares that he deserved to be repurchased, though hee did it with a prouer-worship and pious intent. And in another place. The Arch-bishop was hot in zeale of Iustice, but whether fully according to knowledge, God knoweth, (for it is not for a man of my meane quality, rashly to iudge of so great a mans actions,) but I thinke, the blessed Pope Gregorie would haue dealt more mildly, and smit at these things which might haue borne borne, without any basard of the Christian faith, &c. and then concludes: I therefore, that which the venerable Arch-bishop then did, I neither iudge that it to be commended, neither professe I to condemn it. For good men are so to be loued, or lauded by vs, that wee neither loue nor laud the acts wherein they flow themselves to be fraile men, but onely those things wherein we cannot scruple we ought to imitate them: and therefore they are worthy and worthe to be praised, that Gods prerogative may be referred intire to himselfe.

(43) Some other learned men there were, who liued neere to that time, whose censure was farre sharper then that Monks: Such were some of those Diuines of Paris, mentioned by Calixtus the Monk, who saith, *The Question was debated to & fro amongst the Doctors, in the vniuersitie of Paris, whether Thomas were damned or saved: amongst whom, Rogerius the Norman answered, that hee deserved death and damnation, for his contumacie against his King, the Minister of God: but Petrus Canon alledged, that his Miracles were signes of his saluation, &c. An indeede if all be true, which a one man hath written in fine bookes, containing his 270. Miracles, we cannot but acknowledge him, both the greatest Saint, and the merriest too, that euer gotte into heauen: so ridiculous are many things recorded of him. As that of Adwardus, who for stealing of a great whetstone (which the Author that writes it, beil deferred) being deprived of his Eares and Visitation by sentence of Law; vpon priar to S. Thomas he had all restored againe: Yea euen a Bird, hauing become taught to speake, flying out of her cage, and ready to be seized on by Spar-Hawks, said onely, S. Thomas helpe mee, and a later Exemite self professed dead, and resurrected, and (belike) reported it. Of which great power in this Saint, how came wee doubt? I thinke wee read, that euen in his life time the Virgin Mariane her life was contented to bee his Semiter, and sewed his shirt with red silk? Many of which kind of follies, (if that word be sharp enough) might bee here inficted, were not our present argument more serious, and thesse foregies fit onely for Monks to endite, children to read, and fooles to beleue.*

(44) The report of the tragical outrage on the Arch-bishop, comming to the old King, at Argentan in Normandy; there was no kind of sorrow, into which, (without respect to Maistie, or State) hee fell not; and not without cause, as knowing how plentifull an Hydra of mischiefs (vpon the opinion of his priuatie with the fact) would rise, if not prevented. But the murderers, fearing least this their fact would displease the king, in whole reuenge they did it, fled into the North, and abode one whole yeere in the kings Castle of Kearthburgh in Yorkshire; perhaps by fauour of the yongue king: none of them dying for the fact, by way of iustice, because, the Clergie extingping themselves from the bunds of ciuill Laws, the punishment of a Priest-Killer (as by some it appeareth) was not then the death of the Body by execution of capitall sentence, but of Soule by Excommunication, all about the twentieth third yeer of this king, it was (at the instant suite of Richard Arch-bishop of Canterburie, and of the Bishops of Winchester, Elie, and Norwich) yielded, that such persons should also suffer losse of life.

45 The king therefore, vpon profection to submit himself, to the iudgement of such Cardinals, Legats, as the Pope should find to inquire of the fact, kept his Reale from Interdictum, though the king of France, the Arch-bishop of Seint, and Theobald Earle of Blou, had outgoe his Embassadors with their inflaming letters, containing the description of that Parricide.

(46) Henry therefore among so many perplexities rising out of the Archbishops murmur, saw no way so ready for the calming his own perturbations, or for the averting mens thoughts from the consideration of that scandalous tragédie, as to undertake some great and noble enterprise, which now offered it self very seasonably. For Ireland, a verie spacious and plentiful Island, and lying commodiously for the view of the English, harned in it self with civil divisions, kindled among the petty Kings and Princes thereof: while Rathbrick the Great, called O Connor Dan, Prince of Connaght, abusing his power and the advantage of the times, to the oppression of his Neighbour, sought to make himselfe the vniuersall King thereof, having already invaded the Title & Seile of KING and MONARCH OF IRELAND. And this his purpose was much advanced by the fatal and familiar error of proceedings in like cases: for the Irish Princes, either through distrust or pride, forbearing to vaine their forces against the common enemy, while each provides for oue, they are all as it were, overcome.

(47) Moreover Dermot Mac Murrough (in that time of the Irish Postarch, or five-fold Kingdom) having secretly stolne away the wife of Rathbrick (a light woman, and consenting or plotting rather, & vrging the rape it self) added to Rathbricks ambition, a just desire of reuenge, for so notable, impudēt, and publicke iniurie, so much the more odious in Dermots person, for that hee was old: neyther was this all, for the causes of this change were higher.

(48) The onely disposer and translator of Kingdomes is God; & in Ireland to moue him to offence (without which no Kingdom is transferred) against the people thereof, all such finnes abounded, as commonly forgoe the greatest changes: for not onely the manners of the Nation were extremely corrupted, but the Christian faith it self decayed; barbarisme ouerturning the one, and a more then superstitious the other. But it may seeme by some Authors, that King Henrie particular inducements to that Action, were both an ancient title vnto that Kingdom, derived from his ancestors (the kings of England) for many ages before him; and a many vnsufferable wrongs (by their Princes) vnto the English Nation, buying and selling their Captiues, and vsing Turkish tyranny on their bodies: which made the Irish Clergy themselves coufesse, that they had deforced no other, then that their land should be transferred to that Nation whom they had so cruelly handled. Notwithstanding, King Henry, who knew how great and dangerous tumults the Popes had raised on small occasions, thought his way would be much easier, if he went onward with the Popes good fauour, which hee easily obtained (so liberal is his holiness of that which is none of his) for a fee, y^e v^ez. a penny yearly to be paid to Saint Peter of every house in Ireland. Touching which point, Rufus of Warrick (no Protestant, I assure you) saith, That his English King is not bound to reioy on the Popes graunt for Ireland, nor yet to pay that tax, because hee had claime to that Kingdom by an hereditary right: and that the Pope had no temporal interest therein (as his fauorites pretend) the often-mentioned Monke of Newburgh can tell vs, who saith, that Nannam externa subactis diuini, Ireland was neuer subiect to any foraine command.

(49) God Almighty therefore did now part it into the heart of Henry, for the reforming of that kingdom, to make a Conquest thereof, hating in his infinite wisdom before hand fitted all circumstances needfull to concurre, for inducing to warre and frugal a Prince to such an enterprise, which thus tooke beginning.

(50) Dermot Mac Murrough, heere in possession of his fatal Melen (the adulterous wife of Rathbrick) was persued so eagerly with the reuenging sword of his enemy (who, howeuer wounded in heart with the abuse of his Bed, reioiced in the colour and occasion mislittered thereby, for him to rise vpon the flourishing Provinces of Leinster) as hee was driven to flee from place to place, and at the length to quitte his kingdom also, the subjects whereof his tyrannie and vices had vnited, in their affections toward him. Thus desperate of help at home, his last deliberations were to draw in forreine aides, the necessity of his case requiring it; and for that purpose, finally resolues to repaire to the court of the wife and potent Henrie, King of England, being then in Aquitain: neither could Dermot but knowe, that he had heretofore bene in Henries designs, at such time as hee ment to subdue it for William of Armes, his youngest brother, and also, because his present Dominions did halfe (as it were) enuiron it. In which hopes he was not deceiued; for Henrie listened therunto verie willinglie, as to a thing which hee had indeede a some yeres before projected.

(51) King Dermot therefore was heard in his suite. But, because the thing, as at that time, neither seemed great enough, for such a Prince as Henrie to vndertake directly, nor as yet was heid sufficiently discovered to his hand; that therefore the Ice might be broken by inferior means, and aswell the conueniences, as inconueniences, sounded to the depth, (without engaging the roiall person, name, or power,) it was by the Kings letters permitted to Dermot (the exiled Prince) to draw what adventures, or voluntaries, either the commiseration of his estate, or other respects, of pietie, profit, or delight in armes, could allure to the action. Now whether it were, for that he, whose Countreys lay toward the coasts of Wales, (and within ken vpon a cleere day) by commodity thereof might entertaine intelligence, aswell as trafficke, with the inhabitants of those parts; or, for that the flame of their Chieftaine did inuade; or, for that his acquaintance at his arrival grew there firmer; or, for that these and many other circumstances met in this accident: sure it is, that Dermot raised his first, and principall succours from among the English Colonies there.

(52) The Welsh had then in their hands valiant Gentlemen of Norman race, one Robert Fitz Stephen, who by Gilbert de Clare was entrusted with the defence of the towne of Cardigan, but through treachery the Towne being surprised, Robert was also deliuered vnto Rhys ap Iffan, Prince of South Wales, who would hearken to no other endgements of his liberty, but onely, that he should for euer abandon his possessions in Wales. Whereupon (the opportunity of Dermots quarrel giuing hopes of new fortunes) immediately hee entered into contract with the Irish king, promising by a certaine day to come to his succour, with as many Voluntaries, as his remaining fortunes, or the hope of the voyage could furre: which hee did accordingly performe, leaving it very disputable, whether with more incensell or courage. But Dermot well knowing that the fortunes of this Gentleman (to whose valour nothing seemed impossible) were vnable to vndergo the whole weight of the vnkowne worke, had formerly deale with that renowned Lord, Richard of the house of Clare, Earle of Pembroke, furnished Strong-bow the man whom the Fate of Ireland did expect.

(53) Dermots persuasions to the Earle were of this kind: That the enterprise, besides the facultie thereof, was full of pietie, honour, iustice, and commoditie: That it appeared so to King Henry himselfe, by whose lease hee was free to gather what forces hee could: That hee was driven out by the cruell ambition of Neighbours, & treachery of wicked Subjects. That Leinster was a Kingdom, and though but a part, yet cleerely the best and richest part of Ireland. That multitudes offered themselves to his aid, but his cares were not onely for a General to lead them, but for one to whom hee might lease his kingdom also.

"ken into lesser states; and if Dermot were not a
"King, neither then were Elle, Caffe, Ffisa, Seglers,

"at this time shouldst bee without a wife. Know
"thou then, that I haue that one daughter Eas, the
"heire of my Crowne, and comfort of my age: let
"thy oneweys tell thee how faire and worthy:
"thou shalt dare aough, that thou wilt thinke far broad-
"der then well cross, for view of so honest beauty. In "the first blossom of her youth, a vertuous vir-
"gine, and by both Parents borne of Princes, shall
"at thine arrival, with this right hand, bee made
"thine, and with her after my death, my whole
"realme, and other my rights whatsoever: which "were they infinitely more, (despise not such loue,
"nor the alliance of one distressed, but neuertheless
"a King.) I would repute them sure too little for "such a sonne in law: who though thy selfe as yet
"no King, art come of Kings, and it is my whole
"and last ambition, that I may liue to make thee
"one. The Earle accepted the conditions, resolu-
"te to set vp Dermot againe, and for that purpose
"bound himselfe by solemn contract, to the full per"formance of his part within a certaine time.

(53) Dermot having thus negotiated his affaires and let it in so good forwardness, while his friends in England prepared themselves and their Forces, lest hee should seeme to reline vpon fortune aides, and so to diminish with them the reputation of his owne valour and alliances at home; hee sailles backe into his Country; carrying with him the promises of confederates, and there: both by his presence and persuasions did the best hee could to facilitate the entrance of the English, whose honourable entertainments, deuotions, chiality, riches, valours, wisdom, and victorious greatnesse heaped not to celebrate, as instruments aduancing his owne designes: which raised no little expectation, mixt with contrary affections of desire and feare.

(54) The next yeare, when the season grew fit for an Army to take the field, Robert Fitz-Stephen accompanied with Maurice Fitz-Gerald his halfe brother by the firer side, &c a competent number of Souldiers, reposing (vnder God) their chief hope in their Swords and courages, set saile for Ireland, & is the beginning of May came on shore, at a place called by the Irish, Buno (by the English at this day commonly, Bagg and Buno) which in our language signifies Sacred: a word which (so much as names may be prefiges of things) did as it were hallow the attempt of the English with a lucky and gracious omi-nation, whereof the Inhabitants at this present retrace this time.

At the head of Bagg and Buno,
Ireland was left and won.

(55) The next day after, Maurice de Prender- goff alio, with* other men of Armes, and many Archers in two shippes arrived there, being parcell of Fitz-Stephans Forces and Companions of his Fortunes, who joining themselves together, immediately marcht to the City of Wexford vnder their Banners, and that in the greatest brauery they could,
(the Knights and Men at Armes, in their Coates of Arms & Colours) to draw thereby now at the first the greater reputation to themselves, and with opinion so gotten, to fill vp the finalnes of their numbere: in which manner assailing the City, the Irish therein rendered themselves, and in-reward of the seruice, being also according to capitulation, and encouragement of others, who were to proceed in this warre, Dermot, to whose vic the English Generall had taken it,* bestowed the City it selfe, and the Country about vpon Robert Fitz-Stephen, at his pleasure to be disposed off: and there the first Colony of our Nation was planted, which hath ever since inamouably maintained their abode among innumerable changes in the world, retaining at this day the ancient name of the English, and the language also it selfe, though brackish with the mixture of vulgar Irish, which therefore by a distinct name is called Wexford speech, current onely in that City, &
the Country about.

(56) But Robert Fitz-Stephen thus aduanced, for his more affurance, beganne to raise* a Town at Carrick, making the place which nature had already fortified, much more by Art defensible. This entrie into Ireland being by him now made (vnder the name of Henry King of England) and the successe exceeding hope, Richard Strong-arm receiving ad-uertisement from Dermot, and the new Lord of Wexford, of all occurrences; thought fitt, first to dispatch* some supplies to Fitz-Stephen, which about the beginning of May, vnder the conduct of Ramondle graffe (a Gentleman of the Earles family) were accordingly sent: and after Ram- mond the Earle himselfe in the same yeere set forth: his Forces were about a two hundred men of Armes, and a thousand other Souldiers, with whom he came fife to Anchor in the Bay of

He married the Lady Kate.

(57) Box Dermot, Author of this calamity to his Nation, refores in his purpose, in full complement of this Contract, doth openly in solemn manner hallow his promised daughter Ema, upon the Conquerour in marriage, with his own right hand giving her in the Church: at which time, the famous Strong-bow did not celebrate his particular Wedding-day, but the indissoluble knot of the Irish alliance to the English Sovereignetic, with the same Ring which circled his Wives finger, affiancing that lland to this our Country.

Earle Richard marched to Dublin.

(58) The Marriage performed, it was far from the mind of the Earle to spend much time in revels and feasts, but confult with his men of warre what was next to bee done for the settling his Father in law King Dermot, and for finishing the Conquest which was now so happily begonne, in two severall parts of Ireland at once. Leaving therefore a sufficient Garrison to make good the places already gained, & to secure the lading of fresh supplies, he set forward with his selected Companies, to whose victorious weapons the whole Realme lay open, so farre forth, that Ascherick himself was very well contented (notwithstanding his lately usurped, & swelling title of Monarch of Ireland) to hold himself within the bogs and fastnesses of his peculiar Realme, the wild, and mountainous Cannagh; meane while, Strong-bow keeps on his way over the boome of Ireland to the principall City thereof, Dublin, taking in (as he marcheth) all the places about, and securing himself by pledges, of their loyalty, or otherwise, as he saw most fite. In which journey, pleased with the delight and fertile situation of Kildare, he resolved there to settle his abode, and to erect a citie to his posterity.

The conquest of Dublin being speedily, and most happily achieved, not long after, Dermot Mac Murrough, Father in law to the Earle (whom the Irish for his affection to the English, call Dermot Nongall, that is, Dermot the Strangers friend) breathed his last at Ferry, dying (as pleaseth Deum).

(59) The fame of these successes waiving over the Irish seas, and coming to the King, made him resolve to passe in person thither, that he might have the honor of the Conquest: and not approving such forwardness in the Earle, who (as some say) went against his expresse commandment, (and indeed  Giraldus*, who lived at that time, calls his lease no better then an Ironical lease) and for that hee knew not to what insolvency such late fortune might in time allure, as also for that they feared to handle the Natives too rigorously;  thereupon he sent by his Proclamations, any vessel to carry anything out of his Dominions into Ireland, and commands all English to sever before Easter, and leave off their attempts, or their estates in England should be seized for the King.* By which Edict these Affairs were brought into fearefull extremity, which was changed into better condition by the rascall of Heruicus de Monte Marisco, on the behalfe of the Earle, and the adventures, who finding the King in Glostershire with an Army for Ireland, appealed his displeasure upon these termes: That the King should have the head City of the Kingdome, Dublin, with the adjacent Countreys, with all the Coast townes and Castles, the rest to remaine to the Conquerours to hold of the King, and of his Heires, and so to be under his protection, as Subjects ought, and as they were before, which subjection it seemed to the King they meant to have renounced.

* Adam lib. 4. p. 39.

(60) The Kings goodly Nauy lay in Attford haven, to which as hee journeyed, hee thundered against the Welsh Nobility, comming to entertain him, for suffering Strong-bow to depart: At last being imbarke, he had a faire Gale which set him safe in Ireland with all his Forces at Waterford, where first hee commits to prison Robert Fitz-Stephen, whom the Citizens presented bound, having held him in custody, under color of doing good service, because hee had entered Ireland without the Kings particular leave; yet soon after the King released him, but deprived him of Wexford and the territories. Then takes he the homages of such petty Kings, and principall persons of the Irish as repaired, dismissing them in honourable sort, meaning to winne them by gentle, and not exasperating courses; and marching through Offryne to Dublin, he takes  Ascherick* the King of *Cannagh*s homage by Hugh Lacy, and William Fitz-Aldein, last ly, at Dublin hee kept his Christmas in Royall state, which he beheld, very many of the Irish Princes came thither.

(61) Mindfull now of his duty to God, the I-land being calme, and silent through the presence of such a mighty Monarch, the most noble King of England, and triumphour of Ireland (as mine Author stileth him) cauleth a Synode to be holden at Caesars for reformation of the Irish Church, where amongst sundry other constitutions, to which the Irish Clergy did willingly submit, it was decreed, That all the Church-lands, and their possessions should be altogether free from the exaction of secular men, Or that from thenceforth, all Divine things should be handled in every part of Ireland in such sort, as the Church of England doth handle them. For (saith the Constitution) it is most iust, and meete, that as Ireland hath by Gods mercy obtained a Lord, and King out of England, so also that from thence they should receive a better forme of life, and manners, then heretofore they vied.

(62) The King continuing his pollicke jealousies, and thinking Strong-bow to be as yet too great, draws from his dependency Raimond, Atile Cogan, William Makrell, and other of the best Captaines, & makes them his owne by bounty. But before hee could fully establish that Kingdome (the inseparable evil fate thereof, which would neuer suffer it to enjoy the blessed benefite of exact civillity) other affaires which hee esteemed more necessary, call him away, and therefore having left Hugh Lacy at Dublin, hee sets saile for England upon Easter Monday, and landed happily at St. Dunstons in Pevenseyshire, from whence with all speed hee posseth into Normandy.

(63) In Normandy there attended for his arrival two Cardinals, sent as Legates at his owne request, for taking his purgation concerning the death of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whereof, upon oath that hee was no way consenting to that cruel, and sacrilegious revenge, and declaring without his infinite sorrow for having in his anger given occasion by rash words for others to do that despite, and giving further oath to performe unimpaired penance, he was by them absolved. The condition of his absolutions were, That hee should at his owne charge maintaine two hundred Soldiers for an whole yeere for defence of the holy land. That hee should suffer Appeals to be made freely. That hee should revoke all customs introduced to the prejudice of the Churches liberty. That hee should restore and make up the possessions of the Church of Canterbury. That hee should freely receive all such as were in banishment for Becketts cause, &c. Not long after Thomas was canonized by Pope Alexander, and so not onely the victorie clearly given him against King Henry, but a triumph also.

(64) Now begonne the wombe of rebellion, and vnusurall conspiracies to disclose the mischiefes which were ordained to exercise this right redoubted King and Warriour, hatched here at home by the malice (some say) of Eleanor his Queene, at such time as hee was absent in Ireland, to that as  one* writes, God stirred up the Kings own bowels against himselfe. Causes of this vnhappie diffention, there were many: First a Queene and Wife, violent vindictiue for wrong done vnto her Bed by the King, who was immoderate addicted to varietie of loves: then Ambition in an enill-naturd Child, and lastlie, pernicious Advers and instruments, who, for their owne ends, nourished this cursed mischief: so as if we should out of four stories recapitulate the severall occasions taken by the Ionesse against the father, wee should rather have you the colours, then the causes: For none of those causes which his Son pretended, seemed great enough with men that feare God, to beare out such continuall divisions as followed.

(65) The head of this conspiracy was verie great, and lustily verie terrible: for on the side of King Henry the sonne, there were the Kings of France and Scotland, a Richard and Geoffrey two younger Ioneses of the King of England, whom by their mothers persuasions they forsooke, to follow the yongue King; David the Scotch Kings brother, Philip Earle of Flanders, (a Peere of France, and a potent Prince), Matthew Earle of Arles, Theobald Earle of Blois, Hugh Earle of Chester, Robert Earle of Leicester, Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolk, Roger Mortimer, and other great ones, in great numbers, so as nothing seemed wanting, but onely a good cause, which (such as it was) Queene Eleanor, like an Alceste, kept close, so much as lay in her, with perpetual lamentations. And indeed the scope of these confederates did require no lesse a combination, in being to depole the Father, whom it pleased them (for countenance of their vngodly armes) to repute no King, because hee had crowned his sonne.

(66) Though nothing then could come more greivous, to the bleeding heart of a most loving father, then such a warre; yet not to bee vapourised, hee (like a fouldier) prepares himselfe, when faire meynes faile, and found multitudes ready to lide, and die with him; the indignitie of the vnnatural revolt did so much in flame all honest courages, which acknowledged him their Sovereigne.

(67) The particular accidents of the wars would fill a volume. At one time Normans, Scots, and Britains were invaded by the confederates in France, and at the same time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had friends in all those parts, and himselfe hearing that Fernalme was believed by the French King in person, hee beganne at last to kindle, hauing like a sleeping Lion, sitten still all that while, and (for that the place had, vpon parles, agreed to render if aid came not by a day) hee arrived to their succour within the time, sending King Lewis word that hee should gette him forth of Normander with speed, or he would without faile, come, and see how hee did vpon that verie day. Lewis, meaning nothing lesse then to put his owne Crowne in danger, while he sought one for his owne law, (and therefore in all the warre-time, would neuer set vp his rest vpon a battell, but willing otherwise to doe to King Henry the father, all the harme hee could, by countenancing the faction, and supporting the revolted malecontents with his best meanes, and knowing King Henry was a slower and terrible Prince when he came indecde to fight, in immediate raised his siege, and with as much hast as hee might, abandoned the place, leaving his Camp, tents, and warlike provisions behind, and retired into France.

(68) And though King Henry, beginning now indecde to shake his dreadfull sword, had many faire daies of his enemies, mixt with some losses both of men and other strengths, though not great, nor many, in regard of the overthrowes which on his behalf were giuen: For that in Britaine his forces had in battell vanquished Hugh Earle of Chester, & Ralph de Fulgiere, and slaine about one thousand and five hundred of their army; & in England, Reynald Earle of Cornwall, and Richard de Linc, had in bloodie battell overthrowne the insolent Earle of Leicester, and entered the towne of Leicester by force; and that he had the persons of the said Hugh Lupus Earle of Chester, Ralph de Fulgiere, and verie many other prisoners of especiall note and Nobility; yet Lewis the French King moueing a parles, the father desirous to vie the good fortune of war, to reclaim his rebels, was so willing to make peace, that hee might seeme to haue outgone expectation in the qualitie of his officers, but through such wicked persuasions, as were vsed, prevailed not.

(69) A violent firebrand in this diffusion, was Robert Earle of Leicester, being matched with a Ladie no lesse proud, and stomachous then himselfe; who at this meeting, was not contented to haue affronted King Henry the father, on the behalfe of his yongue Lord, and Master the sonne, but (after many words of reproach) is said to haue laid his daring hand vpon his sword, with purpose to haue braken the King, had hee not been with-holden: (and where such spirits had to doe, it is easie to guess what kinds of counsell were like to be embraced and pursued,) hauing forsaken the father, nor for that the others cause was more honest, but for that (such Thomas Walsingham the father King, labouring to enlarge the regal power, sought to set his iante vpon the neckes of the proud and haughtie.

(70) But God, who ment to chastise the King, and not to deliuer him vp into his enemies hands, destroyed those hopes, that moued the sonnes to their vnatural attempts; for it was not long after, when newes came into Normandy, that his faithfull friends and seruants, Richard de Linc, and Humphrey de Bohun high Constable of England, together with the powers of Reynald Earle of Cornwall the Kings vncle, Robert Earle of Gloucester, and William Earle of Arundell, not farre from Paris, courageously encountered with the Earle of Leicester, and his Flemings, of whom aboue a fiew thousand were slaine, or taken, and among the prisoners was the Earle himselfe, and his Armesman Countesse, whose persons at his commandement were not long after, brought over into Normandy.

(71) This great victorie and other good success, did so much advantage the King, that Lewis beginning to distrust the enterprize, sought for fixe monethes truce for himselfe, and had it granted: but because there were yet in England, two principall men, the Earle of Norfolk, and Roger Mortimer, which held out; hauing Leicester for their Bandwaggon, and seat of warre, with no small numbers of partakers, notwithstanding that Geoffrey (the Elef of Lincoln, the Kings base sonne) had taken two of Mortimers Castles, and done other good service for his Lord and Father, the truce serued the enimie for no other purpose but to breath, and to repaire himselfe.

(72) The father (of whom Lewis said, that hee seemed not to goe, but to flie, he went with such celerity from one place and Kingdome to another) in the meane while, recouers himselfe from Richard his violent sonne, weakening that partie by so much, and would haue weakened it furre more, but that aduertisements came post, declaring such matter, as made him speede into Normandy.

(73) Thither came vnto him out of England, Richard the Elef of Winchester, went with all hath by the Kings Infinitaries, to lay open vnto him, the dangerous estate wherein the Realme at that time stood. For after that Philip Earle of Flanders had solemnely sworn to invade England, in supportation of yongue Henrys quarrell, sundrie forces arriving and joining with Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolk, had taken and spoiled the Citie of Norwich, and done otherwise much harme, whereby the yongue King and his faction had taken great encouragement, as if the die of warre were turned, and aswell the yongue King as the Earle of Flanders, were come with forces to the Coasts, there to transport for England: Moreouer, Robert Earle Ferrers of Derby (who was slaine from ment, armes being laid apart vpon all hands. The chief points of that wished peace were: 1. That Henry the young King with Richard and Geoffrey his brethren should retaine, freed from all oaths of confederation, to the King their Fathers obedience, as to their Lord and Father. 2. That Prisoners should be set at large without ranfome on all hands. 3. That William King of Scots, the Earle of Leicester and Cheshire, Ralph de Fulgijs, & other, who had compounded for their ranfome, before this conclusion, should haue no benefite of this exemption. 4. That King Henry the Father should take assurance of loyalty toward him by hostages, or oath of such as were enlarged. 5. That King Henry the son should ratifie that Grant which his Father the King had made to his son John, of some Castles, & yetely rents in England, &c. The Seale it selfe, wherewith the young King made this mentioned Ratification, we haue here annexed.

cording to the English Ambassadors

(80) Touching King William of Scotland, his fore-mentioned compounding: our Historians all agree not, * some saying more, * some lesse: but * Heister Beatus (a Scottish Historian of some credit with that Nation) writes 11. That King William was to pay 10000*l*. Struggling for his ranfome, the one half in present coin, the other 5000*l*. vpon time 2. That for assurance of that summe the Earldomes of Northumberland, Cumberland & Huntington should rest in mortgage 3. That K. William should moue no warre against England for the retention of those lands 4. That, for the more security of the premises, the Castles of Berwick, Edenburgh, Reckrough & Strimeling should be deliuered to the English.

(81) In the meane while, King Henry according to Gouernants, discharged out of captivity nine hundred sixty and nine men of Arms, taken in those late warres; and King Henry the sonne discharged about one hundred; and hauing accomplished whateuer might content or secure his Father, they prepared for England, where the ioyous letters of their comming written by the Father, had begotten great and longing expectations in the subjects; which hee did, (saith Paris) that whom the general danger of warre had afflicted, the common gladness might recomfort. In their traualle thitherward the confidence was such vpon this fresh reconciliement, that one Chamber and table serued both, for whom before one Kingdome was not wide enough. They landed at Perpignan vpon Friday, 20. of May, 1175.

(82) The face of England at this present, was like that of a quiet skie and sea, no blaine, no billow, no appearing signe of discontentment; which the better to continue, King Henry the Father accompanied with the King his sonne, omitted no office of a iust and prudent Gouernour, visiting a great part of his Realme in person, consulting, ordering and enacting such lawes and courtes, as might most establish the good of Peace. Hence it came, that at London both the Kings were present in a Synode, in which Richard lately choise Archibishop of Canterbury, did publish (* with the Kings assent) certain Canons for the better government of the Church of England, beginning thus; At the true fountaine of all happy rate, that is to say at the honour of God, and establishment of Religion & Discipline, &c. &c. amongst the rest, this one Canon in especial words is enacted, both by authority of the King & Synode, (and indeed worthy for euer to be in force) That every Patrone taking reward for any presentation, should for euer loofe the Patronage thereof. And the same Kings not long after being at Woodstocke, in accomplishment of such holy purposes, by aduise of the Clergy provided men to such Bishopricks, Abbacies, and principall castles as were vacant, where King Henry the Father forgot not his true friend John of Oxford, whom he preferred to the See of Norwich.

(83) From hence coming to Turke, hee serke hole parts to peace, whither William King of Scots repairing, sundry matters of importance were handled betweene the two Kings: as likewise afterward at Winchester (where the King had called a great assembly of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall) Ratherick King of Connacht in Ireland (at the fauor of his Ambassadors, the Archibishop of Thames and Towmead, & others of that nation, subjects to Ratherick) was receiued into protection & fauour, and became Tributarie: K. Henry being vnwilling to fish with a hooke of gold, in that warring vpon Ireland hee should seeme to do. In another Parliament, not long after at Northampton, he caused England to be diuided into six circuits, & to each Circuit three Iudicials kintrians deputed, and swelt to giue his lawes more free passage, as also the better to secure himselfe he threw to the earth sundry * Castles which had bin formerly kept against him, as Leicester, Huntington, Walsingham, Sturtebury, &c. and had the rest both in his English and in his French Dominions committed to his disposition.

(84) The young King * about these times disaffected fresh alienations in his mind against his Father: who yett dissembling all, did arme notwithstanding vpon the defence, and replenished both England and Normandie with Garrisons, which drew the sonne the sooner to come in.

(85) But the old King not vnwilling perhaps (lest the Brethrens concord might proue no better then a conspiracy against the Father) that his warlike Children should contend, * did nourish debate among them: Certaine it is, that to diuert the warre from himselfe, hee appealed his sonne the King with an encrease of maintenance for himselfe, amounting in the whole to an hundred pounds Annuall by the day, and ten pounds of the same money for his wife the Queene: and whereas Alice (daughter of Lem then King of France, who was married at three yeeres of age to Richard (second sonne of King Henry) when hee was but seuen, and now demanded of King Henry the Father, to the intent that Richard her husband might enjoy her, the old King who was

(86) But while the young King by his Fathers *insatiation sought by force to constrain young Richard to doe homage to him for Aquitaine, and King Henry the Father for the same cause commanded Geoffrey his third son, Duke of Britaine (whom some for his extraordinary perfidiousness in this stroke toward his Father, and manifold sacrilege, call the * Child of Perdition) to aide and assist his said elder brother; while also the treacherous Father (out of the spite of his Iunior) sought his own safety, and in nourishing it, had by the treachery of the said sonnes bin twice endangered, and had at both times been wonderfully persecuted; and while the young King by profound dissimulations, plotted to bring both his Father and Brother Richard into subjection; beheld the hand of God by raking away the young King at Marston not farre from Linsger, where his Father lay at siege, gaue an end to this odious, fowle and iniericate contention.

(87) Thus was his life cut off like a Weavers thred; (say * Authors) who had by dying cut of the hope of many: But whatsoever his life was, which God thus shortened at his age of twentie and eight yeeres; certainly his death was not inglorious, but worthy to be set out in Tables at large as a pattern to disobedient Children: for his Father refusing to wite him (fearing his owne life,) and sending him King in signe of forgiveness; the dying Prince most humbly with floods of teares kissing the same, made a most sorrowfull confession of his sinnes, and feeling death approach, would needs be drawne (as an vnworthy sinner) out of his owne bed, and laid vpon another, strewd with asbes, where his soule departed in a most pculent manner from his body; which being related to the Father, hee fell vpon the earth, weeping bitterly, and (like another Dauid for his Absalom) mourned very much, o quam non fandum off. fuit "one most grauely: o how bawous a thing it is for

(88) Who would not haue thought, that this blurring Prince, should haue had opportunitie to end his daies in peace and glorie? but it was otherwise ordained by God, and ancient writers hold, hee was principallie scourged, for beeing drawne, by seeming reasons of State, to put off an holy enterprise, the occasion whereof, was laid as it were at his foote. (89) Neuertheless, (the King hauing, at least, formally, adured the Loeds to aduise him, that which should be best for his foules health) it was thought fit, to ad the cause with money, but not to emploie his person, nor the person of any child hee had, which was the Patriarcks last request; and thereupon (to the vnspeakable griefe of the said Patriarcke, and of the whole Christiannitie of the East) hee refused the said Kingdome, and abandoned as noble an occasion of immortall renowne, as euer any King of England had beene offered; but gaue leave * to all such as would, to take vpon them the Croisse and serue. (90) Thus the sorrowfull Patriarcke being dismissed (not forgetting as * some doe write, to the ruler against the King for abandoning the cause) brought back nothing but discomfote and despaire, the Western Princes (by the Diuels malicious Arts) beeing wrapt and knotted in mortall suspicions and quartels indetermined, whereupon shortly after, ensued, with the losse of Ierusalem, the captivity of Guido King thereof, and of innumerable Christians besides; whom Sultan Saladin, Prince of the Mussulmans or Saracens, to the griefe and disgrace of all the Christian world, did vanquish.

(91) But, King Henries mind was more fixed on settling the fate of his already-possest Kingdome, and therefore in a great Parliament, held at Oxford, (vnto which came Elisabeth and Dauid, Kings of South Wales and North Wales, with other their chiefe Nobles, which alld there swore fealtie to the King) hee beeing desirous to aduance his sonne Edm. (whom hee exceedingly loued, and commonly in sport, hee called Sau-terra) hauing assured vpon him certaine Lands and Rents in England and Normandie, did there verie solemnly giue him also the title & Kingdome of Ireland; for, (besides the foresaid Bull of Pope Adrian the fourth, who for signe of inuestiture had also sent a ring of gold, which was laid vp in the Records at Winchester) Giraldus (who liued in that age) tells vs (to omitte what hee writes of one Gargantua) that Gallmores King of Ireland, was tributarie to the famous Arthur: that Ross (whence (saith hee) the Irish came) was at that present vnder King Henrie the second; and that the Irish Princes had voluntarily submitted themselves, as vnto him who by the * Law of a Sociall warre, was become their Soueraigne. But that Author had not scene belike, or did not remember (when thus hee went about to proue a legall right in the King) what others write of * Erfrides vngodly spoiles in Ireland, or of * Edgars Charter, in which is laid to bee contained, that hee had vnder his rule the chiefe City of Ireland Dublin, and the greater part of the kingdome also. But King Henrie strengthening his other rights with Grants of the Popes, Adrian, and Alexander, obtained also of Frederick the third (for Lucius the third, who was Alexanders successor, would not graunt the King therein) that it should bee lawfull for him, to crowne which of his sonnes hee would, King of Ireland, to whom beene a crowne of Feathers woven with gold, in all their Grants referring to the Ro- man Ser, the Peters pence, and rights; whereupon the King gaue the same to his sonne John, whose Coronation (flung with the like before) his father onely did delay, at such time as two Cardinales offered to celebrate that solemnitie.

(91) As Windfor sherefore his father giuing him the * Order of knight-hood (at such time hee was about * twelve yeeres old) sent him forth withinto Ireland, where the Arch-bishop of Dublin and the State, entertained him, but (by reason of such parsimonie toward his souldiers as was vied) hee returned the same yeere without doing much, but not without hauing waisted the mozt part of his Arme, in skirmishes with the Irish. His Stile in his scale of Ireland (though Houers faith, his father made him Regent, a king) was onely, Errollus Iohannis filij regis Anglia Domini Hibernia. Lord of Ireland.

(93) King Henrie, hearing now of his martial sonne, Earle Richard, had forthwith in Politon against him, and vanquished Geffrey Earle of Briane, "prepares a puissant armie, vpon terror whereof, Richard came in, rendering vp Politon to his mother Eleanor, (whose inheritance it was) at his fathers commaund-ment. The same yere wherein the W-It was thus defiled with vnnatural diuisions, the East was likewise polluted with the cursed Apollasie of one Richard de S. Albane (whom wee flume to thinke, was Eugenes) who renouncing the Christian beleefe (vp-on the Patriarchs discomforable returne) became a principall Commander vnder the Sultan of Babylon Saladinde, whom the Christians dare, with losse and slaughter of his armie, from Hierusalem. But on the other side, reuenge of disobedience still purified Geffrey, sonne of King Henrie, who was in a Torneament
at Paris troden to death vnder the horie fete.
A miserable end, and a deathfull.

(94) About which times, betwene the French and English all things floode vnder, now warre, then pence, and a warre againe, by reason that Philip (who had been crowned King some yeres before, during the life of Lemuy) challenging the custodie of Arthur, the Pallobus Ioune, and heire of Gissey Earle of Britaine, and sometimes onething, and sometime another, could not haue his will: Whiles Earle Richard turning to Philip against his Father, but obtaining a truce for two yeres, such amity (if there beany amity among mighty Princes) grew betwene King Philip and Earle Richard, Heare apparant of England and Normandy, such one be and boored ferued both. The Father perplexed, cald his sonne home, who preceeding many griefes, as the detention of Alice his Spouse, the doubt of disinherition, and other things, flood out againe and againe after a while submits to his Father. Then bursts forth Philip into Armes; and things so standing, the heauy newes of Ierusalem loifflewin into Christendome. When this Citty was formerly recovered by Gissey of Belen, an Yrban was Pope a Fredricke was Emperour, an Heracius Patriarchus now when it was lost, an Yrban was Pope a Fredricke was Emperour, and an Heracius Patriarch.

(95) Upon theſe news Henry and Philip meet, and for the honour of God, leaving downe diſpleaſure Jo preference of William Archbiſhop of Tyre, at which time ſome ſay a Croſſe appeared in the aire, take upon them, as Soldiers of Chriſt, the badge of the Croſſe, and there the better to diſtinguiſh themſelves, it was agreed that the French ſhould weare read Croſſes, the Engliſh White, and the Spaniſh Greene. And this determination was ſeconded with warlike preparations, levies of money, and inſtitution of martiall Diſcipline: all which notwithstanding nothing went forward.

(96) At Richard began the breach of this honourable confederation, who taking revenge vpon certain Rebels of his in Paiffrum, who brooked not his hard hand; one mischiefe drew another, and at the last both the Kings of England and France became parties to the quarrell, greatly against the minde of

K. Henry, whose heart was firmly set (as it seems) to reuenge the cause of Christ vsn Satan Saladin, for that in his answer to the Patriarch of Antioch, imploring aide, he concludes, That among the Princes himselfe, and Ionne, reioicing this worlds glory, and despiuing all pleasures whatsoeuer, and getting behind all things which were of this World, would in their owne person with their whole Forces be in the fauour of the Lord speedily visite him. And sure the state of those parts required it, Saladin hauing slaine many of the Knights Templars, and Nobles, and about three thousand footmen, with innumerable other in Cities and Townes by him subdued. Among all which grieuous accidents, we cannot to faison lower thereby with sweet omis one noble proclamation made by the chief crooked Lord, Philip Earle of Flanders, the Earle of Blis, and other, who being required to take parts, made answer, That they would not contrary to their promise to God, put armour on, against any Christian, till they had done their duty vnto our people Saladin.

(97) In the treasures therefore between Henry and Philip, the demands of Philip on the behalf of Richard were such, and so vain for the King (as at all his fibbicks should swear fealty to Richard during the Fathers life, yet yet referring their allegiance to the Father) that Richard apparently fell off, and became Ligeinman for Normandy, &c. to Philip King of France, and at a new Treaty (by mediation of a Cardinal Legate) the demands of Philip being moreridid then before, as that King Henry should not only settle the Kingdoms upon Richard, but take a John also with him into France, or that other wile Richard would not goe (being jealous of his brothers grace with his Father) Henrie would content to none of those insolent propositions, but disdaining to freme to be enforced, they betooke them (eies on all sides to their swords.

(78) The effect whereof was, that former good fortunes forsaking King Henry, hee sustained many losses by the Armes of King Henry and Richard, & was driven out of Mans in Main (the city where hee had his house, & which he loved above all other places) by firing of the Suburbs before the enemy came, being casually consumed, hee was glad to yield to such conditions as it pleased Philip to prescribe. It is written¹ that at the meeting of these two Kings, the skie being cleare, a thunderbolt strooke betweene them, and after a little pause comming together againe it thundered more terribly, so that Henry had faile of his horse, but that his people sustained him, whereupon hee came proudly to the end, though it were to his vnspeakable griefe, this Kingly heart being vnto this, and not to take conditions.

(v) Fearfull was the speech which King Henrie, when hee abandoned Maria by reason of the fire, vttered against Richard; which was, That if he had taken from him that day the thing that he most loued in this world, he would requite him, "for that that day hee would depriue him of that thing which in him should please a Child, to wit, his Heart." But after the peace concluded, (upon mediation) between the sides, another thing struck neerer, for finding the name of his soune Iohn first in the Catalogue of the Conspirators against him in that adion, hee bitterly curst the houre of his birth, laying Gods curse and his vpon his sonnes, which hee would neuer recall, for any perimolation of the Bilthoppes and others: but coming to Chenow felt there grieuously sicke, and feeling death approach, hee caoed himselfe to be borne into the Church before the Altar, where after humble confession and sorrow for his sinnes, hee departed this life.

(100) It shall not (in contempt of humane glory) be forgotten, that this puissant Monarch being dead his people perfectly left him, and fell to spoile all he had, leaving him naked; of whom * one saith truly: "and

His Wife.

(101) Eleanor, the Wife of King Henry, was the eldest of the two Daughters, and the ſole Heire of William Duke of Aquitaine, the ſiſt of that name, & the ninth in ſucceſſion, ſonne of Duke William the fourth, her Mother was Daughter to Raimond Earle of Thimſie, and her great Dowrie was motiue fiſt to King Lewis, (who had two daughters by her, Mary and Alice) and after to King Henry, to marry her. There are of the French Hiſtorians who report that King Henry had a former wife, and that ſhee bare vnto him Prince Henry: but Writers of our owne affaires (and ſome alſo of the French), acknowledge but only Eleanor for his Wife. Certain it is, that King Henries times were much famouſed by two Women of moſt differing qualities; the one was his renowned Mother Matilda, whoſe Epitaph thus comprised part of her glory:

Orto magna, viri maior, ſed maxima prole: Hic laet Henric filia, Spanſa, Parca.

*Here Henries Mother, Daughter, wife death reſt:
By Birth, match; more by Spouſe; by Child, moſt bleſt.*

The other was this Eleanor his Wife; the fiſt cauſe of theſe bloudie Warres, which long after continued as hereditary betwixt England and France, yea and the bellows of that vnnatural diſcord, betwixt her husband and his ſonnes. Shee much out-lieu'd her husband (as a bad thing ſtickes longeſt) being ſo happie as to ſee three of her ſonnes, aduanced to the Crowne, and to vſurp as to ſee two of them in their graues: for ſhe liued till King Iohn time.

His Iſſue.

(102) William, the eldest ſonne and ſiſt child of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne before his father was King, and while hee was but Duke of Normandy, in the eighteenth yeere of the raigne of King Stephen, 1152. and the fourth yeere after, (his father being then King and in the ſecond yeere of his raigne) the Nobilitie of England ſwore vnto him their fealtie, as to the heire apparent of the Kingdome, at the Caſtle of Wallingford in Berkſhire;
but he deſcended the yeere following, being the third of his fathers raigne, and the fiſt of his owne age 1156. He was buried in the Monastery of Reading at the ſeete of his great Grandfather, King Henry the fiſt.

(103) Henrie, the ſecond ſonne of King Henry,
and Queene Eleanor, being borne the laſt of Febru-
arie 1156, was thirthe heire apparent, after the death of his brother William who was Duke of Normandie, Earle of Anjou and Mayenne; and was crowned King of England, at Weſtmiſter, by Roger Arch-biſhop of York, the fifteenth of Iulie 1170. His wife was Margaret, daughter of Lewis the Younger, King of France, married to him at Torburgh in Normandie, the ſecond of November 1160. crowned Queene at Wincheſter, by Ratrick of Wincheſter Arch-biſhop of Reas, the 21. of November 1163. and ſtrouing him was remarried to John, King of Hungarie. He died with out iſſue, before his father, at Mareuil in Tu- raine, the eleuenth of Iulie, the twentie ſixe yeere of his fathers raigne 1182. and was buried in the Church of our Lady at Reas.

(104) Richard, the third ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Oxford, (in the Kings Palace there, called Beau-Mont;) in September the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne 1157. He proued a Prince of great valor, and was therefore ſurna-med in French Coeur-de-Lion, in Engliſh Lions-Heart:
hee was created Earle of Payton, and had the whole Dutchie of Aquitaine, for which he did his homage to King Lewis the Younger of France, in the eighteenth yeere of his fathers raigne 1170. yet afterward he conceiued ſome diſcontentment againſt his father, and maintained warres vpon him, but was reconcil-ed againe into his loue, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdome.

(105) Griffrey, the fourth ſonne of King Henry,
and of Queene Eleanor, was borne the twentie third of September, in the fiſth yeere of his fathers raigne 1159. Hee married Conſtance daughter and heire of Conan Duke of Britaine, and in her right was Duke of Britaine, and did his homage to his brother Henry for the ſame Dutchie, and receiued the homages of the Barrons of the ſime: hee died at Paris, in the thirte two yeere of his fathers raigne 1186. the nineteenth of Auguſt, and is buried in the quire of our Ladies Church there: hee had iſſue Arthur Duke of Britaine, borne after his fathers deſceale, the heire apparent of King Richard, and by ſome ſuppo-ſed to bee made away by King Iohn and alſo Eleanor called the Damſell of Britaine, who died in priſon in the raigne of King Henry the third.

(106) Philip, the fiſth ſonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, may bee miſtruſted, to be miſtaken
by Annuraries of our time, as miſunderſtanding the ancient writers, who mentioning the birth of Philip the Kings ſonne, might by good likelihood, be thought to meane, Philip ſonne of Lewis the Younger King of France, who was borne about this time, and was after King of the ſime Countrey. But Mr Thomas Talbot, an exact traſailer in genealogies, hath not onely ſet him downe in this place, amongſt the children of this King, but alſo warranteth the ſime, to bee done with good authoritie: howſoeuer, it is apparent, his life was verie ſhort.

(107) Iohn, the ſixth and yongelt ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, in Anno 1166.
hee was iſtingle furnamed by his father Sans terre,
in Engliſh without Land, becauſe hee was borne laſt,
as if there had beene nothing left for him: Notwithſtanding ſooner after, hee was created Earle of Man- tagne, and had more-ouer by degrees, the Earle-domes of Cornuall, and Gloceſter, the Counties of Derby and Lancaster, the Honors of Wallingford and Nottingham, the Caſtles of Tutill, Atwarren, and Lodgarſall, with many other great Scigniories, (and about them all) was alſo Lord of Ireland, and at the laſt ſucceeded his brother Richard in all his Dominions and was King of England.

(108) Maud, the eldest daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, borne in the third yeere of her fathers raigne, married to Henrie, ſurnamed the Lion Duke of Saxonie; Lothar that died yong, Ortho
the fourth German Emperour, and William borne at Wincheſter, progenitor of the Dukes of Brunſwick, who bare for their Armes, the Coate of England, with the two Lions, as King Henrie his Grandfather bare, before the match with Queene Eleanor, and Maud
married to Griffrey Earle of Perch: Shee ſuruiued him, and died in the fiſt yeere of the reigne of her brother King Richard, and was buried by her husband, in the Church of S. Blais at Brunſwick.

(109) Eleanor, the ſecond daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Reas in Norm- andie, in the eight yeere of her fathers raigne, 1162.
She was married to Alphonſe, the ninth of that name, ſurnamed the Good, King of Caſtile in Spaine, and had

(110) Jeanne, the third and yongest daughter of king Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was born at the City of Angiers in France, in the moneth of October, the 13. yeare of her Fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1166. when shee was eleven yeres of age; there was with great honour conveyed to the City of Palermo, and there married to William the second of that name, king of Sicily, Duke of Apulia, and Prince of Copas, vpon Sunday the 13. day of February, 1177. and was crowned Queene the same day at the same place. Shee had a sonne by his name Raimond, whom his Father when hee was returned from his Christning, created Duke of Apulia: but the child died first, and the Father after, leaving no issue. And the surviving, married againe, and was the third wife of Raimond the fourth of that name, Earle of Tolosa, by him shee had issue Raimond the last Earle of that house, Bertrand Lord of Brampall, Montclere, and Saluace, and a daughter married to Rerald of Elbourne, Prince of Orange.

His Naturall Issue.

(111) William the Naturall issue of king Henry, borne of Rafamund, the daughter of Walter Lord Clyfard, which Lady for her incomparable beauty was reputed (with allusion to her name) Rafa-mundi, the Rose of the world: the deare affection the long bare her, caused both burning zealousie in the Queene, and fallall ruine to her selfe, albeit the amorous king, for her secretie and security, (that wher wailes will not a ialousie yeere thought) had built for her a most artificiall Labyrinth at Woodschoke in Oxfordshire, with such cunning windings and intricate passages, as had not Fate, and Houens reuenge on Adultery, shewed the way, the enraged Queen had not so soone bene rid of her Rival, nor that wanton Dame of her life. Shee was buried in the Nauery of Godfrey by Oxford with this Epitaph.

*Hæc iacet in Tumbis Ræfa mundi, non Ræfa mundi;
Non redoleat, sed olet, quæ redolere solet.*

(Rafa,

This Tumbie doth here encluse the Worlds most beauteous Rafa, passing sweete ere while, Now nought but odour vile.

But Hugh (called the Saint) Bishop of Lincolne, thought the Hearse of a Harlot no fit spectacle for a Chure of Virgins to contemplate, & therefore himselfe in priuie caused her bones to be cast forth of the Church; which yet those chaste sisters afterward recollected, and placed there againe with much honour, erecting a goodly Crosse, thus inscribed to the honour of her memory:

Qui meorbat, oret, Signumque salutis adoret, Vtq; tibi datur requies Rafamunda, precetur.

*All you which passe this way, This Crosse adore, and pray,
That Rafamunda Soule may True rest possesse for ay.*

The first Sonne which by her King Henry had, was the Earl William, surnamed in French, Langespee, in Englishe, Long-sword. He was Earle of Salisbury, in right of his Wife, Daughter and heire of William Earle of that Countie, son of Earle Patrick, by whom hee had issue William Earle of Salisbury, Stephen Earle of Hyber, Ela Countesse of Warwicke, Ida Lady Beucham of Bedford, and Isabel Lady Essex: his sonne Earle William the second, had Earle William the third, Father of Margaret, Wife of Henry Earle of Lincolne: hee died in the Castle of old Salisbury, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of the New City, in the ninth yeare of the raigne of king Henry the third.

(112) Goffrey an other Naturall sonne of king Henry, was borne of the Lady Rafamund aforesaid: This man in his tender youth, was (by his Fathers procurement) made Archdeacon of Lincolne, and after Bishop of that See, which hee held about seven yeres without consecration, and then resigning it, in the yeare, 1181, into the hands of Richard Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Father; hee was made Chanceller of England, and afterward by his brother king Richard, hee was advanced to the Archbishopricke of Turke, (being consecrated at Tours in France, An. 1191,) which See hee governed with good approbation. But in the time of his Brother King Jehn, hee underwent many difficulties, by opposing the Kings purposes, who therefore made seizure of his whole estate, and An. 1207. he left the Land and after five yeres banishment, died, viz. An. 1213.

(113) Morgan, an other Naturall sonne of King Henry, is thought by some (because so small mention is made of him) to haue bene of no long life after his birth, and to haue bene borne of some woman in Wales, where this Christian name is most commonly vsed, and whither this King vpon many occasions, sometimes resorted. But some others (whose studious paines, deserue much thanks of posteritie) report, that hee was gotten on the wife of one Ralph Blivet (or Blivet) a knight, and liued both to bee Freemast of Burley, and to be elected to the Bishopricke of Durham, when coming to Rome for a dispensation (because his Bastardie made him otherwise vacapable) the Pope willed him to professe himselfe Alens lawfull son, and not the Kings Naturall, promising to consecrate him on that condition: but he, vsing the aduise of one William Laue his Clerke, told the Pope, that for no worldly promotion, he would renounce his father, or deny himselfe to bee of roiall blood: so blind were some Prelats of those times, who effected spirituall functions, to be but worldly promotions.

King Richard un-

RICHARD succeeding to his deceased Father Henric, brought forth that wonder, which a Writer of that age thus celebrated,

Mira cano; Sol occubuit, Nox nulla fuit.

*A Wonder strange I write,
the Sun did set, yet was no Night.*

Meaning, that though Henry were dead, yet the glory and happinesse of the land was not thereby clouded, for that Richard was another Sunne, and in some respects farre the more bright, and farther shining of the two, as hauing for honour of Christian Chivalrie, wholly consecrated his warlike minde and actions to the seruice of God, and redouancement of the Crosse of Christ, dishonoured by the Infidels in Afie: in which enterprise hee was so frequently zealous, that from the time of his Fathers

death (in whose vowes it had bene) hee meditated scarce any thing else, disposing the affaires of his Estate (but not * carelesly, as some would impose) as things which did but offely vnder-serve, and conduce to the maine and principall end of aduancing his Sauious glory, whereunto hee iudged that action did tend.

(2) Hauing therefore ordered his weightier businesses in Normandy and other his transmarine Dominions, & in England by his letters, let * the Queen his Mother at liberty from that captivity, wherein her late husband the king had long detained her, (who sensible of others woe by her owne, did afterward exercise many works of mercy in that kind) he came over hither, as well to receive all the rights of Soveraignty, and to settle the same; as also to take meanes for proceeding in his intended holy voia-ge, together with Philip king of France, and other Christian Potentates.

(3) And though before his Coronation, most Writers doe not call him a King; yet sure it is, that he

he and others did immediately, and unquestionably, upon the first acquaintance of the interest, (which was at his Fathers last gaile) exercise all the offices of the royal power; for hee restored Robert Earle of Leicester to his whole estate: So plaine it is, that our Government allows not the dangerous consultations, & empty spaces of an Interregnum, such as in most of those States are common, if not continual.

(4) But in nothing more could this noble Prince shew his judgement (though hee were otherwise Sagax ingenij of a sharpe and searching wit) then in this: That hee banished from his familiarity, & (as my Author saith) hated all those of what profession so ever they were, who had forsaken his Father, and both retained, and enriched the other, who had loyally stood for him against himselfe in all affairs.

(5) At his Coronation, which was most magnificently performed at Westminster, by Salisbury Archbishop of Canterbury, the pointers of the Oath which hee made to God, and the Kingdom of England, at the Altar upon the holy Evangelists, before the Prelates, Nobles, and whole people, * were these: 1. That all the daies of his life he would beare peace, honour, and reverence to God, and holy Church and the Ordinances thereof: a That in the people to him committed, hee would exercise right, iustice, and equitie. 3. That hee would blot forth naughty lawes, and peruerse customes, if any were brought vpon his Kingdom, and would enact good lawes, and the same in good faish keepe, and without mal-keyns. Which oath being most solemnly taken, and the sacred vnction performed; the Archbishop standing at the Altar forbad him, on the behalfe of Almighty God, to assume that honour, vntill hee had a full purpose to keepe what hee had (sworne): whereto Richard silently, and with his owne hands, humbly taking the ponderous Crowne Imperiall from off the Altar, in signification, as is probable, that hee held it onely from God, hee deliuered it to the Archbishop, who thereupon accomplished all the Ceremonies of Coronation.

(6) Which Act was accidentally handfull, and anticipated with the blood of many Leues (though verily against the Kings will) who in a tumult (raised by the * Ocean) were furiously marched, which (though it were afterward punished by the Lawes) might seeme a preface, that this Lim-bearded King (as his by-name Cœur-de-Lion did import) should be a speciall destroyer of the Enemies of our Saviour.

What could indeed be said enough for such a voyage? and it was a cogitation worthy so glorious a purpose, to to order his estate, as if hee were not to returne at all; because, looking-backe doth vnbind and soften resolutions.

(8) As for men and soldiers, the Prelates, Friars, and other Preachers, had stirred vp innumerable, by their manifold exhortations (the Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury having * trauielled through Wales in person for that purpose, going afterward with the King to Palmyra, where also * he died) in palisps and priuate conferences, founding nothing but the Crosse and Passion of Christ, calling the world to reuenge his cause vpon the Pagans, and setting foules on fire with vehement gestures, adions, and persuasions. But the kingdome of England he ordered thus.

(9) The onely maine danger of the Scaire in his absence, was in his brother Iohn Earle of Canterbury, of whose ambition hee was somewhat jealous, as
